Delay Seen As Beneficial For CVS. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Armstrong, Berman) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. moved to allow federal antitrust regulators more time to review the company's hostile bid for rival pharmacy-benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc., a delay that boosts a competing offer for Caremark by drugstore giant CVS Corp." The Journal continues, "The action makes it unlikely that Express Scripts can gain antitrust approval before Caremark shareholders vote on the CVS offer on Feb. 20. Under the new timetable, the Federal Trade Commission doesn't have to act on the Express Scripts matter until March 8. … That uncertainty favors the CVS deal, valued at about $25 billion, since the drugstore chain has already passed a similar FTC review and can close quickly on the deal following shareholder approval. CVS shareholders are slated to vote on the Caremark acquisition on Feb. 23." The Journal adds, "With Express's antitrust case in limbo, the company is under increasing pressure to raise its offer, which yesterday was valued at $58.87 per Caremark share. That is only about 1% greater than CVS's transaction terms, valued at $58.19, which includes a $2 per share dividend once the deal is completed. … That leaves CVS in the driver's seat, given that an Express deal is months away from completion. The exact timing, however, is what is at stake with an FTC decision. And that is why it has become such a hot debate topic among the two feuding sides. … Express Scripts said it planned to withdraw its filing with the FTC on Friday and refile it Tuesday to give the agency another 30 days to review the proposed acquisition. The company said it intends to work with the FTC to clear the transaction without a 'second request' for information, which would further delay regulatory approval."

Sanofi Seen As Well-Positioned For Successful Bristol Myers Bid. The Financial Times (2/1, Bowe, Jack, Strauss) reports, "For pharmaceutical companies considering a bid for Bristol Myers-Squibb of the US, it is the best of times and the worst of times." The Times continues, "BMS, a struggling company with promising new drugs and a good pipeline, has long seen 2007 as a pivotal point in its turnround after a having to cope with a raft of patent expiries on big drugs in recent years and serious legal troubles. It harbours considerable uncertainties for any buyer. … Yet it emerged this week that BMS and its long-standing French partner, Sanofi-Aventis, have held early-stage talks, prompting BMS to beef up its panel of investment banking advisers, adding Lehman Brothers to Citigroup and Morgan Stanley, partly to widen the field of potential interested parties. Sanofi is well placed to act fast and beat rivals to a deal. Barbara Ryan, an analyst at Deutsche Bank, says a formal bid now would be 'opportunistic'. … It would also be intriguing, she says. BMS has been operating for two years under a settlement with federal prosecutors after an accounting scandal. They appointed a corporate monitor to ensure compliance with corporate governance improvements negotiated to avoid criminal charges. This "deferred prosecution agreement" is set to end in June." The Times adds, "BMS has other legal complications, including a US justice department investigation into negotiations last year with the Canadian generic drugmaker Apotex to end a patent dispute over its blockbuster blood-thinning drug Plavix, accounting for more than a third of its earnings. The fall-out led to the firing of Peter Dolan, the chief executive. … The patent challenge over Plavix itself - for which hearings began this month - throws up more uncertainty until a decision, also expected in June. As Morgan Stanley analysts argued this week, the litigation adds to the pressure on BMS's ability to generate new cash to sustain dividend payments and commercialise its late-stage pipeline of future drugs."

Vornado To Raise Bid For Equity Office Properties. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, C2, Chittum, Sender) reports, "An investor group led by Vornado Realty Trust is expected to raise its bid for Equity Office Properties Trust, topping Blackstone Group's bid in one of the biggest buyout fights in history." The Journal continues, "The bid was set to be announced last night or before markets open today. Vornado had a deadline yesterday to complete its fact-finding or "due diligence" on whether to top Blackstone's most recent offer of $54 a share. If Vornado made such a bid, Blackstone could either go higher or claim the high road of discipline, tell investors that the price was too high and walk away with its consolation prize, a $500 million fee that it will share with investors. Equity Office is a real-estate investment trust founded by the Chicago real-estate magnate Samuel Zell." The Journal adds, "The markets had expected a bid to materialize with EOP's stock up 89 cents, or 1.6% yesterday to $55.55 as of 4 p.m. composite on the New York Stock Exchange -- and Vornado's down $1.20, or nearly 1%, to $122.35 on the Big Board. … The latest round in the bidding caps a feverish period in which both sides have been consulting with potential buyers of some of the properties in the Equity Office portfolio, the largest in the U.S. by size and value, to determine how high to go. … The contest started on Nov. 19 when Blackstone agreed to buy Equity Office for $20.1 billion, or $48.50 a share. In July, Equity Office had spurned a then-secret offer by Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth to merge the two companies. … Vornado struck back on Jan. 17 with two private-equity partners, Starwood Capital and Walton Street Capital, offering $52 a share with 40% payable in Vornado stock and the rest in cash. Blackstone returned the volley eight days later, raising its bid to $54 a share. .. The frenzied back and forth came months after conventional wisdom still held that Equity Office was too big to be taken private. Though its stock had lagged behind its peers since the start of the decade, it was a behemoth with a total capitalization (including debt) of some $36 billion, which would require the largest 'takeout deal' in history."

Nasdaq Warns Of Consequences For LSE Should Takeover Bid Fail. The Financial Times (2/1, Cohen) reports that Nasdaq has signaled it is prepared to fight a prolonged battle with the London Stock Exchange. On Wednesday, the US stock market "warned…if its hostile takeover bid failed, it could offer its technology to an LSE rival as part of moves it expects to drive down the exchange's share price." Nasdaq Chief Executive Bob Greifeld "told the Financial Times that Nasdaq could keep its 28.75 per cent stake in the LSE for 18 months." Greifeld indicated he expected the share price to fall in that time. Nasdaq "has refused to raise its offer price from £12.43 a share and looks steeled to seeing its current approach running out of time. LSE shares have stayed stubbornly close to £13, making it highly unlikely the bid will succeed."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

UN Panel Report Expected To Predict Warming Of 3 Degrees Celsius By 2100. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Spotts, 59K) reports, "By 2100, retired snowbirds will be joined by 'sun birds' – who flee north to escape oppressively hot, humid summers not just in Miami, but Milwaukee as well. ... Welcome to a world where the climate is, on average, 3 degrees Celsius (5.4 degrees Fahrenheit) warmer than today. That projection – more specific than any previous one – is just one element expected to emerge this week as some 500 scientists from around the world gather to put the finishing touches on a major report on the Earth's climate and what the future may hold for it." It is "the first of three volumes set for release this year by the UN-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change." Details "remain closely held until its release Friday morning. Leaks to the press based on earlier drafts, however, suggest that the researchers are projecting temperature increases of between 2 and 4.5 degrees C (3.6 and 8.1 degrees F.) by century's end if carbon-dioxide concentrations in the atmosphere reach twice their preindustrial levels. Their 'most likely' increase is expected to be about 3 degrees C."

US Firms Said To Lag In Climate Change Readiness. The Financial Times (2/1, Birchall) reports, "US companies are lagging behind Europe in their readiness to identify climate-change risks, according to the most comprehensive survey to date of industry awareness of the issues." The Times adds, "Only 47 per cent of the members of the S&P 500 index responded to a request last year for information on their assessment of climate change risk ... . In contrast, 76 per cent of the members of the FT 500 index responded to the same questionnaire." The "report on the responses was prepared for Ceres, a coalition of investors and environmental groups, and Calvert, one of the largest US socially-concerned investment firms. It comes amid growing corporate awareness of climate change risk in the US."

Chirac Says US Must Sign Climate Agreements Or Face Tax. The New York Times (2/1, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports, "President Jacques Chirac has demanded that the United States sign both the Kyoto climate protocol and a future agreement that will take effect when the Kyoto accord runs out in 2012. He said that he welcomed last week's State of the Union address in which President Bush described climate change as a 'serious challenge.'" But "he warned that if the United States did not sign the agreements, a carbon tax across Europe on imports from nations that have not signed the Kyoto treaty could be imposed to try to force compliance." The Times adds, "Trade lawyers have been divided over the legality of a carbon tax, with some saying it would run counter to international trade rules. But Mr. Chirac said other European countries would back it."

Professor Says Climate Change Framework Is Well Established. In a Washington Post (2/1, A15, 690K) op-ed, science history professor Naomi Oreskes writes, "With the release of the new report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change tomorrow,...many will be looking for what's new." But "from a policy perspective" what matters is "that the broad framework is established beyond a reasonable doubt. Although few people realize it, this framework has been in place for nearly half a century." One "early warning that we 'will modify the heat balance of the atmosphere to such an extent that marked changes in climate . . . could occur' came in 1965 from the Environmental Pollution Board of the President's Science Advisory Committee. While the Bush administration has been loath to accept this reality," the Johnson Administration "accepted it as a statement of scientific fact." In 1992, the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change "called for immediate action to reverse the trend of mounting greenhouse gas emissions. One early signatory was President George H.W. Bush, who called on world leaders to translate the written document into 'concrete action to protect the planet.'" The "treaty was unanimously ratified by the Senate." Oreskes concludes, "In 1965, the concern that greenhouse gases would lead to global warming was a prediction. Today, it is an established scientific fact."

Ethanol Transportation Strains Railroads. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B1, Brat, Machalaba, 2.04M) reports that "as ethanol producers ramp up production, they are straining railroads already taxed by burgeoning shipments of coal, containers and grain. And they worry that the transportation crunch could make it difficult for ethanol, despite its surge of support in Washington, to compete with energy rivals." Because ethanol cannot be shipped through the pipelines that move gasoline, natural gas and oil, "the ethanol industry has been forced into a marriage with the already groaning railroads." Although few "think the strains will derail the boom," "ethanol's popularity has meant that producers have had to struggle to upgrade their rail yards and secure enough tank and grain cars to efficiently ship both ethanol and its byproducts."

Ethanol Imports Soar Despite Tariff. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B1, Etter, 2.04M) reports, "Even as the U.S. looks to ethanol as a way to wean itself off foreign petroleum supplies, imports of the biofuel are soaring. Despite a sharp tariff levied on most ethanol shipped from abroad, importers are finding they can compete with domestic ethanol on price." The "surge in imports has yet to cause political backlash because U.S. ethanol supplies haven't caught up with demand. But tensions could arise this year as production at a slew of new domestic ethanol plants threatens to outstrip demand." The "ethanol industry benefits from a 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit as well as a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff levied on most imports. The tariff drives up the price of imported ethanol. Neither subsidy is likely to change despite Bush administration hints that it wouldn't mind seeing the tariff disappear."

Wessel Says Bush Plan Would Make Ethanol Tax Credit, Tariff Unnecessary. In his Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, 2.04M) column, David Wessel evaluates President Bush's energy initiative, writing, "Bush is allergic to anything that smells like a tax. So he opted for a not-very-Republican alternative. He would use the government's muscle to force Americans -- or more precisely, the companies that blend motor fuel -- to consume less gasoline than they otherwise would and more of something else." It "isn't the economists' first choice, but economists don't often run for office. The president's proposal has some logic: The government isn't picking winners, just guaranteeing lasting demand for alternatives to gasoline." Wessel adds, "With all that guaranteed demand, more than makers of corn-based ethanol could ever meet, one might think there was no longer any need for the 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit for ethanol." One "might also think that...there is little reason to continue a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff on imports of sugar-derived ethanol from Brazil." But Bush "didn't say anything about repealing the tax credit" or the tariff. The "reason has little to do with economics, and a lot to do with the politics of corn."

Federal Judge Schedules Near Hearing On "Divine Strake" Challenge. The AP (2/1) reports from Las Vegas, "A federal judge told government lawyers Wednesday he wants to be kept closely informed on plans for a non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would send a mushroom-shaped dust cloud high over the Nevada desert." The AP continues, "With no date set for the test, dubbed 'Divine Strake,' U.S. District Court Judge Lloyd George set another status hearing March 2, and said he wants to see a draft environmental assessment prepared about the Defense Threat Reduction Agency experiment. … 'I'll pay a lot of attention to this case, I assure you,' the judge said." The AP adds, "Justice Department lawyer Caroline Blanco said if a date is picked for the explosion, it will be at least 30 days after the environmental assessment is completed and a finding is made that the explosion would pose no significant threat to the environment or people. … Blanco, speaking by conference call from Washington, D.C., said that until a decision is made to go ahead, it was premature to address opponents' claims that the test will kick up and spread radioactive dust from the Nevada Test Site. … Robert Hager, a Reno-based lawyer representing Western Shoshone tribe members and 'downwinders' in Utah and Nevada, said that he plans to challenge flaws in the environmental assessment. … The document has been the focus of public meetings this month in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, where elected officials have questioned the safety of the experiment. It was postponed last year after Hager filed suit."

Quirk In Law Leaves Many Native Americans Without Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A1, Fields) reports, "The right of defendants to legal counsel is guaranteed by the Constitution. But due to a little-known quirk in federal law, Native Americans aren't assured this protection. That's because under U.S. law, Indian tribes are considered sovereign nations, and are not subject to all privileges afforded by the Bill of Rights." The Journal continues, "The country's 560 tribes are largely responsible for funding government services such as schools, police, and hospitals, as well as courts. The tribes have jurisdiction over crimes committed on reservations by the nation's 2.4 million American Indian and Alaska Natives. … Many of these tribal courts, like their federal and state counterparts, have their own prosecutors, tribe-appointed judges and jail facilities. Court proceedings can be judge or jury trials. There are 275 such courts in the U.S., each governed by the laws of an individual tribe or village. According to the U.S. Justice Department, more than 9,200 Native Americans convicted in tribal courts are locked up in tribal facilities or local jails off tribal lands." The Journal adds, "Mostly absent from this parallel justice system are public defenders -- a luxury that many poor tribes say they cannot afford. The defense gap means that accused criminals often end up representing themselves. As a result, many plead guilty and risk exposing themselves to additional charges at the federal and state levels. In some instances, they may be subject to double jeopardy -- two trials, sentences and punishments for the same crime. … The Indian Civil Rights Act, passed in 1968, gave individual tribe members some protections, such as the right to a speedy trial and the right to a trial by jury. But it did not provide the right to counsel for defendants too poor to hire attorneys. … Over the years, various congressional bills have sought to address the problem of tribal defense funding. Last year, Arizona Sen. John McCain, then chair of the Indian Affairs Committee, held a hearing to argue for more government assistance. The issue has yet to gain traction."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Schumer Proposes Plan To Fight Gang Violence, Drug Dealing Nationwide. The Journal News (1/31) in White Plains reported U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer has "proposed spending more than $1 billion and passing tougher laws to fight a nationwide surge in gang violence and drug dealing. Schumer unveiled a staff report showing a rise in violent crime and drug arrests across New York from 2000 to 2005 as an example for the entire country. The Gang Abatement and Prevention Act of 2007 includes spending $1 billion over five years for law enforcement to fight gangs on the streets and $50 million for police and educational programs in schools."

Empire State News (2/1) reports Schumer "released a new report showing that there has been a 10-percent increase in reports of violent crime and a nearly 20 percent jump in the number of drug arrests in cities and communities across upstate New York. 'Every sheriff, every police commissioner, the DEA, shows that a remarkably high percentage these days of both violent crimes and drug arrests are gang-related.'"

Pro Leagues Face Criticism For Not Requiring HGH Blood Tests For Athletes. The AP (2/1) reports Olympic athletes "soon will have their blood tested for human growth hormone, but the NFL and baseball officials instead are embracing the unproven concept of urine testing in their bid to stop use of the performance-enhancing drug. Critics question whether the pro leagues truly are intent on rooting out HGH, thought to be widely abused because no one currently is testing for it. But baseball and football officials say they are stymied by union contracts that prohibit taking blood from players, and they cite privacy concerns and doubts about the accuracy of blood tests." The World Anti-Doping Agency "plans to test the blood of elite amateur athletes by the end of this year. The agency's chief, Dick Pound, dismissed efforts by the NFL, Major League Baseball and their unions as 'a piddling little amount' spent on unproven technology to combat a major problem."

House Subcommittee Leaders Back Mitchell's Steroids Investigation. The AP (2/1) reports Congress "is monitoring George Mitchell's investigation of steroids in baseball and could intervene if he doesn't get more cooperation. The leaders of a House subcommittee that held hearings on steroids in 2005 pledged their support for Mitchell in a letter sent to him Tuesday and released to the media Wednesday. 'We sincerely hope that all relevant parties will work constructively to facilitate the completion of your investigation and your ongoing efforts to clean up the sport,' wrote House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade, and Consumer Protection chairman Bobby Rush, a Democrat from Illinois, and ranking Republican Cliff Stearns of Florida."

The New York Times (1/31, Curry) reported that by "warning the owners that Congress could again get involved with baseball and steroids, Mitchell is trying to persuade more people within the sport to testify. If nothing else, Mitchell has now succeeded in getting a reaction from Congress. 'We appreciate your warning to team owners and concur with your recommendation for better cooperation with your independent investigation,' Rush and Stearns wrote."

Bush Administration May Shift More Plan Colombia Resources Toward Economic Development. In Bogota, the Miami Herald (2/1) reports the Bush administration "will seek almost $600 million from Congress this year to aid Plan Colombia II, the second phase of a multi-pronged effort to battle drug trafficking and insurgency. The strategy may include shifting more resources to economic development projects, administration officials said Wednesday. … Analysts in Colombia, however, were skeptical that there would be any significant changes to Plan Colombia and considered possible alterations in terms of the Bush administration's efforts to appease the Democrat-controlled Congress in Washington."

Deputy Marshal Pleads Not Guilty To Alleged Mob Leak. The Chicago Tribune (2/1) reports, "A deputy U.S. marshal pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges that he leaked confidential information that a mob hit man was cooperating with the FBI against organized crime." The Tribune continues, "John Ambrose was charged last month with telling a family friend that Nicholas Calabrese, the only member of the Chicago Outfit ever to become a government informant, was releasing details of gangland slayings." The Tribune adds, "Ambrose's alleged role as the inside source came to light in cryptic conversations between imprisoned Outfit boss James Marcello and his brother, Michael, that were secretly recorded by the FBI. … Following Wednesday's arraignment, Ambrose's lawyer, Francis Lipuma, said he has been told that federal officials plan to place Ambrose on unpaid leave from his job, but Lipuma intends to fight the move. He is currently on paid leave."

IMMIGRATION:

US Seeks Dismissal Of Cuban Militant's Bid For Freedom. The AP (2/1, Caldwell) reports from El Paso, "U.S. immigration officials have asked a federal judge to toss out Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles' bid to be set free pending his ordered deportation." The AP continues, "In a four-page motion filed Wednesday in El Paso, the government argued that Posada's lawsuit is moot because he was transferred to the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service after being indicted Jan. 11. He had filed the lawsuit last year after spending nearly a year in a federal detention center on an immigration violation. He has been charged with several counts of lying during an interview and on an application in a bid to become a naturalized U.S. citizen. … Posada, who has pleaded not guilty, is being held without bond at the Otero County jail in New Mexico." The AP adds, "The motion was filed a day before a court-imposed deadline for immigration authorities to justify Posada's continued detention pending his deportation. … A federal immigration judge ruled in 2005 that Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier who had roles in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba and the Iran-Contra scandal, had to leave the U.S. But Judge William L. Abbott also ruled that the ailing anti-Castro militant could not be sent to Venezuela, where is a naturalized citizen, or Cuba, where he was born, because of fears that he would be tortured. … Governments of both countries want Posada sent to Venezuela to stand trial on charges that he was in Caracas when he planned the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner. Posada has denied any wrongdoing. … Several countries, including Mexico, have refused to let Posada in and Posada has argued that he should be set free while the government continues efforts to find some place to send him."

Plan To Increase Immigration Fees Draws Criticism. The Washington Post (2/1, A7, Fears, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) joined a chorus of immigrant advocacy groups in condemning the Bush administration's plan to charge legal immigrants significantly more money to obtain green cards, adjust their residency status and bring relatives to the United States." Kennedy said the "drastic increase will price the American dream out of reach for qualified immigrants wanting to be citizens of our country," and "called on Congress to appropriate more money to USCIS, which depends on fees for 99 percent of its budget." The senators "comments were echoed by Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the US Conference of Catholic Bishops: 'This increase reflects a disturbing trend which places the benefits of citizenship on the open market, with only those of a certain economic level able to access it.'"

The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 88K) reports CIS "said the increases will pay for more employees and equipment, reducing wait times. Director Emilio Gonzalez said immigrants will 'see the difference' in service." The Times adds, "On the other side of the ledger, Mr. Gonzalez has proposed eliminating the fee for applying for a visa as a victim of human trafficking. The fees would go into effect in about six months, after a public-comment period that begins today. The fees would add $1 billion to the agency's $2 billion annual budget."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Clark, Chardy) reports immigration advocates compared the proposed fee increase "to a 'second wall' that could make it harder for many new arrivals to earn US citizenship." McClatchy also notes Kennedy's opposition to the increase, and adds that Rep. Zoe Lofgren, the chair of the immigration subcommittee, "said she planned to 'carefully examine' the agency's justification for the increases."

TAX:

Massachusetts Man Faces Tax Fraud Charges. The Lowell (MA) Sun (2/1) reports, "A Groton (MA) resident faces charges in U.S. District Court for defrauding the government on his tax returns." The Sun continues, "According to the U.S. Justice Department, Joseph K. Berardi, 50, failed to report his sales to S. Strogoff & Co. a scrap-metal dealer in Chelsea, as taxable income on his federal returns in 1997, 1998 and 1999. He is believed to be one of the parties involved in a conspiracy to defraud the government of tax revenue." The Sun adds, "Yale Strogoff, of Swampscott, pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud the government in 2004. Strogoff conspired with his customers to pay those customers checks payable to fictitious payees for scrap metal sold to his company. Strogoff also arranged for the banks to cash the checks with no identification required. The customers would then keep the money for themselves instead of recording it as corporate income. … If convicted, Berardi faces up to three years in prison with another year of probation, and a fine of up to $250,000."

Wal-Mart Avoids State Taxes By Paying Itself Rent. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A1, Drucker) reports, "As the world's biggest retailer, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. pays billions of dollars a year in rent for its stores. Luckily for Wal-Mart, in about 25 states it has been paying most of that rent to itself -- and then deducting that amount from its state taxes." The Journal continues, "The strategy is complex, but the bottom line is simple: It has saved Wal-Mart from paying several hundred million dollars in taxes, according to court records and a person familiar with the matter. And Wal-Mart is far from alone." The Journal adds, "The arrangement takes advantage of a tax loophole that the federal government plugged decades ago, but which many states have been slower to catch. Here's how it works: One Wal-Mart subsidiary pays the rent to a real-estate investment trust, or REIT, which is entitled to a tax break if it pays its profits out in dividends. The REIT is 99%-owned by another Wal-Mart subsidiary, which receives the REIT's dividends tax-free. And Wal-Mart gets to deduct the rent from state taxes as a business expense, even though the money has stayed within the company. … Partly thanks to sophisticated financial strategies like these, states' tax collections from companies have been plummeting. On average, Wal-Mart has paid only about half of the statutory state tax rates for the past decade, according to Standard & Poor's Compustat, which collects data from SEC filings. The so-called 'captive REIT' strategy alone cut Wal-Mart's state taxes by about 20% over one four-year period. Now several state regulators are trying to crack down on the strategy, used largely by retailers and banks, and some other states have changed their laws to try to end the practice. Yesterday, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer included elimination of the loophole as part of his proposed budget, a fix he said would bring the state $83 million a year. … North Carolina tax authorities are challenging Wal-Mart, saying its REIT strategy was intended to 'distort [the company's] true net income,' according to its filings in the case in Superior Court in Raleigh, N.C. … Regulators in at least a half-dozen states are going after companies that have trimmed their taxes through similar arrangements, including Regions Financial Corp.'s AmSouth Bancorp. unit; AutoZone Inc. of Memphis, Tenn.; and two units of Bank of America Corp."

IRS, Consumer Advocates To Promote Earned Income Tax Credit. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Block, 2.27M) reports the IRS, the US Treasurer and "a coalition of consumer groups plan to launch a nationwide initiative today to encourage more low-income families to claim the earned income tax credit, an often-overlooked benefit that's worth up to $4,536 this year." Consumer advocates "and the IRS say they hope the program will also reduce the number of low-income taxpayers who take out refund-anticipation loans — high-interest loans offered by some tax-preparation companies. Though the use of those loans fell by more than 20% in the 2005 tax-filing season, they're still used by about 30% of EITC recipients, says Chi Chi Wu of the National Consumer Law Center."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Economy, Addresses "Income Inequality" In Visit To Wall Street. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 6, :50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush was…in New York today, on Wall Street, where he criticized those giant salaries and bonus us for CEO's. He said corporate boards should take more responsibility to tie executive pay to performance. He was then greeted by spontaneous applause on the trading floor of the New York Stock Exchange. A photo op meant to emphasize an economy that he says is stronger than he gets credit for."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) also noted that "in New York, to talk up the economy…Bush surprised traders at the stock exchange by dropping by for an unannounced visit," while ABC World News (1/31, story 3, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) said the President "got a very warm welcome. Indeed, feelings were warm all day long, for stock traders." ABC (Stark) added, "The President was back on the offensive again today…steering the conversation…to the economy." Wall Street "is certainly friendly territory. It's hard to imagine a warmer reception than the one the President got today from traders on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. But his message to the nation's leading capitalists was laced with tough love. At a speech at Federal Hall, he first made a nod to the outrage sparked by CEOs getting giant severance packages after being fired for poor performances." Bush was shown saying, "The salaries and bonuses on CEOs, should be based on success and improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders. We need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve." Bush, "for the first time," also "acknowledged that not everyone has shared equally in the recent economic prosperity." Bush: "The fact is that income inequality is real. It's been rising for more than 25 years. And the question is, whether we respond to the income of the inequality we see with policies that help lift people up, or tear others down."

The Washington Post (2/1, A4, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) reports Democrats "said Bush's speech is a reaction to the success of their agenda and to growing anger among voters who feel they are being left behind. 'They recognize the unhappiness voters have with inequity in this country,' said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee. 'For much of last year, they tried to deny this. But the election finally clinched it. So I guess there's no point in denying it anymore.'" The Post adds, "Bush aides did not deny that Bush was seeking to address Democratic concerns, but they said income inequality has been on the minds of senior administration officials such as Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who mentioned the subject in his first major address last spring, and chief economic adviser Edward Lazear." The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 88K) also focuses on Bush's comments on "income inequality," and describes Bush's message as "markedly populist."

The President's visit to New York was widely reported on by local TV stations throughout the country. The coverage often focused on Bush's comments about executive salaries. In a report typical of much of the local coverage, WCBS-TV New York (1/31, 11:05 pm) said in its broadcast, "Bush was in the city today to talk about the state of the economy and to take large American corporations to task on fat executive bonuses." The report added the President "paid a surprise visit to the New York Stock Exchange floor, where he mingled with traders." CLTV-TV Chicago (1/31, 9:55 pm) noted Bush "played up lower inflation, interest rates and rising wages."

A significant number of local TV newscasts across the country showed the President saying, "Government should not decide the compensation for America's corporate executives. But the salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders." Among them were WPBN-TV Traverse City, MI (1/31, 11:09 pm), KYMA-TV Yuma, AZ (1/31, 10:01 pm), WWBT-TV Richmond (1/31, 5:35 pm), and WAVE-TV Louisville (1/31, 5:12 pm).

White Bush's visit to Wall Street was mentioned in most reports dealing with yesterday's economic news, most print reports focusing solely on the President largely address his comments on CEO compensation. The AP (2/1, Feller), for example, says he issued "a sharp warning for corporate boards to 'step up to their responsibilities' and tie compensation packages to performance."

The New York Times (2/1, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Bush's comments on CEO pay "were met with silence from an otherwise friendly crowd gathered to hear what the White House billed as a 'State of the Economy' speech." However, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Hamilton, 850K) titled its report "Bush Sides With Corporations On Executive Pay Issue," and says Bush argued "corporate directors, not government officials, should be the ones to judge whether chief executives are earning their keep."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, McKinnon, Conkey, 2.04M), meanwhile, in a story headlined "Bush Gives Hope To Foes Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law," says that that in his speech, Bush "backed business demands to pare post-Enron reforms, which he called 'costly for businesses.' But he also used the forum to join the chorus of critics questioning lavish executive pay."

USA Today (2/1, Jackson, 2.27M) reports that in his speech yesterday, Bush also "called on Congress to extend tax cuts and renew 'fast track' trade authority, which requires Congress to cast an up-or-down vote on any international trade deal and make no amendments to the agreements." The President "highlighted the economy's growth and low unemployment and noted the earnings gap between the rich and poor is twice what it was in 1980. The president said an improved education system is vital to lifting wages and repeated his call for Congress to renew his No Child Left Behind education law."

The New York Times (2/1, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports the President "may be buffeted by bad news out of Iraq and record-low poll ratings, but he was buoyed on yesterday by positive economic signals. And he purposely chose Wall Street as the arena for his message that the economy is vibrant, a theme his aides hope can help him rebuild his flagging support. … With Democrats and some Republicans continuing to discuss resolutions critical of his new plan for Iraq in Washington, Mr. Bush used his speech earlier at Federal Hall to flaunt new economic data."

Bush Touts Positive Economic News In Wide-Ranging Interview. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed Bush yesterday before his visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. In an interview that touched on a variety of subjects, including Iraq, Katrina, and his post-2008 plans, the President was eager to tout the positive economic news released yesterday. Said Bush "War's difficult. It's negative. And, so, I'm not surprised that some of the good economic news is overshadowed by the -- the difficult news out of Iraq." But instead of focusing on negative press, Bush said he was "more concerned about than anything is whether or not people are putting more money in their pocket -- personal income was up by about 5 percent last quarter -- you know, whether people are finding jobs, and -- but, equally importantly, whether or not the policies we're working with Congress on will make this economy good, you know, in the future."

Bush Blasts Rationale For Higher "Taxes On The Rich." In his interview with Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto), Bush was asked to respond to Democratic claims that tax hikes on "the upper income" were justified by excessive CEO pay packages, Bush said, "That's the old saw, you know, raise the taxes on the rich. And, when you try to raise taxes on the rich, you also raise taxes on small business owners, sole-proprietorships, Subchapter S corporations. You know, it turns out that these tax increases are going to have to reach fairly far down the income level to meet the spending appetite of the Democrats."

Economy Grew At 3.5% Last Quarter. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) said "the US is economy is picking up after growing just 2% in the third quarter of last year. It gained strength in the final quarter, growing 3.5%." The AP (2/1, Aversa) reports "the economy snapped out of a sluggish spell and grew at a faster-than-expected" rate, adding the data "underscored the resilience of the economy; it has managed to keep on moving despite the ill effects of the residential real-estate bust and an ailing automotive sector." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Henderson, 690K) says "the US economy turned in a surprisingly strong performance last year, new data show," dispelling "any lingering doubts about the momentum of the economy going into this year. Many economists predict growth will slow this year, but gone are the recession worries of last summer." The Financial Times (2/1, Callan), Wall Street Journal (2/1, Whitehouse, 2.04M), New York Times (2/1, Peters, 1.16M), Christian Science Monitor (2/1, 59K), Washington Times (2/1, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/1, Havemann, 850K), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

Fed Holds Rates Steady, Deliver Positive Economic Assessment. The AP (2/1, Aversa) reports, "Pointing to a revved-up economy and encouraging news on inflation, the Federal Reserve held interest rates steady on Wednesday and extended a half-year breather for US borrowers." Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "and his central bank colleagues left an important interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, the fifth straight meeting without budging the rate. The decision was unanimous." Fed policymakers also "delivered a more positive assessment of the economy than in December, recognizing improvements in economic growth, inflation and even the troubled housing sector. 'Overall, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace over coming quarters,' they said." USA Today (2/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) describes the Fed as "more upbeat economic assessment than in recent months," while the Financial Times (2/1, Guha, Callan, Beales) notes the central bank "signaled growing confidence that the economy was heading for a soft landing." Its report "cited progress on inflation, noting 'readings on core inflation have improved modestly in recent months.'" The New York Times (2/1, Andrews, 1.16M) and Washington Post (2/1, Henderson, 690K) also report the story. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A2, Ip, Whitehouse, 2.04M), meanwhile, reports there has been growing praise for Bernanke among economists following the last economic reports.

Stocks Soar Following Fed Announcement. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported that after the Fed announcement, the Dow soared "up to 98 points [to close at 12,621.69] to a new record close. NASDAQ was up more that 15 points [to close at 2,463.93] on today's trading." The AP (2/1, Paradis) says the Federal Reserve "answered two of Wall Street's major concerns, indicating that the economy remains healthy and that inflation pressures are easing." The Washington Times/AP (2/1) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 9.42, or 0.66 percent." Similar stories on the soaring market appear in USA Today (2/1, 5B, 2.27M), the Wall Street Journal (2/1, C1, McKay, 2.04M) and New York Times (2/1, 1.16M), among other sources. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Shell, 2.27M) also reports that "if January lives up to its reputation as a good predictor of future stock market performance, then 2007 is likely to be another profitable year for stock investors." However, the New York Times (2/1, Bajaj,

1.16M) runs a story titled "What Could Bog Down The Bull," in which it says, "Investors may want to enjoy it while they can. The road ahead promises to be a long, hard slog as corporate profits are starting to slow."

Bush Warns Against Lurch Toward Disengagement, Isolationism. On its editorial page, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, A16, 2.04M) recounts the President's meeting yesterday with the Journal's editorial board, noting, "If Mr. Bush is beaten down by the polls and his party's loss of Congress, he isn't showing it. The President talked about a wide range of subjects, from warrantless wiretaps, to the politics of immigration, to diplomacy with North Korea." But Bush's "biggest theme was pushing back against what he feared might be a national lurch away from engagement with the world." Bush said, "I'm concerned about protectionism, isolationism." The Journal adds, "In his speech yesterday he hit on the need for new trade promotion authority. And in his conversation with us he also stressed his familiar arguments about the stakes of failure in Iraq." Asked about his decision to "change gears" on the NSA warrantless wiretap program, Bush said, "'Scrap the program' is not accurate. The program exists. And now we've had a program ratified by the judiciary which is going to make it easier for a future President to have this program in place. . . . It had nothing to do with diminution of Presidential authority. It had everything to do with getting a second branch of government to support that which I have done." The Journal adds, "It sounds to us as if the President believes he's made a tactical concession in order to achieve what he thinks is a larger strategic victory. Let's hope he's right." The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A16, 2.04M) also ran extensive excerpts of its interview with the Journal's editorial board.

WSJournal Says Those Predicting A Recession Were Wrong. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.04M) editorializes, "If the US economy keeps growing like it is, Rodney Dangerfield is going to have to rise from the dead and file a patent claim. The expansion that gets no respect keeps cruising along -- past $70 oil, above rising interest rates, and now apparently around even the housing and auto slumps. Yesterday's report that fourth quarter GDP rose a healthy 3.5% was merely the most recent repudiation of the media and Beltway bears who have predicted a recession in each of the past four years." The "latest scare came last fall, as the decline in housing accelerated and many of Wall Street's Keynesian forecasters predicted the consumer would slump along with it. (We hope someone offered smelling salts to the economists at Goldman Sachs yesterday.) To the contrary, the consumer remains confident."

Bush Praised For Promoting Free Trade. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, 850K) says in an editorial that Bush "has never worked harder to promote free trade. On Wednesday, he made a powerful case on Wall Street for extending his fast-track trade negotiating authority, though even more impressive was his effort the day before to explain to factory workers in East Peoria, Ill., why they should care about such off-the-radar topics as the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks." The US economy "is as strong as it is because of, not in spite of, the world's increased openness. But this is a message the president has not done an effective job of selling in the past, and it's a message that plenty of Democrats in the new Congress do not embrace, given their ties to narrower interests adversely affected by competition. So Bush now has a tough fight ahead of him."

Bush Seeks To Cut Farm Program Funds.

The AP (2/1, Quaid) reports, "Thousands of the richest farmers would lose their government subsidies under a Bush administration plan to curb spending." Proposals released Wednesday "would reduce agriculture spending by $18 billion over the next five years." They "represent President Bush's vision of a new farm bill: a system of supports that would protect farm income and crop prices and keep food prices stable." The AP notes that anyone "making more than $200,000 in adjusted gross income would be cut off from farm payments under Bush's plan."

The New York Times says that "if approved by Congress, [the farm bill] would also reduce some trade-distorting payments that have gotten the United States into trouble with the World Trade Organization, and might put pressure on the European Union to reduce its own farm subsidies, steps that could restart stalled global trade talks." However, "aspects of the plan, especially the proposal to cut off payments to farmers earning more than $200,000 a year, are already rankling some farm groups." Mary Kay Thatcher, a lobbyist with the American Farm Bureau Federation, "said farmers would have 'serious concerns' about that provision." On the other hand, "the Agriculture Department was able to propose billions in increased spending on some programs because of expectations that prices for commodities like corn, soybeans and wheat would be much higher." For example, "The proposal would increase conservation financing…by $7.8 billion and direct almost $5 billion to …

'specialty' growers. … It would also provide $1.6 billion for research and development on cellulosic ethanol, which comes from agricultural waste and nonfood crops."

In an front page story, the Washington Post (2/1, Morgan, Gaul, 690K) reports, "The administration proposal addressed a number of problems raised last year in a nine-part series in The Washington Post." For example, "The plan would close a major loophole highlighted by The Post that in 2005 allowed corn farmers to receive $3.8 billion more than needed to ensure they got the government-guaranteed price." Farmers "would no longer be able to collect these 'loan deficiency payments' when prices are low and then sell later when prices rise." In reaction to the bill, Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) said "there were 'a number of good ideas' but also complained that the proposal shortchanged a key conservation program he had created as well as spending on biofuels."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, Hitt, 2.04M) adds that the proposed spending increases on conservation and direct income payments "are more acceptable than subsidies of specific crops under the World Trade Organization." The Journal notes that the "unveiling of the administration's new farm package came as WTO chief Pascal Lamy signaled that he intends to formally reconvene negotiations in the Doha Round." However, "US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said the Doha Round is not going to write the farm bill." She asserted that "the changes outlined yesterday should send 'a signal to our trading partners that we care about farm reforms.'" The Washington Times/AP (2/1) and The Hill (2/1, Swanson) also report on the Administration proposals.

House Committee To Probe Bush Signing Statements. The Politico (2/1) reports the House Judiciary Committee "has launched an investigation challenging repeated assertions by President Bush that he need not enforce aspects of laws he deems unconstitutional." Committee members "clashed over the validity of the investigation, which began with a committee hearing on Wednesday. Democrats said Bush is overstepping his executive role and meddling with the legislative process. Republicans maintained the president's assertions are merely guiding interpretations and follow long-term precedent." The investigation "will cover Bush's commentary on bills approved by both congressional chambers that require presidential approval."

McClatchy (2/1, Douglas) reports Bush "has issued 147 signing statements," according to Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee." Roll Call (2/1, Yachnin) notes House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers says his investigation "would include both Democratic and Republican staff and will focus on the approximately 150 signing statements issued by Bush, which the American Bar Association estimates have affected more than 1,100 provisions of federal law."

Bush Says He's Found Presidency An "Exhilarating, Joyous Experience." Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed President Bush yesterday. Asked if he was eager for the end of his term, Bush said, "No, not yet. I mean, I'm -- I have got two years to go, and I'm going to sprint to the finish. I have got too much on my mind to worry about, you know, standing in the polls or what life's going to be in 2009. I'm -- this may come as a shock to you, but I have found this to be an exhilarating, joyous experience. I love representing our country."

Hoyer Open To Negotiations On Social Security. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, who said, "All of us need to come to the table to solve Social Security without preconditions, without saying you either do this or that or you don't do this or that. I think we can get Social Security on a sound fiscal footing for the foreseeable future if we work together. … I have talked to Secretary Paulson, the secretary of the Treasury. He clearly is very focused on accomplishing that objective. And I have indicated that I am willing to work with and look forward to working with him." Asked if raising the Social Security threshold from $97,500 would be raising taxes, Hoyer said, "Is it taking more money from some people? It is. And in that sense, is it raising taxes? Yes, it is. Obviously, that level has been an arbitrary level over time. It's reflected the needs of the Social Security system, so that a number of people have suggested that is one solution, not to raise the tax level but to raise the income subject to the tax. … The issue is, is there a free lunch?"

Democrats Pass $463.5 Billion Spending Bill. USA Today (2/1, 5A, 2.27M) reports, "The House of Representatives passed a $463.5 billion spending bill Wednesday that covers about one-sixth of the federal budget. The vote was 286-140." The bill "would increase spending on education, veterans, health research and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies. The legislation would cut President Bush's budget requests for NASA, foreign aid and aid for communities affected by the latest round of military base closings. The measure heads to the Senate. Bush has signaled he will sign it."

The AP (2/1, Taylor) notes "a sizable chunk of Republicans joined virtually all Democrats in approving spending increases for education, veterans and the AIDS battle in Africa." The vote, "with 57 Republicans voting in favor -- was a pleasant surprise for Democrats who expected far less GOP support. … The winning vote would have been even higher had there not been such hard feelings over how Democrats powered the bill through the House: just an hour of debate time, no amendments allowed." Republicans also "said the measure was not entirely free of parochial 'earmarks,' saying powerful senators such as Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Pete Domenici, R-N.M., received special treatment for home-state projects." The White House "has signaled that President Bush would sign the bill despite cuts to his requests for NASA, foreign aid and communities affected by the latest round of military base closings."

In a similar report, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, Rogers, 2.04M) titles its story "House Democrats Show Strength In Passage Of Spending Measure," and calls the vote the "strongest showing yet of their new legislative muscle."

The Washington Post (2/1, A4, Kane, 690K) headlines its report "House Passes $463 Billion Spending Bill After Deleting Earmarks," and calls the measure "an austere plan stripped of billions of dollars worth of special-interest provisions."

The Washington Times (2/1, Miller, 88K), on the other hand, says Democrats "yesterday broke a pledge to strip pork spending from a massive funding resolution that contained about $500 million in what Republicans called questionable projects, including $44.6 million for a rainforest biosphere in Iowa and $50 million for the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. … Critics said Democrats rammed through the $463.5 billion spending package without a committee hearing, without a committee mark-up process and without accepting amendments on the House floor. 'It is unfortunate that we are going to see a return to the days when you have decisions about how money is appropriated made by bureaucrats and made in smoke-filled rooms,' said Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican. 'That's the kind of change [Americans] did not vote for when they went to the polls in November.'" The Times adds, "What's more, Republicans said, the legislation was fraught with accounting gimmicks to disguise higher spending. It actually increased spending, and therefore the budget deficit, by more than $6 billion from the last fiscal year, they said."

The Hill (2/1, Kucinich) notes "GOP members again took issue with the way the bill was pushed through the House, saying they had been 'shut out of the process.'"

House Panel To Examine Outside Ethics Enforcer. The AP (2/1, Abrams) reports House leaders "on Wednesday announced a task force to examine whether an outside panel should investigate ethics problems involving House members." Speaker Nancy Pelosi "said in a statement that she and the House Republican leader, Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, had agreed that the task force would report by May 1." Rep. Michael Capuano, D-Mass., "will lead the eight-member task force, which has four lawmakers from each party."

NYTimes Says House Democrats Resisting Bundling Disclosure. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Now that House Democrats are beyond the spotlight of their ballyhooed first 100 hours, there are signs of foot-dragging on the keystone of their promised lobbying reform: forcing disclosure of the huge sums in campaign donations that lobbyists package to grease privileged access in the Capitol. This practice — called bundling — has lobbyists mass hundreds of donations of a few thousand dollars each into special-interest piñatas of hundreds of thousands. Full disclosure of bundling is the sine qua non of lobbying reform. Speaker Nancy Pelosi cannot let the new House majority backslide."

Pelosi Seeks Routine Use Of Military Aircraft. The Washington Times (2/1, Scarborough, 88K) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi's office "is pressing the Bush administration for routine access to military aircraft for domestic flights, such as trips back to her San Francisco district, according to sources familiar with the discussions." The sources say Pelosi is "seeking regular military flights not only for herself and her staff, but also for relatives and for other members of the California delegation. A knowledgeable source called the request 'carte blanche for an aircraft any time.'" The Times adds Pelosi's "request is not new for a speaker, who is second-in-line in presidential succession. A defense source said the speaker's regular access to a military plane began after the September 11, 2001, attacks. Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who was speaker at the time, started using U.S. Air Force planes for domestic travel to and from his district for security reasons." But a former Hastert aide "said the congressman did not use military planes for political trips or regularly transport his family." Sources "said Mrs. Pelosi's request goes beyond what Mr. Hastert received."

Senate Republicans To Discuss Domestic Agenda. Roll Call (2/1, Billings) reports when GOP Senators "go behind closed doors Friday to plot a unifying strategy for the 110th Congress, they likely will sidestep the one issue occupying most Members' attention: the Iraq War." Instead, Senate Republicans "plan to focus on producing a domestic-heavy agenda, message and game plan for the next two years that positions them to reclaim the Senate majority in 2008. And even though their long-planned retreat lands right in the middle of a Senate debate over Iraq policy, GOP Senators and aides say they are optimistic they will find more togetherness than divisiveness." Republicans "believe that one reason they lost so handily in 2006 is because they lost sight of their defining party principles and didn't effectively lay out their vision to the electorate." Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) is "coordinating the session, which is set to include broad discussions of party principles such as fiscal discipline, national security and personal responsibility. Members also are expected to begin setting their two-year legislative goals on issues such as energy, health care, tax policy, immigration reform and judicial nominations."

GAO Adds Food Safety To List Of Flawed Federal Programs. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports the GAO "on Wednesday added food safety to its list of critically flawed federal programs, saying that splintered jurisdiction among 15 agencies has left the nation vulnerable to outbreaks of food-borne illness or, worse, a terrorist attack. Meanwhile, a senior administration official said President Bush would seek an increase of about $11 million for food safety in the fiscal 2008 budget he is scheduled to release Monday." The GAO said food safety was added to the list "because the system is out-of-date, often unscientific and lacks accountability." Lisa Shames, director of food and agriculture issues at GAO, called it "a collection of 15 agencies trying to administer some 30 laws," adding that the system "results in inefficient use of resources, inconsistent oversight, and overlap and duplication."

Sanchez Resigns From Hispanic Caucus. The Politico (2/1, Hearn) reports Rep. Loretta Sanchez "has quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, accusing the chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, of telling people she's a 'whore.' Baca denied the charge." Sanchez also "cited concerns about whether Baca was properly elected Hispanic Caucus chairman in November and about his general attitude toward female lawmakers. The caucus represents 21 Hispanic Democrats in Congress." Sanchez said, "I'm not going to be a part of the CHC as long as Mr. Baca illegally holds the chair … I told them no. There's a big rift here. You treat the women like shit. I have no use for him." The Politico ads Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC), and has chosen to air baseless statements. Let me be clear; her comments are categorically untrue."

Obama Introduces Election Fraud Bill. The Hill (2/1, Schor) reports Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) "added election fraud to the spectrum of weighty issues he has covered since informally launching his presidential bid, further fleshing out a legislative record that could be an inviting target in the intensifying 2008 campaign." Obama "sought to stay focused on his bill criminalizing voter suppression and deceptive electoral tactics, his third momentum-building effort in two weeks, even as the Republican National Committee drove a wedge through the Democratic field by circulating critical comments made by Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) about his fellow White House hopefuls." Obama's "voter-deception bill, which would allow injunctive relief for individuals targeted by fraudulent flyers and automated phone calls during the run-up to Election Day, earned plaudits from civil-rights groups and the co-sponsorship of Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Caucus's No. 3 and a backer of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in 2008."

Senators Oppose Closure OF FDA Labs. The Washington Post (2/1, A7, Lee, 690K) reports the Food and Drug Administration "should suspend plans to close as many as nine of 13 laboratories that test the safety and effectiveness of food, drugs, cosmetics and medical equipment, a bipartisan group of senators said this week." The network of labs, "run by the agency's Office of Regulatory Affairs, 'could prove particularly vital in rapidly responding to public health crises' during national emergencies, the lawmakers wrote Tuesday to FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach."

FEC Reports Show Lawmakers' Legal Fees. Roll Call (2/1, Murray) reports that as 2006 "came to a close, lawyers' bills continued to pile high for a half-dozen or more House Members widely named in ongoing criminal investigations." Year-end FEC reports "showed that at least five Members previously cited as subjects of investigations wrote checks or listed debts to firms with substantial criminal defense practices worth a combined total of more than $200,000 from Nov. 28 to Dec. 31." That's "in addition to ex-Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who received the FEC's blessing last week to use leftover campaign cash to fend off Justice Department scrutiny." The campaign of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), "who currently is under investigation by federal law enforcement for allegedly inappropriate contact with Congressional pages, paid the Washington, D.C.-based law firm of Zuckerman Spaeder nearly $50,000 in mid-December." Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), "who was banished from the ethics panel in 2006 amid a federal probe into earmarks he steered to his home state, doled out $70,000 during the reporting period to Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, an area law firm specializing in white-collar criminal defense. Mollohan reported that he owes the same firm another $20,000."

Insightful Question Lifted Senate Aide's Profile. The Politico (2/1, Lowe) reports Daniel J. Cox Jr. "doesn't look like a troublemaker, but the Senate Armed Services Committee aide knows how to stir things up." Cox, the committee's "principal staff member for Iraq issues…ignited a firestorm when he fed his boss a simple but profound question to ask Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army chief of staff, at a 2003 pre-Iraq war hearing." Levin asked, "General Shinseki, could you give us some idea as to the magnitude of the Army's force requirement for an occupation of Iraq following a successful completion of the war?" The Politico adds Shinseki's "candid answer -- that it would take "several hundred thousand soldiers" to pacify Iraq -- still reverberates. It became powerful ammunition for those who see the U.S. occupation as a tableau of preventable blunders. It stoked criticism that the Bush administration low-balled Iraq war needs. And, many believe, it eventually cost Shinseki his job, particularly since his assessment was so publicly dismissed by the Bush administration." The incident "marked a turning point in Cox's career, catapulting him into the center of one of the most controversial conflicts in U.S. history."

Senate Chaplain Backs Out Of Religious Conference. Roll Call (2/1, Stanton) reports Senate Chaplain Barry Black "informed Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) Wednesday that he was canceling a planned appearance at a religious conference set for next month after a left-leaning civil liberties organization urged him to pull out due to the organizer's controversial political and religious beliefs, a spokesman said Wednesday." Chaplain spokeswoman Meg Saunders said "Reclaim America originally invited Black to attend in the fall of 2005 and billed the conference as a generic religious meeting. Saunders explained that Black, who attends a number of conferences each year, agreed to participate because it would not conflict with the traditional nonpartisan, nonsectarian role of the Senate chaplain." But "following a review of the group's Web site Wednesday, Black determined it was, in fact, both a political and highly sectarian event and quickly informed the organization and Senate leaders that he was not attending." Founded "by Dr. D. James Kennedy, Reclaim America is an offshoot of Coral Ridge Ministries, one of the largest evangelical organizations in the United States."

GAO Takes HUD, USPS Off "High Risk" List. The Washington Post's (2/1, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that HUD and the USPS, two "ugly ducklings of the government -- programs so vulnerable to waste, fraud and mismanagement that they are dubbed 'high risk' by the" GAO, made news "[y]esterday, [when] the GAO announced that "[f]or the first time in 13 years, no HUD program appears on the GAO risk list, which David M. Walker, the head of the GAO, called a 'historic achievement.'" HUD "Secretary Alphonso Jackson said the announcement reflects the progress that HUD has made 'to ensure taxpayer dollars are spent wisely and well.'" The Post adds that during the 1980s, "HUD was buffeted by allegations of corruption and influence-peddling that often masked systemic problems," but the agency "worked through its problems, and, by 2001, had only two programs left on the GAO list -- single-family-housing mortgage insurance and rental-housing assistance." The GAO "put the Postal Service on the high-risk list in 2001 because of a bleak financial outlook that included cash-flow problems and heavy debt. But the post office has increased employee productivity while reducing staff -- and saved $5 billion since 2001, the GAO said."

NFIB President Makes Case For Senate's Minimum Wage Bill. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/1, 10A, 2.27M) Todd Stottlemyer, the president and CEO of the National Federation of Independent Business, the nation's leading small-business advocacy group, says small businesses "operate in a highly competitive, global marketplace and can ill-afford to raise prices on their customers by 40%," the proposed increase in the minimum wage, "and stay competitive." Knowing this, "members of the Senate Finance Committee worked together in true bipartisan fashion to craft a package of proven ways to lessen the impact of a minimum-wage increase on small businesses." Stottlemyer adds, "The Senate bill is fair. It is balanced. The full Senate should pass it, and the House should follow its example."

USA Today (2/1, 10A, 2.27M), disagrees, writing in an editorial, "Voters who thought Democrats were now the unchallenged masters of Capitol Hill got a quick reality check this week as the Senate lurched toward the end of a debate on the minimum wage." Today, the Senate "is expected to approve a hybrid bill that raises the minimum wage at last — but ties it to an $8.3 billion package of unnecessary tax cuts for small business." USA Today adds, "Eventually, the House and Senate will have to agree on a final bill. Democrats, along with the five Republican senators and 82 GOP representatives who voted for a clean wage increase -- should hold their ground."

White House Hopeful Budget Will Lead To Serious Negotiations. In his Washington Post column (2/1, A15), David Broder says, "This year, as I learned from conversations with two senior White House officials last week, the president hopes his budget will become a starting point for serious negotiation -- not a partisan football or simple laughingstock." That hope "was encouraged by a letter to the president last week from the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, Rep. Nancy Pelosi and Sen. Harry M. Reid, and the chairmen of the two budget committees, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. and Sen. Kent Conrad." The White House officials "with whom I met certainly pledged to make visible the costs of the war and to be specific about the trade-offs needed to maintain budget discipline, both in the short term and the long term. They said that the economic assumptions underlying the president's budget are modest -- if anything, an underestimate of the revenue likely to be produced by a growing economy. And the officials indicated that the president will recommend that, for a second year in a row, overall growth in discretionary domestic spending -- the part separate from Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security -- be held close to zero."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Set Rules For Stranded Plane Passengers. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Travelers and airlines have a deal. In exchange for transporting them safely, passengers agree to give up a great deal of freedom of movement." But "several high-profile failures this past holiday travel season suggest that Congress needs to intervene and set some ground rules to enforce this deal for people unreasonably stranded on aircraft. Delays at the gate are a hassle, but extraordinary delays on planes can be dangerous for the handicapped, chronically ill, elderly or small children."

Judge Adjourns Holocaust Settlement Hearing After Objections. The New York Times (2/1, Treaster) reports, "A federal judge abruptly adjourned a hearing yesterday on the settlement of a dispute over unpaid life insurance policies of Holocaust victims after a Miami lawyer and a survivor of a Nazi concentration camp raised objections." The Times continues, "Judge George B. Daniels of Federal District Court in Manhattan gave no explanation for ending the session that he had convened to determine the fairness of a settlement in which an Italian insurance company agreed to provide several million dollars to Holocaust victims. The company, Assicurazioni Generali, has repeatedly denied allegations that it systematically refused to pay billions of dollars in claims on insurance policies of Holocaust victims." The Times adds, "Lawyers for Generali and others who worked on the settlement said Judge Daniels called them into his chambers during a brief recess to express new concerns. They would not say what was discussed, but said he asked them to try to resolve the concerns over the next week. … One lawyer for the Holocaust survivors, Robert A. Swift, said Judge Daniels asked him and the others 'to renegotiate one provision in the settlement.' … Earlier, Sam J. Dubbin, a Miami lawyer opposing the settlement, had argued that it would prevent tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors from ever knowing whether they were owed money by Generali."

Schumer Sees Middle Class Economic Anxiety As Key Issue. The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports Sen. Charles E. Schumer "wants to transform a sleepy congressional committee into a high-profile platform for examining the troubles of" middle class families with the goal of coming up "with a cure for middle-class angst that will carry Democrats into the White House." Schumer is "betting that economic insecurity will replace the Iraq war as the most important issue in the 2008 elections." Schumer said, "The party that can create a model paradigm, a platform that can answer some of these questions, will not only win in 2008 but could create a long-term majority." The Post adds that as Schumer "convened his first hearing as chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, two House panels were also taking testimony on the travails of the middle class."

The Hill (2/1, Heil) reports Sen. Schumer "devotes much of his new book, 'Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time,' to an imaginary family, the Baileys. According to the tome, he runs every policy decision he makes by the average, middle-class, swing-voting family."

Biden's Entry In '08 Race Overshadowed By Furor Over Remarks. The AP (2/1, Fouhy) reports that Delaware Sen. Joe Biden (D) "spent his first day as an official presidential candidate regretting his description of Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama as 'clean,' and explaining why he had dissed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards." Biden, who "formally established his presidential committee Wednesday and launched a campaign Web site," was inundated "with questions from reporters in an afternoon conference call, and late in the day, issued a terse statement, saying: 'I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama.' In the weekly newspaper's article, published Wednesday, Biden harshly criticized Clinton and Edwards for their proposals to end the Iraq war. He also questioned the credentials of" Obama, "while calling him 'a mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean.'"

In a report titled "A Biden Problem: Foot in Mouth" on the website of ABC News (1/31), reporter Jake Tapper wrote, "Immediately the conservative media establishment -- Rush Limbaugh, the Drudge Report, bloggers -- publicly pounced." For instance, Limbaugh -- on his radio show -- said, "He is a clean African-American? If Biden thinks that Obama is clean then he has to think that others are not clean. Does he mean that he knows that Jesse Jackson is not clean? Does he mean that he knows that Reverend Sharpton is not clean?" Tapper noted, "But it wasn't just conservatives. 'When I heard his comments I thought Joe Biden was referring to a bygone era,' said Donna Brazile, the former campaign manager for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign and a prominent African-American political consultant. 'Years ago when white folks referred to black people with education they often used words like articulate. To suggest they were different, they were acceptable. That they were OK as compared to rest of African-Americans. So I think it came across that Joe Biden was referring to Sen. Obama as if he was a candidate running in the 1960s, not in the 21st century.'"

Meanwhile, ABC World News (1/31, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M), in a report by Tapper, related, "Obama refused to tell ABC News whether he thought Biden was complimenting him." Sen. Barrack Obama: "I'm not going to…" Tapper: "But in this candid moment, Obama told the senator he was not taking the remarks personally." Sen. Barack Obama: "He just said he didn't mean it." Jesse Jackson: "I know Joe Biden to be a decent man and a smart man. This foot in mouth disease was a mistake."

National political correspondent Gloria Borger reported on the CBS Evening News (1/31, story 6, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M), "This morning, the Senator used the Internet to introduce his presidential campaign the way he really wanted to. But tonight his campaign is doing damage control. But within hours, this audiotape of an interview he gave to the New York Observer talking about Barak Obama was all over the web." Sen. Biden: "You've got the first sort of mainstream African American who is articulate, and bright and clean and nice looking guy. I mean, that's a story book, isn't it?" Borger: "Some people listening to those descriptions of Obama -- 'articulate, clean' -- heard racial overtones. … Biden called Obama and apologized. He said he used the word clean as fresh and new."

The New York Sun (2/1, Gerstein) reports that African-American columnist and commentator Roland Martin said Biden's "description of Mr. Obama as 'articulate' could rankle many blacks. 'Of course, it's offensive,'" Martin, the executive editor of the Chicago Defender, said. He added, "I am sick and tired of individuals coming across an African-American and saying, 'Oh, my goodness, you're so articulate. … 'You never see that kind of statement made about white candidates.'" Martin, "who hosts a radio program, said he expects Mr. Biden to take some heat from black voters. 'I can guarantee you Biden is going to get lit up like Christmas,'" said Martin.

USA Today (2/1, Gaudiano, 2.27M) reports, "During a conference call with reporters, Biden said Obama is 'probably the most exciting candidate that the Democratic or Republican parties have produced' in a long time. His comments reflected his mother's expression: 'Clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack,' he said. He told reporters to call Obama and that Obama understood his meaning when he talked to him earlier. 'I really regret that some have taken totally out of context my use of the word 'clean,'' Biden said."

The New York Times (2/1, Nagourney, 1.16M) leads its coverage of the Biden brouhaha with this line, "In an era of meticulous political choreography, the staging of the kickoff for this presidential candidacy could hardly have gone worse." The Times notes, "Asked about Mr. Biden's comments, Mr. Obama said in an interview, 'I didn't take it personally and I don't think he intended to offend.'" Obama added, "But the way he constructed the statement was probably a little unfortunate." However, "later in the day, with Mr. Biden coming under fire from some black leaders, Mr. Obama issued a statement that approached a condemnation. 'I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate,' he said. 'African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate.'"

The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "Biden told reporters that he has long enjoyed the support of the African-American community in Delaware and did not intend to cause offense. He also said he did not believe that Sharpton, Jackson or other black leaders would misunderstand his remarks. … In an interview, Jackson called Biden 'a decent man' who had made a verbal gaffe while trying to slight the competition. 'He was saying in effect that Barack is more style than substance, that he is just coming onto the scene,' Jackson said. 'In doing so, he seemed to be dismissive of our 1988 campaign and diminishing Barack's potential campaign.'"

During an appearance last night on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" (1/31), host Jon Stewart asked Biden to comment on his quote from the Observer article in which Biden said of Obama, "I mean, you got the first mainstream African American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy. I mean, that's a storybook man." Biden: "Well, let me tell you something, I spoke to Barack today --" Stewart: "I bet you did!" Biden: "I also spoke to Jesse and Al Sharpton and -- and I also --" Stewart: "And Michael Jordan and anybody you could get your hands on! The Jackson Five. Who else?!" Biden went on to say "the word that got me in trouble is using the word 'clean.' I should have said fresh. What I meant is he's got new ideas."

Senator's Comments Said To Recall Past Gaffes. The Washington Post (2/1, A6, Balz, 690K), in an article titled "Biden Stumbles at the Starting Gate," reports, "With his remarks about Obama, Biden began his second campaign for the White House much as the first one ended, arguing that his public comments were being misinterpreted. He quit the 1988 campaign after being captured on videotape adopting the rhetoric and in some cases the life story of British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Neuman, 850K), noting that Biden withdrew from the '88 presidential race "amid accusations that he had plagiarized portions of speeches by a British politician," reports, "Asked Wednesday what he learned from the experience, Biden said: 'I took a real gut punch. I learned how to take it, and I got back up.'"

In a report on NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 3:45, Williams, 9.87M), senior White House correspondent David Gregory related, "Biden, who admits he has a tendency to bloviate, has made indelicate remarks before. Last year speaking about Indian Americans." Sen. Joseph Biden: "You cannot go to a Seven Eleven or Dunkin' Doughnuts unless you have an Indian accident." Gregory: "Biden's first presidential run 20 years ago was undone after evidence emerged that he plagiarized a speech from a British politician, Neil Kinnock."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Thomma, Talev) reports, "Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, dismissed Biden's comment -- and candidacy -- with a thinly veiled slap at his forced withdrawal from his last presidential campaign. 'I didn't even know he was a candidate, so I don't see how he could have hurt himself,' Rangel deadpanned. 'It probably was something someone else said and he picked it up and used it himself,' he said, adding with emphasis, 'by mistake.'"

The Washington Times (2/1, Bellantoni, 88K) relates that Biden "told the Observer interviewer that" Sen. Clinton's "plan for Iraq is 'a serious mistake.'" And that Biden "jabbed at former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina: 'I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about.'" The Times also points out that Biden "polls in the single digits, well below the Democratic front-runner, Mrs. Clinton, and her two top rivals, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards."

Bloomberg (2/1, Salant) notes, "A Gallup Organization poll last month showed Clinton leading among Democratic voters. She got support from 33 percent, followed by Obama with 20 percent and former Vice President Al Gore with 12 percent. Biden was favored by 3 percent."

The Politico (2/1) provides a link to Biden's presidential campaign website where the Senator's announcement speech can be viewed.

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/31), Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia Center for Politics said, "It's classic Joe Biden. It's really history repeating itself."

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/31), Democratic political strategist Donna Brazile said, "I know Joe Biden. I believe his intentions are good. He has a strong civil rights record. But it came across pretty damaging. His first, you know, major event, his announcement, and he stepped on his own story by criticizing Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Edwards, even making some weird remarks about, you know, Al Gore and John Kerry."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Jay Carney of Time said, "We all knew that this would happen to Joe Biden in his presidential campaign. It is a little shocking that it happened on the first day."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Anne Kornblut of the Washington Post said, "This is classic Joe Biden. … He tends toward the hyperbolic often in his speech, and he talks and talks and talks."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Tony Blankley of the Washington Times said, "If a conservative Republican had said this, I think the media would have jumped down his throat. The media is not jumping down Biden's throat. I think he's getting, more or less, a pass from the mainstream media on this. I think he should get a pass, but I think others should get a pass, too, when they stumble."

Rothenberg Says Hillary Clinton Could Win Presidency. In his Roll Call column (2/1), Stuart Rothenberg says Hillary Clinton can win the White House in 2008: "While some of my colleagues doubt that the New York Senator can overcome her high negative ratings and attract a majority of the electorate in her bid for the White House, I've come to the conclusion that she can, as long as she runs the high-quality campaign I think she can." Though not predicting Clinton would win the Democratic nomination, Rothenberg says, "I don't agree with those who have concluded that her negatives are so great that she cannot beat a strong Republican nominee next year."

Barnes Says Democratic Primary Field Forcing Hillary To Run Left. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/1, A17), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standards says, "Mrs. Clinton wants to run as a centrist, not a liberal, in the general election. But there's a problem. She is being tugged to the left in the nomination fight, forced to take positions that may jeopardize her chances later against the Republican candidate." Clinton's "opponents in the Democratic primaries next year don't have this problem. They are unabashed liberals who have done nothing to place themselves near the ideological center of American politics. Mrs. Clinton, however, spent her first term as senator from New York downplaying her image as a staunch liberal. Instead, she has sought with some success to fashion a reputation as a centrist on some several key issues, particularly national security."

Social Issues A Challenge For Giuliani In Seeking GOP Nomination. USA Today (2/1, 1A, Page, 2.27M) reports Rudy Giuliani "would seem to have all the credentials a candidate for president could want: A hero of 9/11, a crime-busting federal prosecutor, a two-term Republican mayor in an overwhelmingly Democratic city and one of the most admired politicians in the country. He's got a big problem, though. First, he has to be nominated by Republicans who don't yet know his views on social issues." The question "is this: Can the thrice-married New Yorker — a supporter of abortion rights, gay rights and gun control — win the nomination of a Republican Party that has become increasingly dependent on and influenced by conservative Christians?" GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said, "As a presidential candidate, Rudy Giuliani should absolutely be taken seriously. As a contender for the Republican nomination, he should be taken significantly less seriously. He has the stature to be president, but how does he get the Republican nomination? That is the fundamental disconnect."

Franken To Challenge Coleman. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/1, Hotakainen, 395K) reports, "Comedian and radio talk show host Al Franken has begun calling Democratic members of Congress and prominent DFLers to tell them he will definitely challenge Republican Sen. Norm Coleman in 2008, the Star Tribune learned Wednesday. On Monday, Franken announced that he is quitting his radio show on Feb. 14, and he told his audience that they'd be the first to know of his decision." But "Franken has been working the phones, telling his political friends he's ready to declare his candidacy."

The AP (2/1, Frommer) reports that "in a statement, Minnesota Republican Party Chairman Ron Carey said he was confident Minnesotans 'will reject Franken's divisive, scorched-earth attacks.' The state Democratic Party declined to comment."

Spitzer Outlines Plan To Reform New York Healthcare Industry. The New York Times (2/1, Hakim, 1.16M) reports that "among several ambitious proposals," New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer (D) "proposed to radically restructure aid to New York's sprawling health care industry in his first budget Wednesday, saying that the system props up failing hospitals and too often overlooks patients' needs, while consuming roughly a third of the state's budget." The Times continues, "To control health care spending, Mr. Spitzer would hold the growth of Medicaid to 1.7 percent, compared to 8 percent growth rates in recent years, by cutting subsidies to hospitals and nursing homes, slashing Medicaid reimbursement rates and by stepping up efforts to combat fraud. Conversely, he outlined a plan to make low-cost health insurance coverage available to the state's 400,000 uninsured children."

In a separate article, the New York Times (2/1, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports that the plan "contains the seeds of an epic battle — $1.2 billion a year in cuts — that could make everything else he wants harder to attain." The Times continues, "The proposed cuts, mostly in Medicaid, the health plan for the poor, pit the governor against the Legislature, health care workers and the hospital industry — powerful camps that welcome some of his ideas, but that fiercely protect their share of Medicaid spending."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) editorializes, "Unions, hospital advocates and politicians have already begun to raise the alarm" over Spitzer's healthcare proposals, "[b]ut the governor is right to fight for a fairer, more cost-effective distribution of public funds."

Union Seeks To Unionize Laborers In Wealthy Florida Enclave. The New York Times (2/1, Porter, 1.16M) reports after "successful campaigns last year to organize janitors and other maintenance workers at several universities in South Florida, the Service Employees International Union has set its sights on Fisher Island, one of the most concentrated pockets of wealth in the nation." Amid "mounting political attention to the substantial widening of the income gap over the last two decades, the service employees union hopes that Fisher Island — where a share in the golf club costs $250,000 and dues run to $20,000 a year while workers tending the grounds or washing linens can make as little as $8.50 an hour — will serve as a rallying cry for low-wage service workers across the nation." But the "union drive, which is just getting under way, might not play out as a straightforward battle pitting the haves against the have-nots. Some residents, of course, oppose the union's arrival. But others are already being courted by the union, which hopes that they will be moved to support it when confronted with the contrast between their affluence and the meager existence of many of their workers."

Mary Cheney Defends Pregnancy. The New York Times (2/1, Seelye, 1.16M) reports Mary Cheney, "the lesbian daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, today for the first time publicly defended her decision to become pregnant and asserted that same-sex couples are equally capable of raising children as heterosexual couples." Ms. Cheney said, "When Heather [Poe, her partner of 15 years] and I decided to have a baby, I knew it wasn't going to be the most popular decision. … This is a baby. This is a blessing from God. It is not a political statement. It is not a prop to be used in a debate, on either side of a political issue. It is my child."

Will Says School Choice Is Expanding. George Will writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/1, A15, 690K), "The public school lobby…lives in fear of competition -- the fear that if parents' choices are expanded, there will be a flight from public schools. But the tide is turning." He cites examples of tax credits for donations "to organizations that provide scholarships" for "children to attend private schools" in Arizona, a similar proposal by Newark, New Jersey Mayor Cory Booker and New York Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer's (D) plan to lift a state cap on charter schools. Finally, he praises New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) for a plan based on the idea "that public money should follow wherever students are attracted by competing schools."

Rice To Push For "Roadmap" Fast-Track At Quartet Meeting. AFP (2/1, Millikin) reports during a meeting of the so-called Quartet Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will "push a plan to fast-track" the "Roadmap" plan for Mideast peace. At Friday's meeting, Rice will also "press for renewed efforts to bolster" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "in his power struggle" with Hamas, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Friday's gathering of Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Germany Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon is "timed to precede a rare three-way meeting between Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in mid-February, though no firm date or venue for those discussions have been set," officials said.

Timing Of Meeting Questioned. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, LaFranchi, 59K) says Friday's meeting "comes at what would seem to be a particularly unpromising moment," with Palestinian factions "battl[ing] each other in Gaza, and Israel founders under a weak and scandal-torn government." Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, it writes, "would seem to be in the kind of position needed to make hard choices and painful compromises. And even before the Quartet meets, cracks are appearing in its position, with Russia calling for a lifting of the freeze on international aid to the Palestinian government."

Envoy Says Regional Crises Will Not Be Eased By Peace Deal. Meanwhile, in an interview with the Washington Times (2/1, A1, Sands, 88K), Israel's Ambassador in Washington, Sallai Meridor, said "foreign-policy crises in Iraq and Iran will not be eased by pressuring Israel to cut a peace deal with the Palestinians." The ambassador said Israel does not "see any connection between our dispute with the Palestinians and the level of violence on Haifa Street in Baghdad. And there is no linkage in my mind between the Israeli-Palestinian question and what Ahmadinejad is planning for the region and the world by pursuing a nuclear weapon." Meridor said "he saw the beginnings of a realignment in the Middle East, linking Israel and the United States with moderate Sunni Muslim Arab states fearful of the rising power of Shi'ite Iran. But he said it was too soon to tell whether an anti-Tehran coalition would form."

Hamas Criticizes US Aid To Abbas. AFP (2/1, El Oun) reports Hamas Wednesday "slammed a multi-million dollar US aid package to bolster security forces loyal to its rival Fatah." Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said, "There is no doubt that this is part of American policy aimed at provoking an escalation and a civil war in the service of a Zionist plan." Radwan alleged that "each time the American administration sees that we have arrived, or are on the verge of arriving, at an agreement, it sends Condoleezza Rice to poison the atmosphere or announces financial aid (to President Mahmud Abbas) to maintain tensions among Palestinians."

Former DOD Official To Prison For Selling Equipment To Mideast Buyers. The Washington Times (2/1, Seper, 88K) reports that "a former Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service (DRMS) official," Gayden C. Woodson, "was sentenced yesterday in U.S. District Court in Washington to 33 months in prison and $342,000 in restitution payments for illegally selling stolen surplus military equipment to Middle Eastern buyers." Woodson, who was in charge of disposal "by reuse, sale, transfer or donation -- of excess U.S. military property," was accused by prosecutors of having "willingly joined an ongoing conspiracy among DRMS personnel and local contractors and purchasers to sell surplus military equipment outside regular channels and pocket the proceeds."

Frazer Says Islamic Militants From Somalia Regrouping. In an interview with the Financial Times (2/1, Wallis), Assistant Secretary of State for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, said the US "believes militant Islamists from the ousted coalition that held sway over parts of southern Somalia may be regrouping in Saudi Arabia, Eritrea and also Yemen." Speaking to the Times in Addis Ababa, Frazer "said it was too early to tell who among the Islamist leadership had survived Ethiopia's invasion last month and subsequent US air strikes on alleged affiliates of al-Qaeda." But she was "very concerned" that extremist elements from among the defeated Islamists were "trying to reconstitute themselves either out of Saudi Arabia or Eritrea," and that international jihadist networks would see this as an opportunity. She said the US must "engage with the Saudi government and their services to try to prevent that from happening as well as engage regionally." She also described Eritrea, "with whom the US has deteriorating relations," as a "source of regional instability."

LATimes Says Africa Can Police Itself. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, 850K) writes, "When African leaders met this week in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, they fell short of their goal to get commitments for 8,000 troops for a peacekeeping mission in Somalia. But what has attracted less attention is that, for the first time, the rest of the world is counting on Africa to police itself -- and the continent is nearly in a position to do it." For example, the African Union's 7,000 peacekeepers in the Darfur, "though grossly undermanned and underfunded, represent the closest thing to security and justice that blighted land knows," the Times says. Going forward, the newspaper says "having AU peacekeepers as an option to stabilize a failed state such as Somalia is a boon to the international community, whose own peacekeepers, from NATO to the United Nations to the US military, are badly overstretched."

US Official Says Talks With Pyongyang Ready To Move Forward. The AP (2/1, Olesen) reports Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser, who concluded two days of talks Wednesday with North Korean officials, "said his agency's suspicions of illegal financial activity involving bank accounts linked to the communist nation were accurate." Glaser "said that he went over bank information of 50 account holders from the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia with his North Korean counterparts in Beijing," adding that US concerns that the bank was being used for money-laundering purposes had "been vindicated" by the discussions. Speaking with reports, Glaser said, "I think we are now in a position after a very lengthy investigation...to start moving forward and trying to bring some resolution to this matter," but did not elaborate.

Russia Warns North Korea Over Nuclear Tests. AFP (2/1, Smith) reports North Korea's nuclear weapons capability "threatens Russian interests," Moscow's chief negotiator at international talks with Pyongyang said Wednesday, "warning the country against carrying out another military test." Alexander Losyukov was quoted by Russia's Interfax news agency as saying, "Our interests are under threat. I think a very negative reaction would follow another test and that tougher measures would probably be taken." Analysts said Losyukov's statement "marked a hardening of the Russian position" on North Korea ahead of February 8 talks in Beijing.

Senate Express Impatience, Threaten Action On Chinese Currency. The Washington Post (2/1, D7, Goodman, 690K) reports, "Since becoming Treasury secretary last summer, Henry M. Paulson Jr. has pleaded for patience on the issue of China's currency." But on Capitol Hill yesterday, Paulson "learned that patience in Washington may be wearing thin" as several senators at a Senate Banking Committee hearing "sharply questioned the value of his talks, and threatened legislative action against China." Committee chairman Christopher Dodd (D-CT) warned, "The Congress is not going to wait and see how this is progressing when they watch 3 million manufacturing jobs leave this country. You are going to get blown by if we don't get a better handle on this." For his part, Paulson "offered assurances that he, too, is disappointed by China's slow movement."

The Washington Times/AP (2/1, Crutsinger) reports Paulson "insisted yesterday that new high-level talks with China offer the greatest chance of success in reducing the soaring US trade deficit," but notes that he "faced a skeptical Senate banking committee where both Democratic and Republican senators said they thought China would listen only if the country faced punitive economic sanctions."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, C7, Phillips, 2.04M) says Paulson was "grilled for more than two hours by skeptical senators, several of whom complained of the difficulty of explaining benefits of free trade to constituents who have seen their jobs move to China or elsewhere."

UK Arms Deal Charges Would Require Testimony Of Saudi Royals. In an interview with the Financial Times (2/1, Adams, Peel, Burns), UK Attorney General, Lord Peter Henry Goldsmith, said he "believed that senior Saudi royals, possibly even King Abdullah, would have been needed as essential witnesses had a corruption inquiry into the al-Yamamah arms deal led to charges against BAE Systems." However, he "judged it would have been unrealistic to expect the country's rulers to submit themselves to questioning. This, combined with uncertainty over whom to approach in Riyadh, posed 'insuperable' obstacles to a prosecution, he said." During the interview, Goldsmith "spelt out his belief that Saudi Arabia's 'particular constitutional position' was a key reason why" an inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE "was doomed to failure."

UK Concludes Poisoning Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Murphy, 850K) reports British police said Wednesday they have concluded their investigation into the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, "and handed the file to prosecutors for a decision on whether to file charges." Though authorities refused to disclose their findings, sources close to the family "said they believe the authorities are leaning toward suspects in Russia as the probable perpetrators." Prosecutors have said they will "review the results of the detectives' work and determine whether it is appropriate to file charges," but "said it would be impossible under Russian law to extradite them to Britain for trial."

Chavez Seen Moving Closer To "Dictatorship." The Washington Times/AP (2/1, Sanchez) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez was granted "free rein yesterday to accelerate changes in broad areas of society by presidential decree -- a move critics said propels Venezuela toward dictatorship." Lawmakers unanimously voted to give Chavez "sweeping powers to legislate by decree and impose his radical vision of a more egalitarian socialist state," which he said he "plans to use…over the next 18 months to transform broad areas of public life, from the economy and the oil industry in particular to 'social matters' and the very structure of the state."

Expert Urges US To Develop Global Social Agenda To Appeal To Poor. Francis Fukuyama, professor of international political economy at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/1, A17, 2.04M) op-ed that what "leaders like Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah and Venezuela's Hugo Chávez all have in common" is their "ability to promise, and to a certain extent deliver on, social policy -- things like education, health and other social services, particularly for the poor." Fukuyama says that "if the US wants to support liberal democracy around the world, it needs to start thinking seriously about a well-designed social agenda that will appeal to the poor," which he says are "desperately need help, and have often been ill-served by the interventions of well-intentioned outsiders."

Expert Urges Partition As Solution To Kosovo. Timothy William Waters, who helped prepare the indictment of Slobodan Milosevic for war crimes in Kosovo, writes in the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) that now "more than seven years after NATO ended Serbia's brutal dominion over" Kosovo, the international community "is about to impose a solution," which he says is "the wrong one." Waters says the likely plan "gives too little to Albanians and takes too much from Serbs. But there's an alternative, if only the international community would consider it: partition. Flexibility on borders could make a fully independent Kosovo easier to govern, provide more protection for minorities and make a negotiated deal attainable. Partition is possible, and possibly the right thing to do." Conceding that partition" isn't perfect," he says the current plan "will neither resolve Kosovo's uncertain status nor prevent an entire Balkan people from once again taking to the road."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ To Share NSA Surveillance Program Documents With Congress. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Serrano) reports, "A two-week standoff over documents in the White House domestic spying program came to an end Wednesday when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to turn over to Congress classified material about secret eavesdropping." The Times continues, "The Bush administration last month said it would put its surveillance of potential terrorist activities under supervision of a federal court but did not disclose details of the revised program. A key Senate panel, newly controlled by Democrats, demanded access to the records to gauge whether the administration was going too far or breaking any laws in tracking terrorism suspects. … The decision to share information with Congress was the latest concession by the Bush administration, which had argued that it had the right to conduct its 'war on terror' as it deemed necessary and that secrecy was vital to national security."

The AP (2/1, Jordan) reports, "Investigators' applications, legal briefs and orders issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court are now open to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House and Senate intelligence committees, Gonzales said." The AP continues, "Two weeks ago, the Senate Judiciary Committee — led by Democratic Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — criticized the attorney general for refusing to answer specific questions about the secret court's new oversight of the controversial program. … 'We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country,' Gonzales told reporters Wednesday. 'But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs.' … The documents would not be released publicly, the attorney general said. 'We're talking about highly classified documents about highly classified activities of the United States government.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A2, Eggen) reports, "Under yesterday's accord…more than three dozen lawmakers will have access to the secret court orders governing the spying program that were issued Jan. 10 and the applications from the Justice Department that preceded them. The lawmakers include the House and Senate leaders, the members of the two intelligence panels and the heads of the two judiciary committees, officials said." The Post continues, "Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the documents would help determine 'what further oversight or legislative action is necessary. … Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances,' Leahy said. … Gonzales -- in remarks to reporters during an unrelated event announcing the formation of a human-trafficking unit at Justice -- played down any conflict with lawmakers. He said: 'It's never been the case where we've said we would never provide access.'"

The New York Times (2/1, Mazzetti) reports, "Last week, Representative Silvestre Reyes, the Texas Democrat who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, joined other committee members in threatening to subpoena documents related to the program. … Those threats prompted negotiations over the weekend between staff members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and Steven G. Bradbury, who leads the Office of Legal Counsel in the Justice Department." The Times adds, "A central question is whether the court will approve requests case by case or issue broad orders giving the government wide leeway to choose targets."

The Washington Times (2/1, Seper) reports, "The surveillance program, begun in 2001 after the September 11 attacks, gave law-enforcement authorities the ability to monitor telephone calls and e-mails to and from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. … The Bush administration vigorously defended the legality of the program, saying it would be impossible to obtain warrants in time to intercept phone calls of those suspected of belonging to al Qaeda. … The Justice Department has said the program is 'essential' in the war on terrorism, adding that it 'ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack.'"

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Gordon) reports, "The material was delivered to members of the House and Senate intelligence committees late in the day, congressional aides said. … The documents also will be made available to Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, both of whom have asked to review the new arrangement." McClatchy adds, "Leahy, Specter and members of the intelligence committees have voiced concern that the eavesdropping on some Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails may have violated their constitutional rights. Leahy and Specter praised President Bush for granting their requests to review details of the latest arrangement. … 'The president has made the right decision in changing his previous course of unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program, to now following the law by seeking court approval for these wiretaps,' Leahy said. … But he said he would 'have to look at the court's order to determine whether the administration has reached that proper balance to protect Americans while following the law.' … Specter called the move 'a significant step forward' but said he would reserve judgment until he had reviewed the documents."

6th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In NSA Surveillance Challenge. The New York Times (2/1, Liptak) reports from Cincinnati, "Three federal judges hearing the first appellate argument about the legality of a National Security Agency domestic surveillance program on Wednesday indicated that they were not that convinced the issue was moot now that the Bush administration had agreed to submit the program to a secret court." The Times continues, "In a series of sharply worded questions to an administration lawyer defending the program, the judges noted that the administration did not promise to continue working with the secret court in the future. … Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre acknowledged the possibility. … But the judges pressed Mr. Garre's adversary, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union, just as hard on a different point -- whether her clients had suffered injuries direct and concrete enough to give them standing to sue. … Ms. Beeson said the plaintiffs, who include lawyers and journalists, have had to change the way they communicate with clients and sources in the Middle East because they feared that their discussions would not be confidential. … But Judge (Julia S.) Gibbons and Judge Alice M. Batchelder seemed skeptical about whether that sort of general and speculative fear was sufficient. … The government has refused to say whether it eavesdropped on the plaintiffs." The Times notes, "The A.C.L.U. brought suit last year after an article in The New York Times disclosed the existence of the program, which monitors the international communications of people in the United States without court approval. … In August, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court in Detroit ordered the program shut down. The decision has been stayed during the appeal to the Sixth Circuit."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Weinstein) reports, "Garre said that when Congress authorized the use of military force after the Sept. 11 attacks, it clearly contemplated that the president would have the authority to conduct counterintelligence surveillance of the type used in the program. Garre said it would be unprecedented for a U.S. court to say that a president did not have such power." The Times continues, "Beeson said that the administration's post-Sept. 11 surveillance program clearly violated FISA, which requires a warrant to be issued before surveillance is conducted. … She told the judges that if they accepted Garre's argument, it would, in effect, mean that the FISA law had been overridden without Congress saying that it wished to do so. 'To rule for the government' in this case would mean 'the president has unbridled power,' Beeson told the judges. … 'Congress did its part,' by passing the FISA statute, Beeson said. Now, after the government acted in 'direct violation' of FISA for more than four years, she said, 'it is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil.'"

AFP (2/1) reports, "Government lawyers argued that the case is moot because the president has agreed to court supervision. … The judges, however, suggested a constitutional issue remains, since Bush has said he could resume the program without court oversight in the future. … 'You could opt out at any time, couldn't you?' asked Judge Ronald Lee Gilman. … 'That's absolutely true,' said Gregory Garre, a deputy solicitor general." AFP adds, "Critics said that's why the 6th Circuit must declare Bush's original program unconstitutional. … 'A failure to decide this case would leave it up to the president to decide whether or when to follow the law,' said Ann Beeson, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, which sued last year to halt the program."

US Probing Equity Firm With Links To Islamic Investors. The Washington Post (2/1, D3, Cho) reports, "The counterterrorism division of the Justice Department is investigating whether a private equity firm in Boston that manages hundreds of millions of dollars for Muslim investors overseas violated tax laws." The Post continues, "The investigation of Overland Capital Group was disclosed in a filing with U.S. District Court in Boston and reported by the Wall Street Journal yesterday. … The filing claims that Overland and a subsidiary of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust (DMI), a financial group in Geneva, conducted acts 'that implicate potential violation of the Internal Revenue Code.' The filing does not mention terrorism, though it was submitted by a U.S. attorney who works in counterterrorism." The Post adds, "Subsidiaries of DMI, an umbrella organization for Islamic financial institutions, have been named as suspects in probes by U.S. counterterrorism agencies. DMI also is a defendant in a civil lawsuit brought by families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who claim that it funded al-Qaeda. DMI has denied those claims and noted that none of its officials has been charged with terrorism-related crimes." The Post notes, "The filing came to light through litigation between Overland and a former employee, Laird A. Fairchild, who claimed that he was wrongfully dismissed. Fairchild cooperated with federal investigators after his termination, an act that Overland said violated his confidentiality agreements with the company. … Geoffrey Harper, Fairchild's attorney, said yesterday that U.S. attorneys went to 'elaborate lengths' to make sure that Fairchild would not reveal what he told government investigators. He said the Justice Department has concerns beyond the tax practices of Overland and DMI."

The Boston Globe (2/1, Pfeiffer, Bailey) reports, "The chief executive of a Boston private equity firm under federal investigation for its connection to groups that allegedly finance Islamic extremists denied yesterday that his company is linked to terrorism. … 'We do everything appropriately and by the book, and we adhere not just to the letter of the law but to the spirit of the law,' said James M. Godec of Overland Capital Group. 'I am extraordinarily cautious about this kind of stuff.'" The Globe continues, "The Justice Department lawyer named in the filing, Corey J. Smith, works in the terrorism financing unit of the department's criminal division; since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorism attacks, prosecutors have increasingly used tax laws to bring terrorism cases against wealthy Middle Easterners suspected of funneling money to terrorist groups. The investigation was disclosed in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment. … 'By policy, we never confirm or deny whether or not there's an investigation into an entity or a person,' said the spokesman, Dean Boyd."

Judge Puts Guantanamo Detainee Suits On Hold. The AP (2/1) reports, "Sixteen lawsuits by Guantanamo Bay detainees were put on hold Wednesday by a federal judge who said he may no longer have jurisdiction to hear their cases." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton in Washington said the Military Commissions Act, signed into law in October, has left him unable to consider whether the detainees can challenge being held at the Navy facility in Cuba." The AP adds, "An appeals court in Washington is considering whether civilian jurists can rule on those cases. Until that issue is resolved, Walton said, 'it is this court's view that it lacks the authority to take any action in these cases.' … Walton's six-page order denying the motions challenging detention of the 16 men left open the possibility of refiling the requests if the appeals court decides civilian courts can review detainee cases. … The Justice Department welcomed the ruling, said spokesman Erik Ablin. He called the military tribunals, which can be appealed, 'more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts.'"

Germany Issues Warrants For 13 CIA Operatives In Abduction Case. On its front page, the New York Times (2/1, A1, Landler, 1.16M) reports under the headline "German Court Challenges CIA Over Abduction," that a German court Wednesday issued an arrest warrant for 13 people in the mistaken kidnapping and jailing of a German citizen of Lebanese descent, "in the most serious legal challenge yet to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret transfers of terrorism suspects." Prosecutors in Munich said the suspects, whom they did not identify, were part of a CIA "abduction team" that seized the man, Khaled el-Masri, in Macedonia in late 2003 and flew him to Afghanistan. German prosecutor August Stern "said investigators would seek to establish the true identities of the 13 people, most of whom are believed to use aliases." The Justice Department has "declined to help the German prosecutors in their investigation," which the Times says "has made the Germans dependent on information from other sources, including journalists."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Whitlock, 690K) adds, "European law enforcement authorities acknowledged that it is highly unlikely that any CIA officers -- most of whom work undercover, using false identities -- would be apprehended or extradited from the United States." But the arrest warrants "mark yet another case in which CIA activities in Europe…have strained diplomatic ties and underscored deep differences between the United States and its transatlantic allies over how to fight terrorism." Similarly, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Fleishman, 850K) says the case, "at times, has agitated the improving relationship between Berlin and Washington."

The Washington Times/AP (2/1, A1, Rising) also reports on the case.

UK Police Arrest Nine In Alleged Terror Murder Plot. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 4, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Nine men are in British custody tonight after police disrupted a terrorist plot there they say in a series of pre-dawn raids. The suspects were arrested in Birmingham in a plot that is the first of its kind in Britain which is raising questions about terror tactics and strategy." NBC (Miller) added, "The plan? Kidnap a British soldier and post his beheading on the Internet. … Scotland Yard said the six-month investigation is ongoing. … The alleged target of the kidnapping was a Muslim British soldier in his 20's, on leave from duty in Afghanistan." ABC World News (1/31, story 2, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the plot "could have come straight from the streets of Baghdad, rather than the streets of Birmingham." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city and home to a large Muslim minority, has been scenes of terror raids before. Many were skeptical of today's allegations. When I asked these young Muslims if they doubted the plot, every one said yes. … But the head of a nearby mosque told us, there's a wide generation gap among Muslims here. Older residents more supportive of the police and today's raids."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, lead story, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "Reports in Britain say it was all an attempt to blackmail Prime Minister Tony Blair to pull British troops out of Iraq." CBS (Phillips) added that the plotters were "apparently inspired by the capture and execution of Westerners in Iraq, widely publicized on the Internet. … Police have made high profile arrests of Muslims suspected of ambitious terror plots before, only to have the let the suspects go when the intelligence proved wrong. If they can't make this one stick, they risk further alienating an already suspicious community." USA Today (2/1, 8A, Stinson,

2.27M) reports, "Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism analyst at the Swedish National Defense College, said a plot like that described by British news outlets would signal that terrorists are trying new methods to spread fear in Europe. … Terrorists, familiar with tactics used by insurgents in Iraq, can be expected to export whatever method they can to induce shock and spread fear, Ranstorp said. 'The critical issue is: Are we ahead of the terrorists' innovations?'"

The Financial Times (2/1, Guthrie, Burns) reports, "On Wednesday night a senior government official said he was taking seriously a plot he believed underlined the extent to which radicalised British-born Muslims were committed to a terrorist war against the west. The official said the alleged plot suggested a direct challenge to the British army's policy of encouraging the recruitment of Muslims as a way of integrating them into society and countering the negative publicity regarding the army's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan." The AP (2/1, Harris) called it "a major kidnapping plot" and also notes that it "raised fears that a new type of terrorism has reached Britain, one which uses individual victims to send a message through kidnappings and publicized beheadings." The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Rice-Oxley, 59K) also reports that "experts said this plot's new tactic, if confirmed, would amount to a significant departure in strategy," and the "experts said that it was important to establish whether the kidnapping plot, if confirmed, was a one-off action or a new tactic."

The Washington Post (2/1, Jordan, Sullivan, 690K) reports, "David Shaw, a top police official, said the arrests were the 'culmination of many months of activities' and 'a very, very major investigation' that is 'by no means finished.'" However, "Many Muslims who gathered at police lines said they viewed the raids as unfairly targeting their community and probably based on false intelligence. 'We feel like we are under siege,' said Allah Ditta," a Birmingham businessman. "Ditta said that he had already felt a backlash from the police operation when several men drove past him in a van and swore at him simply because he was dressed as a Muslim." The New York Times (2/1, Cowell, 1.16M) similarly reports on the arrests.

Plot Fuels British Debate About Home-Grown Terrorism. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 2, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported that this "kind of home-grown terror…has led to soul searching in Britain. Why would people there want to attack their own country?" CBS (Palmer) added that "Britain's Secret Service says it has at least 30 active terrorist plots and 1,600 suspects under surveillance. Many British Muslims believe that's an overreaction. … But even though whose think anti-terrorism operations unfairly target Muslims have to admit there's a persistent problem. … Unless Britain can find a way somehow of winning the allegiance of these angry young men, the country faces what one American security expert called an era of 'YouTube terrorism.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Sets Aside $25 Million For Ground Zero First Responders Health Care. ABC World News (1/31, story 7, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A breakthrough was announced today, in the long struggle to convince President Bush to help the so-called forgotten victims of 9/11. … For the first time, Mr. Bush has set aside money in his budget to help" the first responders who worked at Ground Zero during recovery operations. "$25 million for health care." ABC (Muir) added, "They've been fighting for health care for five years now." Rep. Carolyn Malone was shown saying, "It has taken five, long years and many visible deaths for them to move forward and make this commitment."

The AP (1/31) reported that Ceasar Borja Jr., whose father, Cesar Borja was a police officer who worked at Ground Zero after 9/11 and "died at 52 while awaiting a lung transplant," met "with President Bush on Wednesday to urge expanded health services for those who are still sick." Borja "said he told the president that the funding should be expanded not just for 'the heroes and heroines" who risked their lives to save victims under the twin towers, but also for men, women and children exposed to toxins because they lived or worked in the area."

Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed Bush yesterday. Asked about his planned meeting with Borja, he said, "I'm going to thank Cesar and his family for raising an important issue. And, at the same time, I will tell Cesar his dad's a hero. And I truly believe those who rushed into harm's way were heroes. And they ought to be honored. And I also believe that they ought not to go without health care. If they were on that pile, and if they were first-responders, they need to get help. And one of the things that our -- Cesar will be briefed on is, you know, in the line-item in our budget, we have got Federal money to help make sure that people don't go without health care that -- that were on the pile."

Travel Industry Group Proposes Trusted Traveler Program. USA Today (2/1, 4B, De Lollis, 2.27M) reports the Discover America Partnership "asked Congress on Wednesday to launch a special trusted traveler program for international visitors," saying that "it would help stem the USA's diminishing appeal to travelers from abroad," which "cost about $43 billion in visitor spending in 2005 alone." Speaking at a hearing of the Senate trade and tourism subcommittee, the group "asked the government to spend $300 million to finance its proposals, which include stepped-up tourism marketing and faster customs processing."

The Washington Times (2/1, Haberkorn, 88K) continues, "Other DAP proposals included evaluating U.S. Customs officers on their friendliness, greeting foreign travelers by saying 'Welcome to America' and offering foreign visitors customer-service evaluations to fill out when they leave the United States -- proposals aimed at improving America's image abroad." Committee chairman Sen. Byron L. Dorgan said at the hearing "that he would like to 'find some sort of way' to introduce a bill based on the proposal. Committee Co-chairmen Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, and Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, also said they supported drafting a bill to boost international tourism."

"Suspicious Devices" Shut Down Parts Of Boston. A bomb scare in Boston Wednesday, prompted by a number of "suspicious devices" that turned out to be lighted signs for a cartoon show's ad campaign, drew heavy media attention yesterday and in this morning's major dailies. ABC World News (1/31, lead story, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) call it "a measure of just how jittery, how on-edge this country still is," adding that it was "a good object lesson that when suspicious packages are found, people do react." ABC (Harris) added, "It started this morning when a passenger on a city bus saw a suspicious device attached to a support beam for a highway ramp. The police shut down the roads and the subways in the immediate area and sent in the bomb squad." The discovery of eight more devices around the city "paralyzed traffic." Harris: "But after a day of chaos and concern, the authorities learned that the devices posed no threat to public safety. They were lighted signs with cartoon characters on them."

NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Cable news viewers in this country were treated to hours of live coverage this afternoon as suspicious packages were discovered all over Boston. Roads were closed, the Charles River was closed and questions were asked about terrorism." However, the devices "turned out to be this thing," added NBC (P. Williams) as a picture of one of the signs was shown on screen: "Outdoor lighted signs to promote a movie coming out in May based on a series on the Cartoon Network called Aqua Teen Hunger Force."

An AP (1/31, Maguire) article appearing on hundreds of news websites reported, "Peter Berdovsky, 27, of Arlington, and Sean Stevens, 28, of Charlestown, were each arrested Wednesday night on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said. In a news release announcing Stevens' arrest, she said the men worked together to place the devices. At an earlier news conference she said Berdovsky had been hired to place the devices."

The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Powell, 690K) reports, "A train passenger spied the first magnetic object, which looked like circuit boards with protruding wires, attached to a girder under Interstate 93 in the Charlestown neighborhood of Boston. A police bomb squad responded and blew up the device, leading to the shutdown of a railway station and the highway. For a while, the Coast Guard blocked off a section of the Charles River. 'I am deeply dismayed to learn that many of the devices are a part of a marketing campaign by Turner Broadcasting,' Massachusetts Gov. Deval L. Patrick said in a statement, vowing to consult with Coakley." The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 3, :35, Couric, 7.66M) reported Cartoon Network's "parent company, Turner Broadcasting, apologized for the mix up and it turns out these same electronic advertising devices have been placed in nine other cities around the country without incident."

USA Today (2/1, 3A, Hall, 2.27M) quotes Patrick as saying, "It's a hoax — and it's not funny." USA Today adds, "Most Boston-area residents weren't fazed." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke "said officials closely monitored the day's investigation. 'Whether it was intentional or not, the reality is these types of incidents put an enormous burden on law enforcement and counter-terrorism resources, and there's absolutely no room for that in a post-9/11 world,' Knocke said."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B2, Levitz, 2.04M) reports the scare brought much of the city "to a jittery halt yesterday. … Major arteries were closed. Commuters were booted off subways, river traffic was halted, and bomb squads combed the streets." The Journal also notes, "Turner hired a third-party marketing firm, Interference, to place the devices. The New York firm says on its Web site that it specializes in alternative and 'guerilla' marketing. Representatives of the company couldn't be reached for comment." Mayor Thomas M. Menino "said in a statement that it is 'outrageous, in a post 9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme.'"

WPost Sees Better Options For Nuclear Plant Safety Than Building "Beamhenges." In an editorial the Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) suggest that Americans' "understandable preoccupation with securing sensitive sites" gave appeal to "the petition an advocacy group filed with the" NRC that asks them "to require plant operators to build protective 'beamhenges'" around "their power stations." The NRC commissioners' rejection of the request, is "a controversial decision. After all, without physical barriers to thwart airborne attacks, couldn't a hijacked plane smashing into a nuclear plant produce a widespread catastrophe? That's not likely, says commission member Jeffrey S. Merrifield." The Post summarizes the findings of an NRC study that concluded the chances of such an attack causing a radiological disaster are extremely low "because of the strength of the containment domes" and adds that while its "difficult to fully trust the NRC's calculations as long as the study it touts remains classified," regulators "and others concerned about plant safety should focus on measures" such as "ensuring that nuclear power stations are well defended from land attack and that storage units for spent nuclear fuel are robust."

WAR NEWS:

Warner, Levin Join Forces On Anti-Surge Resolution. The AP (2/1, Flaherty) reports, "Two senators, a Republican and a Democrat, leading separate efforts to put Congress on record against President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq joined forces Wednesday, agreeing on a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the plan and potentially embarrass the White House." Republican Sen. John Warner and Democrat Carl Levin "had been sponsoring competing measures opposing Bush's strategy of sending 21,500 more US troops to the war zone, with Warner's less harshly worded version attracting more Republican interest. The new resolution would vow to protect funding for troops while keeping Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the buildup." Levin "replaced Warner as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when the Democrats took control of the Senate in January. Their resolution could well gain more support from members of both parties than their separate versions had been attracting. It lacks Levin's language saying the troop increase is against the national interest, and it drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he wants to begin debate Monday on the new measure, bypassing committee review." The resolution "is likely to pose a threat to the White House because of its potential appeal to Republicans who have grown tired of the nearly four-year war and want a chance to express their concerns. The White House has been hoping to avoid an overwhelming congressional vote criticizing Bush's handling of the war."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, A1, Levey, 850K), in a story titled "Senate Closer To Rebuke For Troop Increase," reports Reid "said there was 'near unanimity' among Democrats" on backing the new measure, and "acknowledged that an alternative resolution sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.)…could not garner the GOP support to reach the 60 votes needed to overcome a promised Republican filibuster."

The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports, "The resolution does not include the Democratic language saying the Bush plan is against the national interest, but it also drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops." White House spokeswoman Dana Perino responded to the announcement of the Senate deal saying, "The president wants to win in Iraq -- he's proposed a comprehensive plan to do so, and he's asked Congress to give the plan a chance to work. … These resolutions send mixed signals to our troops and our enemy.'" House Democratic leaders have also ordered "committees to draft a resolution next week patterned on Warner's language. But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went further, publicly hinting she will push binding legislation that would begin bringing US troops home from Iraq."

The New York Times (2/1, Hulse, 1.16M) says Warner, "a lawmaker often admired for his demeanor and experience, has long wielded influence on military policy given his own years at the Pentagon and his tenure as the Republican chairman of the Armed Services Committee." But on this issue, Warner has "attracted unusually tough criticism from fellow Republicans who have suggested that he -- a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary -- is undercutting Mr. Bush, the new military command being installed in Iraq and the troops themselves." The Times adds, "It is a time of transition for Mr. Warner in the Senate. Not only are Republicans now in the minority, but he also lost the top Republican slot on the Armed Services Committee to John McCain of Arizona because of term limits and was not successful in efforts to win the top party seat on another panel. In addition, his fellow Republican, George Allen, lost his reelection bid in Virginia to a Democrat, Senator Jim Webb." Therefore, "while Mr. Warner fights to stay relevant in the Iraq debate, he has fewer tools at his disposal even as he considers whether to run for re-election next year."

The Politico (2/1, Bresnahan) says "House and Senate Republicans with reservations about…Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 are complaining of harsh criticism from their GOP colleagues. This intra-party squabbling, in some cases, has seen Republicans accusing fellow Republicans of undercutting the American effort in Iraq, a charge previously reserved for Democrats." These lawmakers, "several of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution from party leaders or the White House, are stunned by the hostility expressed by fellow Republicans. They are particularly concerned that anyone who raises questions or challenges the Bush plan will be branded a defeatist who wants to see America lose the war. … One GOP lawmaker, who declined to be named, said it is 'starting to get really ugly' among Republicans when they try to talk about Iraq and the wisdom of the new Bush policy."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), host Chris Matthews interviewed Sen. Gordon Smith, who said, "My own sense is that you will have at least a majority for the Warner resolution. I'm for it. I'm a co-sponsor of it. It's, I think, respectful. It clearly opposes the surge but it does it in a way that also lays out the things we would like to see the President and the Administration, our military doing in Iraq, in a way that doesn't needlessly put our troops in harm's way, and protects America's larger interests in the war on terror."

McCain Disavows Statement Criticizing Bush. The AP (2/1) reports McCain "backed away Wednesday from a statement issued on his behalf criticizing the Bush administration for not putting more pressure on the Iraqi government to secure its country." A statement "attributed" to McCain and Levin "and quoted Tuesday by The Associated Press said, 'America supplying more troops while Iraqi leaders simply supply more promises is not a recipe for success in Iraq.' The statement was issued by the office of Levin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee." McCain spokeswoman Eileen McMenamin and Levin spokeswoman Tara Andringa "said Wednesday that the statement had been erroneously signed off on by a staffer who works for McCain on the Armed Services Committee." The AP adds, "It is unusual for a senator to pull back a statement issued on his behalf. McMenamin said McCain had not seen the statement and did not endorse it."

DeMint Derides "Resolution Of Defeat And Disgrace." The Washington Times (2/1, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Republicans yesterday said those in Congress who have turned against the war in Iraq are forsaking the troops on the ground and are ensuring defeat with a resolution condemning…Bush's plan to send in reinforcements. 'This resolution is a resolution of defeat and disgrace,' said Sen. Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican who, as a member of the House, voted in 2002 for the war." GOP Sen. John Cornyn said yesterday, "If we don't support the mission, we shouldn't be passing nonbinding resolutions. We should be doing everything in our power to stop it."

Bush Not Surprised By Congressional Dissent. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed President Bush yesterday. Asked if he felt his partisans in Congress had abandoned him in a time of difficulty, Bush said, "I don't feel abandoned. And that's -- I mean, what do you expect? When times are good, you know, there's millions of authors of the plan. When times are bad, there's one author. And that would be me."

Asked about Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell's statement that the Iraqis have only six to nine months to succeed in righting their country, Bush said, "Well, I think it's a mistake to put timetables on difficult missions, because an enemy can adjust. On the other hand, I certainly understand the urgency and -- in Mitch's voice. I also understand the skepticism on Capitol Hill. … What ultimately is going to matter is whether or not the plan works on the ground. … Prime Minister Maliki has made some pledges to me personally. He's beginning to fulfill some of those pledges." Asked if he trusted Malaki, Bush said, "What matters is whether or not he performs. And trust is earned by doing what you say you're going to do."

House Democratic Measure Would Pay Reparations To Iraqis. The Hill (2/1, Kaplan), meanwhile, reports Democratic Rep. Barbara Lee of California, "co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, is vowing to use the appropriations process to force lawmakers to vote on separate parts of a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of US soldiers from Iraq. The resolution would pay Iraqis reparations of up to $10,000 for damages caused by the war if they made claims; ban American firms from pumping oil in Iraq; cut off funds to build long-term bases in Iraq; pay for the destruction of landmines; and create a House-Senate select committee to study the origins of the war in Iraq." Lee and Rep. Lynn Woolsey, "the other co-chair of the House Democratic Progressive Caucus, introduced H.R. 508, and they have signed up 28 co-sponsors. Woolsey says she plans to meet next week with House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) to ensure the resolution is considered in committee."

Kissinger, Albright Call For Diplomatic Push To Accompany Surge. The AP (2/1, Schweid) reports, "Former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright urged President Bush on Wednesday to go beyond a planned buildup of U.S. forces in Iraq to develop a comprehensive strategy for the area." They "called for wide-ranging talks with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased autonomy for clashing Iraqi groups. The administration has brushed aside the proposal to engage Syria and Iran." Kissinger "said the planned buildup of 21,500 U.S. troops appears to be 'the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required by the evolving situation.'" Albright "said she might have backed Bush's buildup in Iraq if it 'had been tied to a clear and achievable mission, and if we were guaranteed our troops would have the best training and equipment.'" She added, "I think we need a surge in diplomacy."

Dana Milbank, in the Washington Post (2/1, A2, 690K), writes that "like James Baker, who went before the committee Tuesday, Kissinger was inclined to defend Bush's Iraq policy. But Bush had left the two men, both former Republican secretaries of state, with little ammunition." The Administration "rejected the core recommendation from Kissinger and from Baker's Iraq Study Group: a massive diplomatic offensive involving Syria and Iran. And yet, neither man was prepared to turn against the White House." Baker, testifying on Tuesday, "acted as if Bush had, in fact, supported his ideas." And Kissinger, "the master of nuanced phrases such as 'not incompatible,' provided few such broad pronouncements yesterday. Indeed, he pronounced very little in his low, German-accented rumble."

Bush Presidency Said To Have "Jumped The Shark." In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (2/1), author Andy Borowitz says, "Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq has puzzled many pundits. Is the president stubborn, isolated, out of touch with reality? While all three may be true, there is another explanation. George W. Bush has been on television for the last six years, and like many TV shows entering a seventh season, Bush has jumped the shark. Wikipedia defines 'jumping the shark' as 'the tipping point at which a TV series is deemed to have passed its peak, or has introduced plot twists that are illogical in terms of everything that has preceded them.'"

Bush Says US Taking Iran Threat "Very Seriously." In an interview with Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto), President Bush was asked Wednesday about reports that Iran is three years away from a nuclear weapon, Bush said, "We take their threats very seriously. And we have got, you know, several serious issues with the Iranian government -- not with the Iranian people, but with their government. One, of course, is their interference in Iraq. And I have made it very clear that we will protect our troops and protect innocent Iraqi people. Secondly, I believe the best way to convince the Iranians to give up their nuclear-weapons ambitions is for the world to work in concert in sending Iran a serious message. … We're spending a lot of time keeping that diplomatic initiative strong, and clearly stating to the Iranians: You don't need a nuclear weapon."

Burns Says US Has Right To Detain Iranian Officials. NPR (2/1) broadcast, "The Bush Administration says the US has been tracking Iranian involvement in the Iraqi insurgency for a couple of years. Deputy Secretary of State Nicholas Burns says Iran must halt such action and that the US is taking steps to make its position clear." NPR played audio of Burns saying, "We warned Iraq – Iran, excuse me – privately on a number of occasions over the last year and a half. And the Iranians did not, of course, appear to listen to that, so now we've begun to detain those Iranian officials. And we think it's absolutely within our rights to do so under Article 51 of the UN Charter, which is self-defense." NPR added, "Burns' remarks were taken from an interview airing today on NPR's 'Morning Edition.'"

Analysts Warn US Rhetoric Could Trigger War With Iran. The AP (2/1, Krane) reports, "Citing Iranian involvement with Iraqi militias and Tehran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration has shifted to offense in its confrontation with Iran -- building up the US military in the Persian Gulf and promising more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq and Lebanon." However, the "behind-the-scenes struggle between the two nations could explode into open warfare over a single misstep, analysts and US military officials warn." Iraq, the say, "has become a proxy battleground between Washington and Tehran, which is challenging -- at least rhetorically -- America's dominance of the Gulf." In Washington, "The war of words has raised fears among both Democrats and Republicans in Congress that the United States and Iran are drifting toward armed conflict at a time when America is struggling against determined foes in Iraq and Afghanistan."

US Delays Plans To Release Details Of Charges Against Iran. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Richter, 850K) reports the Bush administration has "postponed plans to offer public details of its charges of Iranian meddling inside Iraq amid internal divisions over the strength of the evidence," US officials said. US officials "promised" last week to provide evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq, "but some officials in Washington are concerned that some of the material may be inconclusive and that other data cannot be released without jeopardizing intelligence sources and methods." They also "want to avoid repeating the embarrassment that followed the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when it became clear that information the administration cited to justify the war was incorrect," the officials said.

Similarly, the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) writes in an editorial today, "Given America's bitter experience in Iraq, one would think that President Bush could finally figure out that threats and brute force aren't a substitute for a reasoned strategy. But Mr. Bush is at it again, this time trying to bully Iran into stopping its meddling inside Iraq." While expressing "no doubt about Iran's malign intent," the Times warns that "more threats and posturing are unlikely to get Iran to back down. If Mr. Bush isn't careful, he could end up talking himself into another disastrous war, and if Congress is not clear in opposing him this time, he could drag the country along."

"Failure" Of US Intelligence On Iraq Sparks Scrutiny On Iran. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 8, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While there is no question of Iranian involvement inside Iraq, the failure of intelligence in the run up to the Iraq war has produced intense scrutiny of the tough talk currently coming from the Administration on the topic of Iran." NBC (Mitchell) added, "As the civil war in Iraq grows deadlier by the day, the Bush Administration is increasingly blaming Iran." But a senior US intelligence official told NBC News, the US "can't prove…at this point" that Iran was involved in an attack on US troops in Karbala. Responding to US claims that Iran is providing Iraqi insurgents with weapons, another senior US official told NBC even "if the weapons are made in Iran, doesn't mean Iran provided them directly."

Maliki Urges US, Iran To Resolve Problems. In an interview aired Wednesday on CNN's Situation Room (1/31, 4:00PM), Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said, ""We have told the Iranians and the Americans, 'We know that you have a problem with each other but we're asking you, please, solve your problems outside of Iraq.'" Al-Maliki warned, "We do not want the American forces to take Iraq as a base to attack Iran...we will not accept Iran using Iraq to attack American forces. But does this exist? It exists and I assure you it exists."

Chirac Retracts Statements On Iran. The New York Times (2/1, A1, Sciolino, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports on its front page that French President Jacques Chirac "said this week that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a big danger, and that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran." The remarks, made in an interview Monday with The New York Times, The International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur, a French weekly magazine, were "vastly different from stated French policy and what Mr. Chirac has often said." On Tuesday, Chirac then "summoned the same journalists back to Élysée Palace to retract many of his remarks." The president "said repeatedly during the second interview that he had spoken casually and quickly the day before because he believed he had been talking about Iran off the record." On Monday, Chirac began by describing as "very dangerous" Iran's refusal to stop producing enriched uranium, but stressed that "what is dangerous about this situation is not the fact of having a nuclear bomb," but rather nuclear "proliferation." The Times notes that it was "unclear whether Mr. Chirac's initial remarks reflected what he truly believes. If so, it suggests a growing divide with American policy." In noting the sanctions against Iran that were imposed last month by the UN Security Council, Chirac "warned Tuesday that escalation of the conflict by both sides was unwise."

US Cautions European Energy Firms To Avoid Deals With Iran. The Washington Post (2/1, A12, Mufson, 690K) reports the Bush administration is "warning European oil and gas companies against investing in Iran, trying to head off a push by Tehran to attract new investment by international petroleum giants." In the past two weeks, the Administration "has met with European oil company executives about the Middle East, and during one session a senior State Department official cautioned that the situation with Iran was 'hot and is going to get hotter,' one executive said." Another European executive said, "The administration is putting the full-court press on foreign companies and is going all out to impress upon them that it would be a mistake to do anything with" Iran. Despite the Administration's pressure, however, "many of the world's biggest oil companies were expected to attend a meeting in Vienna today and tomorrow held by National Iranian Oil Co. to drum up interest in 12 onshore and five offshore blocks."

EU Resisting US Calls For Increased Financial Pressure On Tehran. AFP (2/1, Lanteaume) reports US demands to toughen financial sanctions against Tehran "are opening fault lines in the US-European stand to punish Tehran for defying calls to rein its suspect nuclear program." Although European countries have agreed to impose sanctions under a UN resolution, they are "resisting US calls to go even further and force global financial institutions to sever all ties" with Iran. Meanwhile, Under Secretary of Treasury in charge of fighting terrorist funding, Stuart Levey, "has made several whirlwind trips to Europe over the past months to try to persuade European multinationals and banks to stop investing in Iran. But so far he has run into a brick wall, with European countries maintaining they are not ready to cut off banking links with Iranian companies, arguing that such a move goes beyond the spirit of the UN resolution."

Sanctions Prompt Talk Of Shake-Up Of Iranian Officials. The Washington Times (2/1, A1, Athanasiadis, 88K) reports on its front page that the unanimous passage of U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran in December "has shaken the nation's public and ruling elite, prompting talk of a shake-up of top officials and fears of a US attack." Prior to the sanctions' approval, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "had been weakened by his inability to fulfill campaign promises to stem rising inflation and by doubts over the wisdom of his statements questioning the Holocaust and threatening Israel." Now, "suggestions are being raised that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, is to change several key officials, including Ali Larijani, the head of the National Security Council; Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki; and Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif." Western officials have also noted "rising domestic criticism" of Ahmadinejad since the Council approved the sanctions.

Twenty-Four Iraqis Killed Yesterday. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Zavis, 850K) reports, "At least 24 Iraqis were killed and dozens injured today in bomb blasts, gunfire and other violence. The heaviest toll was inflicted in Baghdad, where US and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep." The US military "announced the deaths of two soldiers and one Marine in combat in Al Anbar province on Tuesday."

Iraq Halts Flight To Syria, Iran Border Crossings. USA Today (2/1, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown aimed at crushing violence in the capital and surrounding regions, a member of the parliament and an airport official said Wednesday." The "airport official told the Associated Press that flights to and from Syria will be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted Tuesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to reveal the information." Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's Defense and Security Committee, "said the move 'was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume.'" The Washington Post (2/1, A10, 690K) also reports the story.

Top US Commander Says Shiite Militias Leaving Baghdad Positions. The Washington Post (2/1, A10, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Shiite militia leaders already appear to be leaving their strongholds in Baghdad in anticipation of the US and Iraqi plan to increase the troop presence in the Iraqi capital, according to the top US commander in the country." Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. "said in a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee as part of his confirmation hearing today" to be Army chief of staff, "We have seen numerous indications Shia militia leaders will leave, or already have left, Sadr City to avoid capture by Iraqi and coalition security forces."

The Washington Post (2/1, A10, 690K) also reports on "instructions delivered by emissaries of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr at a recent meeting in Baghdad," which "were clear to militiaman Massan Abdul Hussein. 'They informed us to hide the weapons,' Abdul Hussein recalled of the Jan. 21 meeting in the Shula neighborhood. 'They said: "We will not allow anyone to carry any arms, even if it's a pistol under their shirt. This is not acceptable."'"

Kirkuk Could Become Another Front In Sectarian Conflict. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Roug, 850K) reports, "American officials, regional leaders and local residents are increasingly worried that this oil-rich city in northern Iraq could develop into a third front in the country's civil war just as increased numbers of U.S. troops arrive in Baghdad and Al Anbar province as reinforcement for battles there. Al-Qaida-linked fighters have recently surfaced here, launching a wave of lethal attacks, US and Iraqi officials say." The attacks "come amid a rise in communal tensions in the months before a referendum on the status of the city and the surrounding province." Meanwhile, "Kurdish bureaucrats are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs." In another story, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says "resource-rich Kirkuk and its surrounding province are prized by Iraq's various ethnic groups and could soon become another full-blown battleground in the widening civil war. The rolling hills produce 40% of the country's oil and 70% of its natural gas." This year, Kirkuk "residents face landmark votes that military experts say could spark sectarian violence: on how to draw provincial borders, and whether to conduct a census and join the semiautonomous Kurdish regional government."

Sunni, Shiite Lawmakers To Form New Blocks With Eye On Ending Sectarian Split. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim lawmakers announced plans Wednesday to form two new blocs in Iraq's parliament they hope will break away from the ethnic and religious mold of current alliances and ease sectarian strife." But "while both blocs said they hope eventually to draw in members of all ethnic and religious groups, one initially will be made up entirely of Shiite politicians and the other of Sunnis." The Times adds, "Moderate politicians across the sectarian divide have voiced mounting frustration at parliament's seeming impotence." A group of "mostly independent legislators in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite faction, said that within days they will launch a new 'Solidarity bloc' intended to be a voice of moderation within parliament's largest political formation. … Organizers claimed the support of at least 10 of the UIA's 128 legislators, but said others had expressed interest in joining them." On the Sunni side, "a number of independent lawmakers said they had already broken away from the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament with 44 members. The new 'Gathering of Independent Iraqis' is lead by Abid Mutlaq Jabouri, a former major general in Saddam Hussein's army, said Abdullah Eskandar, another founding member."

Oversight Agency Finds Waste, Failure In Iraq Reconstruction Projects. The New York Times (2/1, Glanz, 1.16M) reports that "a federal oversight agency reported Wednesday that despite nearly $108 billion that had been budgeted for the reconstruction of Iraq since the 2003 invasion, the country's electrical output and oil production were still below prewar levels and stocks of gasoline and kerosene had plummeted to their lowest levels in at least two years. The United States alone has accounted for nearly $38 billion of the rebuilding money, according to the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction." Many suspect US contractors of wasting money when "the latest reports…appear to show that it is not for lack of money that the performance of Iraq's basic infrastructure has fallen to disastrous levels in some cases; if anything, the rebuilding program seems to have been given more money than it has been able to use to any effect." The actions of American companies like DynCorp and individuals such as former Pentagon contractor Robert J. Stein Jr. have led to investigations into fraud and waste as Iraq's electricity production has dipped below pre-war levels with crude oil production slipping as well.

The ABC World News (1/31, story 6, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, in "a scathing, new report from the government's inspector general detailing massive waste in the American-funded reconstruction of Iraq. $21 billion has been spent" and "$3 billion of that has been wasted" according to the report. With "virtually all of the $21 billion the US spent on reconstruction went to contractors, equipment and supplies from outside the country" which one Pentagon official, Bob Love "says…was a wasted opportunity." Bob Love, Pentagon Business task Force: "There's so many Iraqis that are desperately in need of jobs or the ability to come back to work. And to see -- to see all of this coming from other countries is really -- is really not only frustrating. It's heart-wrenching."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 4, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported that this report, covered "more than 13,000 different projects, everything from schools to oil pipelines," and according to Deborah Avant of George Washington University "it's hard to say there's been an improvement." Still, current "military commanders are already complaining the deployment of civilian reconstruction teams" are "running months behind the surge of combat troops" because "without reconstruction, there's no point in sending the troops."

The NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "one big American contractor, Parsons, has been singled out for shoddy work. … One of the worst failures of the Iraq reconstruction program, a flagship training academy for Iraqi police" that "turned it into a disaster from the start." "Stuart Bowen, inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, says the Iraqis recently refused to take over the complex, calling the work disgusting," finding deficiciencies in almost all of Parsons' construction projects.

Al Qaeda Has Adapted, Organized Globally Over Past Year. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Huang, 59K) examines different countries where "some of last year's most significant gains and losses for the terrorist organization" of Al Qaeda have occurred. Al Qaeda agents "continued their attacks" as "violence in Iraq intensified, and Afghanistan saw its most violent year since 2001." Although counterterrorism efforts continue to be a priority in the West, it has not "weakened the appeal of Al Qaeda's agenda" as "home-grown militants around the world joined its jihad, as regional fighting heightened perceptions of a global war on Islam." The UN has stated that sectarian violence in Iraq has killed "more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians…last year, most in Sunni-Shiite violence that Al Qaeda is bent on fomenting."

Brooks Says Iraq War Has Spurred Expansionism, Not Isolationism. In a piece in the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M), David Brooks compares the Vietnam Syndrome of turning inward and growing "suspicious of power politics" to the sorely lacking Iraq Syndrome which "was over before it began" and has merely caused many Americans to lose "faith in the Bush administration and in this particular venture, but there has been no generalized loss of faith in the American system or in American goodness" as during the Vietnam War. Whereas "Vietnam sparked a broad cultural revolution, a shift in values and a loss of confidence. Iraq has not had the same effect." Brooks concludes that lawmakers seem to "take it for granted that the U.S. is going to be in the Middle East for a long time to come" and "when you look further into the future, you see that the next president's big efforts will not be about retrenchment, but about expansion;" and although "the US has taken its share of blows over the past few years…the isolationist dog is not barking" and "the hegemon will live" on.

Some Fear Pentagon Reorganization May Jeopardize Special Operations Oversight. The Hill (2/1, Tiron) reports that "a major reorganization of the Pentagon's policy shop is raising concerns among defense authorizers, who say the move could dilute the efficacy of a congressionally mandated civilian office tasked with oversight and support of special operations." This report "addressing lawmakers' concerns about the overhaul of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy is due today to Congress, and a Pentagon spokeswoman said the report is ready and will be delivered by deadline. Several sources, however, have indicated that the report may be delayed because of a long approval process." The goal of the reorganization is "to bring the office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to transnational threats, manage international military coalitions and equip partner nations to fight terrorists. The report is expected to address congressional concerns that policy office leadership so far has been unable to alleviate despite several meetings on the Hill."

WPost Supports Troop "Surge" In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) shows support for a troop "surge" in Afghanistan and editorializes that while the US "debates the Bush administration's 'surge' of American troops into Baghdad, a similar American buildup has begun in Afghanistan. As in Iraq, it comes in response to rapidly escalating violence," and some "question…whether the reinforcements are too little or too late." In Afghanistan, "there are still far fewer Afghan and foreign troops than are needed to secure the country" from Taliban insurgency. The Post concluded that supporting Afghanistan with troops and equipment should remain a priority with Congress and with NATO allies, and that the resent surge off troops in Iraq and new funding for Afghanistan; gained attention through efforts of the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice can hopefully lead to "more allied commitments over the next several weeks."

Leahy Hearing To Question US Attorney Departures. The Financial Times (2/1, Masters) reports, "Democratic senators are fighting to halt what they say is a Bush administration campaign to remove forcibly top federal prosecutors, including the US attorneys responsible for key investigations of Congressional corruption and stock options back-dating." The Times continues, "Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will hold a hearing next week on whether the justice department is politicising the hiring and firing of top federal prosecutors. … Thirteen of the 93 US attorneys have left since the March 2006 passage of a little-noticed amendment to the Patriot Act that – in effect – allows President George W. Bush to install top prosecutors without Senate confirmation." The Times adds, "Departing attorneys include Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, who was leading the probes of stock options at Apple, and Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted Republican congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham and was investigating a politically connected defence contractor. … Democrats say those two as well as US attorneys in New Mexico, Arizona, Arkansas, Washington State and Nevada have been forced out. Mr Ryan has said he left as a result of a 'mutually agreeable decision with Washington'." The Times notes, "Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, denied that the Bush administration was trying to circumvent Senate confirmation. Justice department officials said on Wednesday they would seek Senate confirmation for all replacement attorneys. … Traditionally, the justice department sets policy but the US attorneys have significant discretion in deciding which cases to investigate and prosecute. … The president names US attorneys but permanent US attorneys must be confirmed by the Senate. Until last year, 'interim' replacements could serve 120 days and then generally had to seek approval from a state's federal judges to stay on. .. .However, during 11th-hour negotiations over the re-authorisation of the Patriot Act, Republican Senator Arlen Specter added an amendment that allows the president to make interim appointments that can last indefinitely."

DOJ Names Knauss Interim Arizona US Attorney. The Arizona Republic (2/1, Wagner) reports, "The Department of Justice, dodging recommendations from Arizona's two U.S. senators, has named veteran federal prosecutor Daniel Knauss as interim U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona." The Republic continues, "Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl had recommended Diane Humetewa, an assistant U.S. attorney and member of the Hopi tribe, for the position vacated by Paul Charlton. … In a news release, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had appointed Knauss, a chief assistant in charge of the U.S. attorney's satellite office in Tucson." The Republic adds, "Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which must confirm permanent candidates, responded: 'Daniel Knauss is a quality lawyer and will make an excellent interim U.S. Attorney. . . . It's our hope that eventually Diane Humetewa will be nominated by the president.' … Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for Arizona, stressed that Knauss' appointment is a temporary measure. He said President Bush has yet to nominate a candidate for Senate approval, and Humetewa is not excluded from that process." The Republic notes, "Candidates recommended by senators typically win such assignments, but the attorney general has authority to appoint interim administrators as he sees fit. … Knauss, a 34-year employee of the federal prosecutor's office in Arizona, also filled in as boss during 1993 after the resignation of Linda Akers. His temporary appointment at the time angered Sen. Dennis DeConcini, who had nominated Janet Napolitano for the job, though she was not then a federal prosecutor. … Napolitano later received President Clinton's permanent nomination and served as U.S. attorney before winning elections as Arizona's attorney general, and then governor."

Federal Judge Withdraws From Consideration For Los Angeles US Attorney. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Krikorian) reports, "Longtime federal judge Dickran M. Tevrizian has withdrawn his name from consideration as the next U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, it was learned Wednesday." The Times continues, "Though Tevrizian declined to comment, others in the legal community said the 66-year-old jurist had recently notified a search committee for the Justice Department that he no longer was a candidate for the job. … Only days ago, Tevrizian, a U.S. District Court judge, was viewed as one of the leading candidates for the position, which has jurisdiction over federal prosecutions in a seven-county area. … But Tuesday, the judge told attorneys in a case before him that he would not pursue the post, a lawyer said. … 'Basically he said he wasn't that interested in the job and had put his name in consideration because others had asked him to,' said attorney Dale Rubin." The Times notes, "Rubin is representing one of two men facing the death penalty in Tevrizian's court for a kidnapping and murder rampage. … One day before Tevrizian's disclosure, attorneys for the two defendants had asked him to recuse himself because of the possibility that he might soon be running the very office prosecuting the case, Rubin said. … 'It is not that he is biased,' Rubin said. … 'It was just the appearance of impropriety we were trying to avoid,' the attorney said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Tosses Enron Broadband Conviction. The AP (2/1, Lozano) reports, "Just days before he was set to be sentenced, a former Enron Corp. executive's fraud and conspiracy convictions related to the company's broadband unit were overturned Wednesday by a federal judge." The AP continues, "Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted in May on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records after a monthlong trial. Howard had been set to be sentenced Monday. … Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges in the same trial. Both men were accused of participating in a small piece of the fraud that brought down Enron in 2001." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore vacated the convictions on all five counts Howard had been found guilty of, saying in a 19-page ruling the convictions were tied to a flawed legal theory prosecutors used to explain the fraud and conspiracy charges. … Gilmore based her decision on a ruling in August in which the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's 1999 sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage to help the energy trader appear to have met earnings targets. … The appeals court found fault with the government's arguments of criminal liability and deprivation of honest services."

The New York Times (2/1, Murphy) reports, "The first trial against Mr. Howard lasted three months in 2005 and ended in a hung jury. He was tried along with five other Broadband employees. His conviction on five charges of conspiracy and fraud occurred during a retrial last year. … His only co-defendant in the second trial was Michael W. Krautz, Enron Broadband's former accountant, who was acquitted of all charges because the jury contended he was only following orders." The Times continues, "In a 19-page decision filed on Wednesday, Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court said her ruling matched the Fifth Circuit's in another Enron fraud case involving Merrill Lynch and Nigerian barges. .. In that case, the appeals court overturned several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage firm in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets. .. .The court said the government did not prove that defendants had deprived the company of 'honest services.' … Federal prosecutors had conceded that four of the five convictions against Mr. Howard should be dropped because of the Fifth Circuit's opinion but held that the fifth, for falsifying records, should stand. The judge disagreed because the jury could have relied on the convictions on the other counts to determine his guilt on the final charge. … A spokesmen for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra said, 'We are reviewing our options,' but declined to comment further."

Guilty Plea Is Latest Blow To Milberg Weiss. The New York Times (2/1, Creswell) reports, "A few years before he faked the theft of two works of art from his home in Brentwood, Calif., Steven G. Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist, received a personal check from a partner of the law firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad for $175,000 as an 'option payment' on one of those works, Picasso's 'Nude Before a Mirror.' … But court documents filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles yesterday said the check was a secret payment made to Mr. Cooperman for acting as a named plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit filed by Milberg Weiss." The Times continues, "The government's agreement with Mr. Cooperman, contained in the documents, in which he agreed to plea guilty to a conspiracy charge, is another blow to Milberg Weiss. The law firm was indicted along with two of its partners last year by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles on charges that it participated in a scheme to make secret payments to numerous plaintiffs." The Times adds, "Mr. Cooperman's plea deal is the latest move by federal prosecutors, who have spent seven years investigating the firm and its tactics. Last year, another former Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, pleaded guilty to making a false declaration to a court in connection with secret payments he received from the firm, court filings state. … Still, prosecutors have been unable to bring charges against their primary targets: Milberg's co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, and William S. Lerach, who started his own firm on the West Coast in 2004. People close to the investigation say the two men are identified as 'Partner A' and 'Partner B,' respectively, in court documents. … Mr. Cooperman, however, is a challenging witness for prosecutors. Convicted of insurance fraud in the staged theft of the artworks, Mr. Cooperman cut a deal with prosecutors in 1999, agreeing to provide them information on Milberg Weiss."

The California Recorder (2/1, Hirsch) reports, "Superstar plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach has remained outside the reach of investigators looking at a kickback scheme at his former firm, Milberg Weiss, but a guilty plea in the case on Wednesday might change that." The Recorder continues, "Steven Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist previously convicted of insurance fraud, admitted to taking payments for serving as lead plaintiff in class actions filed by Milberg Weiss over 12 years. … Court documents filed Wednesday detail Cooperman's role and also appear to put 'Partner B,' long believed to be Lerach, at the heart of the lucrative kickback scheme." The Recorder adds, "Though the charging documents don't identify Lerach by name, one source close to the investigation said Wednesday, 'If you look at it, there's an awful lot of facts in there about Bill Lerach.' …

That Cooperman has helped prosecutors build their case against Milberg Weiss is nothing new. He has been cooperating since its beginning. In fact, he's the one who first told prosecutors about the kickbacks and fingered Lerach. … The problem for the U.S. Attorney's Office has been that Cooperman has a major credibility problem. He offered to cooperate in the Milberg investigation only after he was convicted and sent to prison for orchestrating an insurance scam by claiming some fine art in his Beverly Hills home had been stolen. Because of his past, anything Cooperman could say in trial about Lerach, or anyone else linked to Milberg Weiss, could look like an attempt to escape another stint in the slammer. … But on Wednesday, Cooperman's credibility may have become less of a problem. His plea -- to conspiring with Milberg Weiss and several of its senior partners to obstruct justice and make false statements in class actions -- shows that he's not cutting a deal to get off entirely scot-free."

Cox Says SEC Is Aggressively Pursuing Options Cases. The AP (2/1) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's investigations of suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies are proceeding vigorously and the agency continues to work closely with federal prosecutors in pursuing cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said Wednesday. … 'This is a very aggressive program,' Cox told reporters." The AP continues, "He also said there is no disagreement among him and the four other SEC commissioners over how stringently to penalize companies found to have engaged in improper backdating of grants to executives. Cox was responding to questions about a news report that said the agency's enforcement efforts were stalled because of dissension among the commissioners over whether companies should be fined. … In addition, he said, the SEC is working 'very closely' with the Justice Department in pursuing stock options cases." The AP adds, "The federal prosecutors and the SEC have filed criminal and civil charges, respectively, against former officials of two technology companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc. … Some observers have criticized the pace of the enforcement effort. … SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors."

Dell's Founder Replaces CEO. The New York Times (2/1, Darlin) reports, "Michael S. Dell has taken back the leadership of the computer company he founded, replacing Kevin B. Rollins after more than a year of mounting problems at Dell." The Times continues, "The company announced yesterday that Mr. Rollins had resigned as chief executive and as a director. Mr. Dell, who is the chairman, immediately assumed Mr. Rollins's duties as well. … The company presented the change, which had been speculated about by Wall Street analysts and industry insiders for more than a year, as a decision by the board, which met earlier this week. Sam Nunn, the former Georgia senator who is the presiding director of Dell's board, was quoted in a company release as saying: 'The board believes that Michael's vision and leadership are critical to building Dell's leadership in the technology industry for the long term.'" The Times adds, "The company also said that it expected fourth-quarter revenue and earnings to fall below the consensus predictions on Wall Street. That was also not an unexpected announcement after industry analysts said several weeks ago that other PC makers had strong sales in the fourth quarter, while Dell's sales lagged. … Mr. Rollins is not entitled to severance or a pension plan. Still, he will walk away with stock options worth about $30 million that he earned during his tenure, according to earlier company filings. According to Equilar, which analyzes executive pay, Mr. Rollins earned $42 million in total direct compensation as the chief executive. A Dell spokeswoman said Mr. Rollins's departure agreement had not yet been completed."

Bloomberg (2/1, Guglielmo) reports, "The PC maker said results will miss analysts' estimates for the third time in the past four quarters. Dell already replaced his finance chief and takes over as the company struggles to regain its position as the world's largest PC maker from Hewlett-Packard Co. and faces a government probe into its accounting. … The company said in August that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission had been reviewing its revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. That review was elevated into a formal investigation in November. The U.S. Justice Department is also probing the company's accounting."

Sonsini Advised Apple On Options Grant. The California Recorder (2/1, Scheck) reports, "When Apple Inc. tried to hammer out a new compensation agreement for iconic CEO Steve Jobs in 2001 -- an agreement now being probed by federal prosecutors -- the company called on Larry Sonsini, the lead partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati." The Recorder continues, "People with knowledge of the federal probe say the lawyer -- an expert on corporate governance -- was consulted by Apple's board and legal department on a 7.5 million-share grant that's become the core of the criminal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission and San Francisco U.S. attorney's office." The Recorder adds, "Investigators have focused on the grant because a set of falsified meeting minutes was drawn up to make it appear as though the options were granted at an earlier date -- and a more favorable price -- than when the deal was actually finalized. The minutes were fabricated by a low-ranking in-house Apple lawyer, though prosecutors also have been looking over her head -- at ex-GC Nancy Heinen and Apple's former CFO, Fred Anderson. … According to people with knowledge of the investigation, Heinen discussed the options award with Sonsini between its approval by the company's board of directors and her department's completion of the paperwork. … Through a spokesperson, Sonsini declined to comment Wednesday, and people familiar with the probe wouldn't discuss what he told the lawyers at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation." The Recorder notes, "It's unclear how much Sonsini knew about the grant, including how it was accounted for. … But for the second time in less than a year, a high-profile Silicon Valley scandal may turn on questions about the advice Sonsini did -- or didn't -- give. Just as in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom spying scandal, company officials may point to Sonsini's counsel to explain or defend their actions."

Former Qwest CEO Settles Pension Suit For $1.5 Million. The Rocky Mountain News (2/1, Smith) reports, "Former Qwest Chief Executive Joe Nacchio has agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a fraud lawsuit filed by one of the country's largest pension funds." The News continues, "Nacchio's deal - part of a $46.5 million settlement paid to the California State Teachers' Retirement System - is believed to be the largest he's agreed to make with regard to his alleged misdeeds at the Denver telco. … Qwest, several investment banks and former auditor Arthur Andersen will collectively pay about $45 million to settle the suit, filed in December 2002 by CalSTRS." The News adds, "In 2003, Nacchio paid $400,000 to two law schools to settle charges by New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that Nacchio improperly made more than $1 million from lucrative initial public offerings provided by Citigroup's Salomon Smith Barney brokerage. … Nacchio still faces securities fraud allegations in a federal class-action case, civil fraud charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 42 insider trading counts filed by the Justice Department. He is scheduled to go on trial in Denver on the insider trading charges March 19. He has denied wrongdoing."

Senators Criticize SEC Hedge Fund Investigation. The New York Times (2/1, Bogdanich) reports, "Two prominent Republican senators renewed their criticism yesterday of the way the Securities and Exchange Commission carried out its investigation into a major hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management." In separate speeches on the Senate floor, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, "said the S.E.C. — which filed no charges against Pequot — had failed to aggressively follow up on investigative leads developed by the lawyer who led the inquiry, Gary J. Aguirre. Both senators said their statements reflected the findings of an interim report, which is expected to be released today, on their investigation of the S.E.C.'s conduct in the case." The Times adds, "An S.E.C. spokesman, John Nester, said he had not yet had the chance to read the interim report, but he said the commission would 'carefully consider the report's findings and recommendations.'"

Cooper Testifies At Libby Trial, Says Rove Told Him About Plame. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1, Sniffen) reports, "Reporter Matt Cooper testified Wednesday he thought I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby had confirmed" Valerie Plame Wilson "worked at the CIA but acknowledged he never asked the White House aide where he'd heard that. … Cooper's appearance allowed defense attorney William Jeffress to ask repeatedly about President Bush's chief political adviser, Karl Rove, because Cooper identified Rove as the first official to tell him about Plame's job at CIA." The AP adds, "Cooper also said he didn't take any notes on that exchange and that he had posed his question to Libby 'off the record.'" Meanwhile, the AP (2/1, Apuzzo) reports, "Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged Wednesday that she had conversations with other government officials and could not be 'absolutely, absolutely certain' that she first heard about" Plame from Libby. "Libby's attorneys seized on the hesitation and tried to portray Miller as someone who selectively remembers some conversations and not others."

The New York Times (2/1, A1, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "William H. Jeffress Jr., the lawyer for Mr. Libby, asked Ms. Miller what other officials she had spoken with about Ms. Wilson. 'I remember having conversations, sir,' she said, casting quick glances at the jury and at her lawyers sitting in the back of the courtroom. But she said she could not remember talking to anybody else about Ms. Wilson." Meanwhile, Matt Cooper "said that Mr. Rove told him to be wary of Mr. Wilson's criticisms in The Times. 'Don't go too far out on Wilson,' Mr. Cooper recalled Mr. Rove saying, warning him that Ms. Wilson worked at 'the agency.' Mr. Cooper testified that when he spoke to Libby, he had heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A. He said that Mr. Libby responded, 'I heard that too.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A3, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) also reports that Cooper said Rove was the first to tell him about Plame, and notes, "Cooper is the third prosecution witness to say that Libby was actively spreading information about Wilson and his wife soon after he sought to learn who they were." Meanwhile, USA Today (2/1, Willing, 2.27M) reported on Cooper's testimony, under the headline "Reporter: Rove First To Leak CIA Info."

Trial Said To Show "Ugly Mutual Exploitation" Of DC Officials, Reporters. Under the headline "Libby Trial Shows An Insular, Backbiting Washington," the Los Angeles Times (2/1, A1, Miller, 850K) reports, "With the Bush administration taking a pounding over erroneous prewar claims about Iraq in the summer of 2003, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff consulted his office's top communications advisor on how to strike back. As they talked by phone, I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby scribbled down a series of Machiavellian suggestions from Cheney's then-communications guru, Mary Matalin: What to do about MSNBC talk show host Chris Matthews and his steady barrage of Iraq war criticism? 'Call Tim,' Libby wrote, referring to Tim Russert of NBC News. 'He hates Chris.' … And how best to use the power of the White House to beat back the attacks? The president 'should wave his wand,' Matalin advised, and quickly declassify portions of intelligence reports that backed up the White House case for war." The Post adds that the memo reveals "the ugly mutual exploitation that goes on every day in Washington between powerful government officials and influential members of the media that is on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington."

Juror Questions Seen As Providing Insight Into Witness Testimony. The Washington Post (2/1, A13, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "It is very unusual for jurors to be able to ask questions during court proceedings, but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is allowing it" at the Libby trial. "Some of the questions have been dead on, showing that the highly educated jurors -- who include an art curator, a retired math teacher and an international health policy adviser -- seem to home in on key evidence or testimony. Other questions have elicited new insights into witnesses' thinking, and still others have evoked a few laughs. The whole practice has been controversial among attorneys on both sides -- worried about losing control of the points they hope to score with each witness's testimony -- who argue quietly with Walton at the bench over what can be asked."

Indictments In Cunningham Probe Said To Be Near. The AP (2/1, Hoffman) reports, "Federal prosecutors are preparing to seek indictments against a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor at the center of the bribery scandal that sent former U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison." The AP continues, "Two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press on Wednesday that prosecutors plan to ask a San Diego grand jury to return charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy against Kyle 'Dusty' Foggo and his close friend, Brent Wilkes, whose lawyers have said he is one of four unidentified co-conspirators described in the 2005 plea agreement for Cunningham, a San Diego Republican." The AP adds, "Honest services fraud is a combination of mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals. … The officials said a second indictment is being prepared that would charge Wilkes and two of the other Cunningham co-conspirators - New York businessman Thomas Kontogiannis and his nephew, John T. Michael - with bribery and several conspiracy counts." The AP notes, "The officials spoke only on condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret and the charges have not been finalized. Indictments could be returned as early as Thursday, though it's more likely to occur within the next several weeks. … The fourth co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February 2006 to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002. Wade is former president of MZM Inc. … The grand jury began hearing evidence in 2005 against Cunningham, at the time an eight-term congressman who served on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee and the Intelligence Committee. Cunningham's subcommittee assignment made him a key figure in the awarding of defense contracts."

Rhode Island Lawmaker Sentenced To 2½ Years In Prison For Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1, Tucker) reports, "A once-powerful lawmaker at the center of a corruption scandal was sentenced Wednesday to 2 1/2 years in federal prison for taking payoffs, and prosecutors said their investigation now includes 14 politicians and companies." Former Rhode Island state Sen. John Celona "admitted he abused his position as chairman of a key legislative committee to benefit the drugstore chain CVS Corp., Roger Williams Medical Center and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Rhode Island. Prosecutors said the former state senator was paid nearly $320,000 for the favorable treatment." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard Sullivan told the judge that Celona's extensive cooperation has led the investigation to seven politicians and seven corporations. Sullivan did not identify anyone being investigated but said FBI agents from other cities have been transferred to Rhode Island to help with the probe."

The Providence Journal (2/1, Stanton, 167K) reports that in sentencing Celona, "Robert A. Urciuoli and Frances P. Driscoll to prison yesterday, Senior U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres said that he wanted to send a message to others who might be tempted to follow in their footsteps down the long, gray line of Rhode Island's corrupt past. … Urciuoli, 59, received 3 years. And in an emotional conclusion to the day's proceedings, Driscoll, 67, who has health concerns, was sentenced to 8 months in prison plus 8 months home confinement." The Journal adds, "Sullivan told Torres that Celona's assistance has provided tips and leads for a growing number of agents. FBI agents have been brought to Providence from New York and Baltimore to work with two Providence agents and the Rhode Island State Police. In addition, agents from the Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Department of Labor have joined the task force."

Brooklyn DA Seeking Testimony From Mobster's Son Against DeVecchio. The New York Sun (2/1, Capeci) reports in its "Gang Land" column, "Brooklyn prosecutors are seeking to line up a star witness for their sensational upcoming trial of a former FBI supervisor, R. Lindley DeVecchio, who is charged with helping legendary mob capo Gregory Scarpa commit four murders. The prospective witness is none other than Gregory Scarpa Jr., the imprisoned son of the late Colombo crime big, who after his death in 1994 was revealed to have been a much-prized government informant (and whose handler was Mr. DeVecchio). Unfortunately, the would-be witness comes with heavy baggage: He's already been called a perjurer by a federal judge and other authorities. So far, the matter is still in the talking stages." The Sun notes, "Sources say that the jailed gangster is willing to testify without any guarantees, and that the DA's office is seriously considering the option."

Blagojevich Orders Audit Of Drug-Testing Firm Under FBI Investigation. The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Kidwell, Chase, 617K) reports, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office has ordered an audit of no-bid state contracts dating to 1990 with a Chicago drug-testing firm under criminal investigation for alleged billing fraud. The administration outlined its actions involving K.K. Bio-Science Inc. on Wednesday, a day after Cook County investigators and the FBI searched the company's offices for evidence of fraud, money laundering and a continuing criminal enterprise, according to the search warrant. The company came under scrutiny last fall when the Tribune disclosed that the governor's wife, Patricia, had earned more than $113,000 as a real estate agent for the company's owner. There is no indication that the fraud investigation has any connection to the real estate deals." The Tribune notes, "No criminal charges had been filed as of Wednesday, and law-enforcement officials also remained silent."

Execution Of New York Man Convicted Of Murdering Officers Could Be Years Away. The New York Times (2/1, Brick) reports, "Ronell Wilson sits alone in a prison cell near Gowanus Bay in Brooklyn. He has been on suicide watch since his return late Tuesday evening from federal court in Brooklyn, where a jury called for his execution. … 'He's holding up well,' said one of his lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, 'under the circumstances.'" The Times continues, "On federal death row, he will join 46 other inmates, their cases in varying stages of appeal. If the sentence is carried out one day, Mr. Wilson, 24, will probably die by lethal injection at the federal death chamber in Terre Haute, Ind., where Timothy J. McVeigh, who bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, and two Texans have preceded him. But Mr. Wilson's lawyers said he will appeal his sentence, an unpredictable and complicated process that could take years." The Times adds, "No other federal trial in New York has produced a death sentence in half a century. Three men have been put to death in federal cases since 1988, when a moratorium on federal capital punishment was lifted. Of these, the two Texans — Juan Raul Garza, convicted of three drug-related murders, and Louis Jones Jr., convicted of rape and murder — were each on death row for about eight years. Mr. McVeigh, who abandoned his appeals after being denied a stay of execution, was executed four years after his sentencing for the bombing. … Mr. Wilson was convicted of 10 crimes in December, chief among them the murder of two undercover detectives during a gun transaction on Staten Island in March 2003. Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, who was not in his chambers yesterday, must set a formal sentencing date, according to his staff. … On five counts, the judge is bound by the jury's verdict to impose death sentences. But for the other charges, including robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and use of a firearm, the judge must determine prison terms. Some of the crimes are relatively minor, on the scale of regular business for a federal court in New York City."

Experts Say Emotions, Geography Influenced Verdict. The New York Times (2/1, Barron) reports, "They were police detectives, shot at close range, in the backs of their heads. Fellow officers and relatives filled the courtroom, day after day, during the trial of the man accused of pulling the trigger, who mostly kept his emotions to himself. … Add to that where the jurors came from — Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island, but not Manhattan. And that the detectives knew, and were known in, the neighborhood, which gave the case a strong local connection — unlike, say, a case involving terrorist acts overseas. … Taken together, all those elements were so powerful, death-penalty specialists said yesterday, that the jury's verdict seemed almost inevitable. The seven women and five men decided that the defendant, Ronell Wilson, should die." The Times continues, "That made him the first person to face death in a federal case in New York since the 1950s, a fate that other defendants have managed to avoid, even though some of them have been accused of killing far more people. 'There was a confluence of factors,' said Deborah W. Denno, a professor at Fordham University School of Law. 'I think it's highly unlikely there will be another case with all these particular elements anytime soon.'" The Times notes, "For that reason, she and other lawyers interviewed yesterday said they doubted that the Wilson verdict signaled a shift in public attitudes about the death penalty. Michael Greenberger, a law professor at the University of Maryland, noted that advances in DNA testing have uncovered faulty convictions and made juries nationally more hesitant to impose the death sentence. But he said there were no such doubts in the Wilson case. … 'This case is one that shocks the conscience,' he said. 'The brutal nature of it, I think, aligned the stars for this kind of verdict.' … Still, some attitudes may have changed. Several years ago, when Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered United States attorneys to seek the death penalty, he ran into resistance in New York, where some prosecutors feared such a possibility could cause jurors to acquit. … Counting Mr. Wilson, there are now 47 federal prisoners on death row. But prosecutors in New York have failed to obtain death sentences in recent years, even in closely watched terrorism trials involving embassy bombings in Africa in 1998."

Kodak Employee Sentenced To Probation For Kickback Scheme. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/1) reports, "A fired Eastman Kodak Co. employee involved in a kickback scheme to defraud the photography company was placed on probation for three years Tuesday and ordered to pay almost $190,000 in restitution. Roger Benton, 49, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in June for helping to steer inflated contracts to a molding services company, Pro-Mold Ltd., between 1997 and 2000. At sentencing in federal court, he was fined $3,000 and paid $63,058 of the $189,174 he was ordered to return to Kodak."

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing, Producing Child Porn. The Knoxville News Sentinel (2/1, Satterfield) reports, "A Grainger County man with a decade-long history of collecting child pornography admitted Wednesday he has been creating his own illegal images. David Edward Ratkewicz pleaded guilty before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan to a federal child pornography possession charge. As part of his plea, Ratkewicz admitted not only downloading sadistic shots of young children being sexually victimized but also 'photographing underage boys in sexually explicit positions and storing the images on his computer,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley said." The News Sentinel notes that "the Knoxville Police Department Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, with help from the Grainger County Sheriff's Department, hit Ratkewicz with a search warrant in August 2004. … Atchley said Ratkewicz agreed to be interviewed by Pierce and other task force officers, including FBI agents."

Study Finds Vermont Sentencing Program Successful. The AP (2/1, Ring) reports, "A woman who stole from a patient in a nursing home where she works was sentenced to making potpourri-filled vases for a senior center. … A man convicted of driving with a suspended license agrees to carve a cane for an elderly person. … An artist convicted of driving under the influence had to paint a painting for an organization whose lawn she drove over. … Those are some of the examples of the unusual sentences crafted by Vermont's ground-breaking Reparative Probation system, under which criminals meet with community volunteers -- and in some cases victims -- to craft their sentences instead of taking them from a judge." The AP continues, "The system works, according to a new survey. … The survey by three college professors that was paid for with a grant from the Justice Department, found that in 9,078 cases handled between 1998 and 2005, offenders were 23 percent less likely to commit another crime while on probation than those sentenced to traditional probation. … And they were 12 percent less likely to commit another crime after probation ended." The AP adds, "The people who work with the system every day say its successes go beyond just reducing recidivism. … 'Those numbers are important, but I can tell you it works on so many other levels, in terms of the relationships built and the conversations that are had and the new perspectives that people have about their own lives and other peoples' lives,' said Cara Gleason, the Community Justice Coordinator for the City of Burlington." The AP notes, "LThe Corrections Department set up the pioneering program in 1995, when the state was looking for alternatives to traditional corrections. … Reparative probation was part of a package of sentencing alternatives -- such as requiring offenders to complete intensive substance-abuse programs or closely supervised furlough in the community -- made available to Vermont judges. … In the reparative probation system, the offender meets with community members and they try to craft a sentence that builds on the interests of the offender and the needs of the victim and the community."

Bush Urged To Pardon Convicted Border Agents. McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Montgomery) reports, "Are they mistreated heroes or rogue lawmen? … That question is at the heart of a nationwide uproar over Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are beginning decade-long sentences in federal prison for the non-fatal shooting of a suspected drug smuggler, who was given immunity to testify against them." McClatchy continues, "Scores of Republican lawmakers, and thousands of grassroots petitioners, have besieged President Bush with demands that the agents be granted an immediate pardon. But to federal prosecutor Johnny Sutton and his defenders, the two Texas-based agents abridged the public trust by attempting to cover up an unauthorized shooting and must face the consequences. … 'Prosecutors take cases as they come. We don't get to choose the facts and we don't get to choose the witnesses,' the San Antonio-based U.S. attorney said in a telephone interview Wednesday. 'We hate the thought of having to prosecute law enforcement because those are the people we work with every day. But nobody is above the law.'" McClatchy adds, "In an interview on the Fox television network Wednesday, Bush again said he is bound by strict federal guidelines on pardons and cannot immediately grant a pardon to the two agents. … Bush explained that 'there is a series of steps that are analyzed in order for the Justice Department to make a recommendation as to whether or not a president grants a pardon.' … And, Bush added, 'we're not at that stage yet.' … Bush's position is likely to further agitate a growing circle of mostly Republican lawmakers, who have repeatedly pressed the White House to step into the case. Many also blame the Bush administration for the agents' imprisonment, pointing out that it was Bush who appointed Sutton as federal prosecutor in 2001."

Closing Arguments Made At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The AP (2/1, Weber) reports, "A former Coca-Cola secretary was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she conspired to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi, a prosecutor said Wednesday during closing arguments in the woman's trial. But Joya Williams' lawyer asked jurors to use their common sense and ask themselves if the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt." The AP adds, "Jurors deliberated Williams' fate for about 3½ hours Wednesday afternoon," and "deliberations were to resume Thursday. Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said Wednesday that the case against Williams is about cash, ongoing access to documents, lies and acts in furtherance of the crime."

Neighbors Stunned By Sex Offenders Posing As Family. The New York Times (2/1, Steinhauer) reports from El Mirage, AZ, "To neighbors, Casey Price was a seventh grader with acne and a baseball cap who lived an unremarkable life among a bevy of male relatives. … He built the occasional skateboard ramp and did wheelies on his bicycle down the streets of this subdivision of stucco homes north of Phoenix. … In nearby Surprise, where Casey was enrolled as a 12-year-old in a public school for four months, he was regarded as a shy, average student with chronic attendance problems. A man identified as his uncle had registered him, attended curriculum night and e-mailed his teachers about homework assignments." The Times continues, "Now Casey is in jail, and his former neighbors and classmates have learned the unthinkable: Not only is Casey not Casey — his real name is Neil H. Rodreick II — but he is also a 29-year-old convicted sex offender who kept a youthful appearance with the aid of razors and makeup. … And the men known as his uncle, grandfather and cousin, who until recently shared a three-bedroom house with him here, were not family at all, but a web of convicted sex offenders and predators, law enforcement officials say, preying in part on one another." The Times adds, "A retracing of Mr. Rodreick's tracks over the past several years shows that he is under investigation in three states. The authorities in four jurisdictions say he repeatedly failed to register as a sex offender, housed a large cache of child pornography in his computer and, based on videos found by the police, had sex with at least one boy. … The men have been indicted on numerous counts and are scheduled to appear in court in late February; they have already pleaded not guilty to charges of fraud and failing to register as sex offenders."

DOJ Audit Finds More Problems With Massachusetts Crime Lab. The Boston Globe (2/1, Saltzman) reports, "A federal inspection of the State Police crime laboratory completed in September found problems with the handling of DNA evidence that go beyond those that prompted the agency to suspend a civilian administrator and led to two sweeping reviews of the lab." The Globe continues, "Auditors from the US Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General concluded that the laboratory entered incomplete genetic profiles into its computerized database in 12 cases of a sample of 100 involving unidentified suspects who left DNA at crimes scenes, making the profiles inadequate." The Globe adds, "The auditors also found instances in which laboratory officials entered the same genetic profile under two different ID numbers in the database and failed to follow FBI protocols for analyzing profiles and double-checking results, according to an executive summary of the inspection report. … In addition, the summary said, the laboratory waited nearly eight months to confirm a tentative match between DNA from a crime scene and DNA from a convicted felon whose genetic profile was entered into the database. Federal guidelines call for confirmation within 30 days."

O'Malley Praised For Opposing Death Penalty. The Washington Post (2/1, A14, 690K) says in an editorial, "Abolishing Maryland's death penalty did not figure in Martin O'Malley's successful campaign for governor last year or in his announced agenda for this year's session of the state legislature. So the path of least resistance would have been for him to say nothing, or very little, in response to opponents of capital punishment, who are clamoring for its repeal. Instead, he has joined their fight. In doing so he has lent his fledgling administration a sense of purpose and moral clarity."

CIVIL LAW:

WellPoint Unit Settles Overcharges To FEHBP. Bloomberg (2/1, Moore) reports, "A unit of WellPoint Inc., the second- biggest U.S. health insurance provider, agreed to pay $975,000 to settle allegations of overcharging the government in Missouri, the U.S. Justice Department said." Bloomberg continues, "The settlement resolves claims that the WellPoint medical insurance unit made false claims against the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, the government said today in a statement. The U.S. alleged that WellPoint's subsidiary paid higher rates to a network of physicians than the doctors received from other plans, passing the inflated costs to the government." Bloomberg adds, "Ronald Ekstrand, a former WellPoint employee, initiated the case with a whistleblower suit under the Civil War-era False Claims Act. Total U.S. and state recoveries under the law since 1986 exceed $20 billion, with almost $1 billion announced in the first quarter of fiscal 2007, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington-based group that tracks the litigation. … The settlement 'should send a signal to all health-care providers who receive federal funds that we are committed to protecting the health-care system from fraud or abuse,' said Catherine Hanaway, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri, in the statement. … Ekstrand, the whistleblower, will receive $165,750 of the payment under a provision in the False Claims Act intended to encourage private individuals to expose frauds against the government. The government reviews such cases and decides whether to take part."

The St Louis Business Journal (2/1) reports, "The government alleged that RightCHOICE, which participates in the FEHB Program as part of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Service Benefit Plan (SBP), passed on excessive costs to the FEHB Program in connection with compensating a preferred provider network of physicians known as 'Alliance.' The government contended that RightCHOICE paid higher fees to Alliance physicians for serving patients insured through the SBP than these same physicians were reimbursed for providing the same types of services to patients insured through various other health plans. The government also alleged the physicians passed on these higher rates to the Office of Personnel Management as purportedly 'reasonable' costs to the FEHB."

FCC Proposes $10 Million Initial Payment In Radio Payola Settlement. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Davidson) reports, "The nation's four largest radio broadcasters would make payments and other contributions valued at about $10 million under a proposed settlement of a year-long probe by the Federal Communications Commission into pay-for-play claims in the music industry, say FCC officials and others with direct knowledge of the matter." USA continues, "While the FCC's three Republicans generally have backed less-punitive terms, Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps have been pushing for tougher concessions, FCC officials say. The officials requested anonymity because the proceeding is pending. … The investigation centers on claims that radio stations owned by Clear Channel Communications, CBS Radio, Entercom Communications and Citadel Broadcasting have accepted cash or gifts, known as payola, from major music labels in exchange for playing their releases." USA adds, "Under settlement terms proposed several weeks ago, the broadcasters would devote $7 million of airtime to independently produced music. The radio giants also would pay $3 million to a fund for the National Association of Broadcasters to provide training to member stations to stop payola. … But some FCC officials are concerned that the agency doesn't have the authority to require such contributions. As a result, the original proposal was expected to be pulled Wednesday night. A new proposal is expected to require the broadcasters to pay a more traditional penalty of $10 million to $15 million to the U.S. Treasury, say people with direct knowledge of the matter. They would not be identified because the proposal is still subject to negotiation." … In addition, the companies would draft compliance plans detailing which practices are unacceptable. FCC Democrats worried the original proposal did not give the agency sufficient oversight."

Big Tobacco Worried About Smoking Ban Proposals In Virginia. The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Gardner) reports, "Not too many years ago, all tobacco lobbyist Charlie Davis had to do to ensure swift defeat of anti-smoking legislation was to lean into the microphone at a committee hearing and say, 'Philip Morris opposes this bill.' … Times have changed for Philip Morris USA at the Virginia General Assembly. Lawmakers are voting this week on several bills to restrict smoking in restaurants and other public places, bills that are closer than ever to approval. And Philip Morris, the Richmond-based tobacco giant and emblem of the historic role that the golden leaf has played in Virginia's prosperity, suddenly has something to worry about. … 'They're scared, and they should be scared,' said Teresa Gregson, a lobbyist for the American Heart Association. 'It's just a matter of time before this passes.'" The Post continues, "For two years, in part to improve a public image tarnished by the ill effects of smoking, Philip Morris announced no position on proposed smoking bans across the nation. But in Virginia this year, Davis and other company representatives are meeting with lawmakers -- in their offices or in the corridors -- to steer them away from the more restrictive proposals, lawmakers said." The Post adds, "A number of bills are making their way through the legislature. Sutton would not say which proposals are acceptable to the company. A bill banning smoking in most public spaces and workplaces failed in a House subcommittee Friday, and a bill that requires restaurants to display a sign if smoking is permitted was passed. … Another version of the broader bill emerged from the Senate on Wednesday and is headed to the House of Delegates. … In part because of general anti-regulatory views in the legislature, approval of the bans is not assured. But because tobacco-growing regions have less influence than in the past -- and because of growing pressure from such vote-rich suburban regions as Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- more and more lawmakers, Republican and Democratic, are seeking smoking bans in workplaces, bars, restaurants and other places."

Study Finds States Reporting Few Medicaid Fraud Cases To Special Unit. The AP (1/31) reports, "More than half the states are sending few Medicaid fraud cases to special units established to pursue the wrongdoing, averaging less than one referral a month, The Associated Press learned Wednesday. … 'These states were rural, urban, small, large, from all regions of the country,' the internal watchdog for the Health and Human Services Department found." The AP continues, "Medicaid is the medical insurance program for the poor and is financed by the states and the federal government. … When fraud is suspected, the state Medicaid agency does the initial investigation and is supposed to turn over cases to be pursued to Medicaid Fraud Control Units -- usually part of a state's attorney general's office." The AP adds, 'On average, states spend about 18 percent of their own money on Medicaid. It is the second largest program in most state budgets, following elementary and secondary education. … The HHS inspector general, Daniel Levinson, studied the referrals for the three-year period from July 2002 through June 2005. He found: … Twenty-six of the Medicaid fraud units reported accepting, on average, no more than one referral a month from their state Medicaid agencies. Acceptance means the fraud unit retains the case for further investigation. … Twenty-one fraud control units said that in the last year of the study, they received fewer than 12 referrals each from state Medicaid agencies, an average of less than one referral per month. … In that last year, Arkansas and Connecticut had only two referrals, South Dakota had four, Virginia reported eight and Wyoming 11. … Only three fraud units received more than 100 referrals in the last year of the study: Florida (215), Arizona (192) and Texas (180). California, with the largest Medicaid program based on enrollment, reported 79." The AP notes, "The report found that while the referrals from state Medicaid agencies increased from 1,161 in 2002-03 to 1,403 and 1,470 in the next two years, the numbers are deceiving. Most of the increase came from one state, Florida. … Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, was critical of the efforts of some states. … 'You can't recover what doesn't get reported,' Grassley said. 'And if ... state agencies are reporting only part of the fraud, then whistle-blowers and others probably account for a good part of the rest of recoveries that would otherwise be lost to Medicaid fraud.'"

New Justice Unit To Target Human Trafficking. The Washington Times (2/1, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday created a Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit and assigned it the task of developing strategies to combat modern-day slavery and expand the Justice Department's anti-trafficking enforcement programs. … 'With the creation of the Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit, we will expand and enhance our ability to fight this crime by working together with federal, state and local investigators to tackle the enormous challenges posed by this evil,' Mr. Gonzales said. 'We will continue to develop new ways to help victims and to bring their captors to justice.'" The Times continues, "Human trafficking often involves the recruitment and smuggling of foreign nationals into the United States for forced labor and illicit sexual activity. … Mr. Gonzales said the unit will work to enhance the department's investigation and prosecution of significant human trafficking and slavery cases, such as multijurisdictional cases and those involving financial crimes. … It will be led, he said, by prosecutors who have brought cases against traffickers and 'freed hundreds of foreign and domestic victims from sex trafficking in brothels and forced labor in fields, homes and factories.'" The Times notes, "Mr. Gonzales has made combating human trafficking a top priority. In the past six years, the department has increased by sixfold the number of human trafficking cases filed, quadrupled the number of defendants charged and tripled the number of defendants convicted. … In fiscal 2006, the department began 168 investigations, charged 111 defendants in 32 cases and obtained 98 convictions. In fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1, the department has initiated 60 investigations, charged 26 defendants in eight cases and obtained 36 convictions."

CNN.com (2/1) reports, "The United States has launched hundreds of new investigations to combat human trafficking for prostitution and labor exploitation inside its borders, U.S. authorities have announced." CNN continues, "Calling human trafficking 'the equivalent of modern day slavery,' U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales vowed on Wednesday to keep the issue a top priority for federal law enforcement agencies. … The Justice Department also has created a unit designed to pursue human trafficking cases, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Wan Kim." CNN adds, "Justice authorities said it would be the first time the Civil Rights Division would have a team of lawyers working exclusively on human trafficking cases. … The unit initially will have four attorneys experienced in prosecuting human trafficking cases, Kim said. … Justice Department and FBI officials said they are using more attorneys and investigators to find and prosecute international human trafficking rings, which lure primarily young women from Asian, Eastern European and Latin American countries to the United States with false promises of jobs and husbands. … 'This is a perversion of the American dream. The American dream is used as a lure to attract victims,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim said. … Kim said the degree of coercion may vary, 'But nobody signs up for involuntary servitude.'"

The Washington Post (2/1, A4) also reports this story in its "Washington In Brief" section.

Tennessee Woman Pleads Guilty To Sex Trafficking. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/31, Conley, 163K) reported, "A key figure in a human-trafficking ring Monday admitted to luring underage girls to West Tennessee from Mexico and forcing them into prostitution. Cristina Andres Perfecto pleaded guilty in federal court to two counts of commercial sex trafficking, charges that could result in a lifetime prison sentence. Perfecto and her partner, Juan Mendez, were charged in November after a series of raids and the arrest of several men for running brothels in Memphis." The Commercial Appeal notes, "Mendez remains under indictment on two counts of child sex trafficking and a count of conspiracy to harbor an illegal alien." The AP (1/31) also briefly reported on Perfecto's guilty plea."

Judge Sentences Massachusetts Couple To Prison For Prostituting Teen. The AP (2/1/) reports, "A federal judge sentenced two Massachusetts residents who arranged for a child to work as a prostitute in five New England states. Robert Williams will spend nearly 13 years in prison, while Brooke Denman will serve three years probation. … They allegedly took some or all of the girl's earnings and helped her obtain false identification documents. The girl served as a prostitute between the ages of 13 and 15." The Boston Globe (2/1, 413K) notes, "The FBI and US Department of Justice investigated the case as part of the Innocence Lost initiative, a crackdown on interstate sex trafficking involving children."

FBI Opens Preliminary Investigation Of Texas Police Shooting Death. The Longview (TX) News-Journal (2/1, Koonce) reports, "The family of a 21-year-old man who was fatally shot by a Gregg County sheriff's deputy on New Year's Eve is calling for the release of documents entered in the case. At the same time, the FBI is conducting an investigation to determine whether the victim's civil rights were violated." Abel Jaimes "died after he was shot…during a suspected DWI traffic stop." The News-Journal adds, "Peter Galbraith, supervisory senior resident agent with the Tyler FBI office, said the department had an open civil rights color of law investigation into the case. Galbraith described the investigation is 'pretty standard' when there has been a shooting death by a law enforcement agent. The department will conduct a preliminary investigation and forward findings to the Department of Justice."

Prosecutors In 1964 Racial Slaying Case Will Be Challenged By Fading Memories. The AP (1/31, Pettus) reports from Jackson, MS, "Witnesses' potentially fading memories could present a challenge in the prosecution of a reputed Ku Klux Klansman who faces federal kidnapping charges in the 1964 abduction, beating and drowning of two black teenagers in Mississippi, a law professor says." The AP continues, "Mark A. Godsey, professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Law, said some witnesses might have fading memories, while others might recall details about what happened on May 2, 1964, when prosecutors say two 19-year-old hitchhikers - Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee - were seized and killed. … 'Something like this doesn't happen every day. It could be something that is very traumatic to witnesses,' said Godsey, who's faculty director and lead counsel for the Lois and Richard Rosenthal Institute for Justice/Ohio Innocence Project, where he represents convicted inmates who seek new trials because evidence such as DNA has emerged." The AP adds, "Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale, 71, has been jailed outside Jackson since federal authorities arrested him last Wednesday in Roxie, the tiny southwest Mississippi town where he lives in a motor home on land owned by his stepdaughter and her husband. He pleaded not guilty Thursday to three charges of kidnapping and conspiracy. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda R. Anderson denied Seale bond Monday, saying he was a flight risk because he has no job or property, is a pilot and lives in a vehicle that can be driven away. Anderson also said she had concerns because Seale concealed from federal authorities that he has a brother living in Louisiana. … Seale's trial is set for April 2, but that could be pushed back." The AP notes, "Paige Fitzgerald, an attorney for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said Seale took part in 'a crime so horrific it boggles the mind.' … Prosecutors say Klansmen seized Dee and Moore, took them to the Homochitto National Forest and beat them, then drove north to a site near Vicksburg where they tied heavy metal objects to the still living teenagers and tossed them into the Mississippi River. Their bodies were found about two months later as authorities dragged the river in search of three civil-rights workers who had disappeared about 180 miles away in Neshoba County. … Defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the charges against Seale, arguing that the statute of limitations has expired."

Arrests Of Florida Student After Rape Claim Outrages Victims' Advocates. USA Today (2/1, 3A, Bazar) reports, "Victims' rights groups in Florida are calling for police to review their policies after a college student was jailed within hours of reporting she had been raped." USA continues, "The woman, 21, spent two days in jail after Tampa police discovered a warrant stemming from a crime she committed as a juvenile. Her lawyer said a jail employee refused to give the woman a second dose of emergency contraception because it conflicted with the employee's religious beliefs. The unidentified employee's lawyer, Jennifer D'Angelo, told the Associated Press the employee is prohibited from giving inmates medication without specific orders." USA adds, "Tampa police apologized. On Tuesday, Chief Steve Hogue announced a policy giving officers discretion on whether to jail people reporting violent crimes who have felony warrants. 'The chief was not happy to have a rape victim end up in jail,' police spokeswoman Laura McElroy says. 'He took very swift action to make sure it doesn't happen again.' … 'Every rape-crisis program is concerned about this,' says Jennifer Dritt executive director of the Florida Council Against Sexual Violence. 'I don't know anybody who isn't outraged.'" USA notes, "Police in Kansas City, Mo., also are under scrutiny after the release Tuesday of a videotape showing officers ignoring a pregnant woman in custody who said she was bleeding and needed to go to a hospital. Sofia Salva was held overnight on traffic violations and the next morning had a miscarriage, according to a lawsuit filed Friday in Jackson County Circuit Court."

Study Finds Possible Racial Profiling At Two DC Locations. The Washington Post (2/1, B4, Klein) reports, "D.C. police officers stopped black and Hispanic pedestrians in Georgetown and Adams Morgan at higher rates than others on the street, according to a year-long study commissioned by the police department." The Post continues, "The review was the department's most ambitious examination yet of racial and ethnic profiling. It found that police appear to be targeting blacks at Wisconsin Avenue and M Street NW, in the heart of Georgetown, and Hispanics and blacks at 17th and Euclid streets, in the Adams Morgan core -- two of the city's biggest commercial and tourist magnets." The Post adds, "An outside consultant reviewed data covering traffic stops and pedestrian stops from February 2005 through January 2006 at 25 intersections across the city. The police stops were made for panhandling, jaywalking, suspicious behavior, attempted car theft and 'anything a police officer could stop a pedestrian for,' said John C. Lamberth, the author of the study. … The study flagged no problems at 23 locations and identified no concerns about traffic stops. But it raised questions about the pedestrian stops at the two intersections." The Post notes, "Lamberth's firm -- Lamberth Consulting, based in West Chester, Pa. -- specializes in racial profiling assessment. Its report said that the findings suggest that a 'limited, yet significant' number of D.C. police officers are acting 'in a manner consistent with the definition of racial profiling.' … The report urged police to bolster training and monitor police activities at the intersections, particularly those where most pedestrians are white."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Creditors Reject US Airway's Hostile Takeover Bid. The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Wilber) reports, "US Airways lost its aggressive takeover bid for Delta Air Lines yesterday when Delta's creditors rejected the $10 billion offer that would have created the nation's largest carrier." The Post continues, "The decision was a blow to US Airways' chief executive W. Douglas Parker, a blunt and fierce advocate of industry consolidation who led US Airways' merger with America West in 2005 that created the fifth-largest U.S. airline. … A committee of Delta's creditors said in a written statement that it decided against a merger because of the 'timing and risks' of concluding a deal. The creditors said they would back Delta's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection as a stand-alone airline. … Parker said in a written statement that he was 'disappointed' and that the committee was 'ignoring its fiduciary obligation' to creditors. He did not respond to interview requests." The Post notes, "Delta aggressively fought the proposal on Capitol Hill and in the news media. Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, has told creditors that it expects to be worth as much as $12 billion after emerging from Chapter 11."

USA Today (2/1, 1B, Adams) reports, "The decision appears to dampen much of the talk of an impending merger mania in the airline industry, which only recently has returned to profitability after being slammed by terrorism and recession in 2001. Wall Street analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities predicted airlines would not see anymore significant deals for a year." USA continues, "In the end, the offer of $10 billion in stock and cash did not outweigh the perceived risks. US Airways is a major Delta competitor in the East, and the combination would have created the USA's biggest domestic carrier, eclipsing American Airlines. … Critics of the merger said the Department of Justice could spend months reviewing a pending deal and ultimately block it on antitrust grounds. Delta, meanwhile, told creditors its plan calls for a speedy exit from bankruptcy and that the company would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion as a stand-alone airline."

The Washington Times (2/1, Lengell) reports, "The Atlanta airline, which has been operating in bankruptcy protection since September 2005, said it will be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion upon emerging from bankruptcy. … Delta rejected US Airways' initial offer of $4 billion and 78.5 million shares made public Nov. 15, saying the plan would burden the combined carrier with debt, face insurmountable antitrust issues, and result in job cuts and a loss of flights to smaller cities. … US Airways on Jan. 10 increased its offer to $5 billion in cash and 89.5 million shares. The stake Delta creditors would have held in the merged company rose to 49 percent from 45 percent."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/1, Grantham) reports, "Publicly, employee groups voiced vehement opposition through rallies and 'Keep Delta My Delta' buttons. The airline also enlisted political allies who raised questions about whether a merger would survive scrutiny by federal regulators. Both tactics were designed to plant doubts in creditors' minds. … Behind the scenes, the hostile bid lit a fire under Delta's effort to put forth a standalone reorganization plan that the creditors would like better than the merger offer. Delta lined up $2.5 billion in exit financing from six big Wall Street firms, announcing the arrangement just 48 hours before the creditors committee had to make a decision." The AJC continues, "Airline experts said Delta's 74-year-old chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, should get credit for rallying Delta — riven by hard times, job cuts and executive pay controversies in recent years — around the cause of independence. … The withdrawal of Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' bid clears Delta management to continue its plan to emerge from bankruptcy this spring as an independent airline. A court hearing on Delta's reorganization plan is set for Feb. 7 and could enable Delta to begin seeking creditors' votes for its plan."

Airlines Consolidation Dealt A Blow. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A8, Dade, Carey) reports, "With yesterday's collapse of US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile takeover bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the widely anticipated wave of consolidation in the U.S. airline industry is likely to remain on hold -- at least for now." The Journal continues, "The official committee of unsecured creditors for Delta yesterday rejected US Airways' $10 billion offer and formally endorsed the Atlanta airline's plan to exit bankruptcy this spring as an independent company. The publicly traded bonds of Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp., which is also operating under bankruptcy protection, slid as investors and analysts said any major mergers now may not materialize for another year or more." The Journal adds, "The failure of the deal 'moves consolidation onto the back burner for a while,' said Philip Baggaley, Standard & Poor's Corp.'s senior airline analyst. He added there is a 'reasonable chance there will be consolidation over the next year or two.' People familiar with the situation said there is little chance that discussions regarding any other combination with Delta, including earlier exploratory talks with Northwest and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines that were put on hold, would resume as long as Delta and Northwest remain in bankruptcy court."

The New York Times (2/1, Maynard, De La Merced) reports, "The deal's demise is the latest example of the difficulty any airline faces when it tries a hostile takeover of another carrier. Even friendly deals run into a myriad of problems in combining unions, routes and fleets. The task is even more complex in bankruptcy, where management essentially retains the right to put together a restructuring plan unless a judge decides otherwise, giving even the weakest carriers control over their fate. … So although industry specialists and executives have long predicted that airlines will eventually combine — as perhaps the only way they can achieve consistent profitability — others do not see that happening for the moment. … 'I thought consolidation was a lot more likely a couple of years ago,' when the industry was in the throes of its decline, said Herbert D. Kelleher, chairman and co-founder of Southwest Airlines. … Since then, however, lenders have come forward to help a number of airlines emerge from bankruptcy, including United Airlines, Aloha and Delta, which announced Tuesday that it had arranged $2.5 billion for its exit as soon as this spring."

Express Scripts Seeks More Time For FTC Review Of Caremark Bid. The AP (2/1, French) reports, "Pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. of suburban St. Louis maneuvered Wednesday for more time for an antitrust review of its hostile takeover bid for rival Caremark Rx Inc." The AP continues, "Express Scripts said it intends to voluntarily withdraw its existing Hart-Scott-Rodino filing on Friday and will refile it on Tuesday, allowing the Federal Trade Commission another 30 days to review the proposed transaction. Otherwise, the federal agency had to announce by Friday if it had antitrust concerns about the Express Scripts offer." The AP adds, "Nashville-based Caremark, which favors an acquisition offer from by CVS Corp., is the nation's second-largest pharmacy benefits manager. Express Scripts, headquartered in Maryland Heights, Mo., is No. 3. … Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS, the nation's largest operator of drugstores, announced Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Caremark for CVS stock, a deal valued currently valued at about $24.6 billion."

Delay Seen As Beneficial For CVS. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, Armstrong, Berman) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. moved to allow federal antitrust regulators more time to review the company's hostile bid for rival pharmacy-benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc., a delay that boosts a competing offer for Caremark by drugstore giant CVS Corp." The Journal continues, "The action makes it unlikely that Express Scripts can gain antitrust approval before Caremark shareholders vote on the CVS offer on Feb. 20. Under the new timetable, the Federal Trade Commission doesn't have to act on the Express Scripts matter until March 8. … That uncertainty favors the CVS deal, valued at about $25 billion, since the drugstore chain has already passed a similar FTC review and can close quickly on the deal following shareholder approval. CVS shareholders are slated to vote on the Caremark acquisition on Feb. 23." The Journal adds, "With Express's antitrust case in limbo, the company is under increasing pressure to raise its offer, which yesterday was valued at $58.87 per Caremark share. That is only about 1% greater than CVS's transaction terms, valued at $58.19, which includes a $2 per share dividend once the deal is completed. … That leaves CVS in the driver's seat, given that an Express deal is months away from completion. The exact timing, however, is what is at stake with an FTC decision. And that is why it has become such a hot debate topic among the two feuding sides. … Express Scripts said it planned to withdraw its filing with the FTC on Friday and refile it Tuesday to give the agency another 30 days to review the proposed acquisition. The company said it intends to work with the FTC to clear the transaction without a 'second request' for information, which would further delay regulatory approval."

Sanofi Seen As Well-Positioned For Successful Bristol Myers Bid. The Financial Times (2/1, Bowe, Jack, Strauss) reports, "For pharmaceutical companies considering a bid for Bristol Myers-Squibb of the US, it is the best of times and the worst of times." The Times continues, "BMS, a struggling company with promising new drugs and a good pipeline, has long seen 2007 as a pivotal point in its turnround after a having to cope with a raft of patent expiries on big drugs in recent years and serious legal troubles. It harbours considerable uncertainties for any buyer. … Yet it emerged this week that BMS and its long-standing French partner, Sanofi-Aventis, have held early-stage talks, prompting BMS to beef up its panel of investment banking advisers, adding Lehman Brothers to Citigroup and Morgan Stanley, partly to widen the field of potential interested parties. Sanofi is well placed to act fast and beat rivals to a deal. Barbara Ryan, an analyst at Deutsche Bank, says a formal bid now would be 'opportunistic'. … It would also be intriguing, she says. BMS has been operating for two years under a settlement with federal prosecutors after an accounting scandal. They appointed a corporate monitor to ensure compliance with corporate governance improvements negotiated to avoid criminal charges. This "deferred prosecution agreement" is set to end in June." The Times adds, "BMS has other legal complications, including a US justice department investigation into negotiations last year with the Canadian generic drugmaker Apotex to end a patent dispute over its blockbuster blood-thinning drug Plavix, accounting for more than a third of its earnings. The fall-out led to the firing of Peter Dolan, the chief executive. … The patent challenge over Plavix itself - for which hearings began this month - throws up more uncertainty until a decision, also expected in June. As Morgan Stanley analysts argued this week, the litigation adds to the pressure on BMS's ability to generate new cash to sustain dividend payments and commercialise its late-stage pipeline of future drugs."

Vornado To Raise Bid For Equity Office Properties. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, C2, Chittum, Sender) reports, "An investor group led by Vornado Realty Trust is expected to raise its bid for Equity Office Properties Trust, topping Blackstone Group's bid in one of the biggest buyout fights in history." The Journal continues, "The bid was set to be announced last night or before markets open today. Vornado had a deadline yesterday to complete its fact-finding or "due diligence" on whether to top Blackstone's most recent offer of $54 a share. If Vornado made such a bid, Blackstone could either go higher or claim the high road of discipline, tell investors that the price was too high and walk away with its consolation prize, a $500 million fee that it will share with investors. Equity Office is a real-estate investment trust founded by the Chicago real-estate magnate Samuel Zell." The Journal adds, "The markets had expected a bid to materialize with EOP's stock up 89 cents, or 1.6% yesterday to $55.55 as of 4 p.m. composite on the New York Stock Exchange -- and Vornado's down $1.20, or nearly 1%, to $122.35 on the Big Board. … The latest round in the bidding caps a feverish period in which both sides have been consulting with potential buyers of some of the properties in the Equity Office portfolio, the largest in the U.S. by size and value, to determine how high to go. … The contest started on Nov. 19 when Blackstone agreed to buy Equity Office for $20.1 billion, or $48.50 a share. In July, Equity Office had spurned a then-secret offer by Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth to merge the two companies. … Vornado struck back on Jan. 17 with two private-equity partners, Starwood Capital and Walton Street Capital, offering $52 a share with 40% payable in Vornado stock and the rest in cash. Blackstone returned the volley eight days later, raising its bid to $54 a share. .. The frenzied back and forth came months after conventional wisdom still held that Equity Office was too big to be taken private. Though its stock had lagged behind its peers since the start of the decade, it was a behemoth with a total capitalization (including debt) of some $36 billion, which would require the largest 'takeout deal' in history."

Nasdaq Warns Of Consequences For LSE Should Takeover Bid Fail. The Financial Times (2/1, Cohen) reports that Nasdaq has signaled it is prepared to fight a prolonged battle with the London Stock Exchange. On Wednesday, the US stock market "warned…if its hostile takeover bid failed, it could offer its technology to an LSE rival as part of moves it expects to drive down the exchange's share price." Nasdaq Chief Executive Bob Greifeld "told the Financial Times that Nasdaq could keep its 28.75 per cent stake in the LSE for 18 months." Greifeld indicated he expected the share price to fall in that time. Nasdaq "has refused to raise its offer price from £12.43 a share and looks steeled to seeing its current approach running out of time. LSE shares have stayed stubbornly close to £13, making it highly unlikely the bid will succeed."

DOJ_NMG_0125221

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

UN Panel Report Expected To Predict Warming Of 3 Degrees Celsius By 2100. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, Spotts, 59K) reports, "By 2100, retired snowbirds will be joined by 'sun birds' – who flee north to escape oppressively hot, humid summers not just in Miami, but Milwaukee as well. ... Welcome to a world where the climate is, on average, 3 degrees Celsius (5.4 degrees Fahrenheit) warmer than today. That projection – more specific than any previous one – is just one element expected to emerge this week as some 500 scientists from around the world gather to put the finishing touches on a major report on the Earth's climate and what the future may hold for it." It is "the first of three volumes set for release this year by the UN-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change." Details "remain closely held until its release Friday morning. Leaks to the press based on earlier drafts, however, suggest that the researchers are projecting temperature increases of between 2 and 4.5 degrees C (3.6 and 8.1 degrees F.) by century's end if carbon-dioxide concentrations in the atmosphere reach twice their preindustrial levels. Their 'most likely' increase is expected to be about 3 degrees C."

US Firms Said To Lag In Climate Change Readiness. The Financial Times (2/1, Birchall) reports, "US companies are lagging behind Europe in their readiness to identify climate-change risks, according to the most comprehensive survey to date of industry awareness of the issues." The Times adds, "Only 47 per cent of the members of the S&P 500 index responded to a request last year for information on their assessment of climate change risk ... . In contrast, 76 per cent of the members of the FT 500 index responded to the same questionnaire." The "report on the responses was prepared for Ceres, a coalition of investors and environmental groups, and Calvert, one of the largest US socially-concerned investment firms. It comes amid growing corporate awareness of climate change risk in the US."

Chirac Says US Must Sign Climate Agreements Or Face Tax. The New York Times (2/1, Bennhold, 1.16M) reports, "President Jacques Chirac has demanded that the United States sign both the Kyoto climate protocol and a future agreement that will take effect when the Kyoto accord runs out in 2012. He said that he welcomed last week's State of the Union address in which President Bush described climate change as a 'serious challenge.'" But "he warned that if the United States did not sign the agreements, a carbon tax across Europe on imports from nations that have not signed the Kyoto treaty could be imposed to try to force compliance." The Times adds, "Trade lawyers have been divided over the legality of a carbon tax, with some saying it would run counter to international trade rules. But Mr. Chirac said other European countries would back it."

Professor Says Climate Change Framework Is Well Established. In a Washington Post (2/1, A15, 690K) op-ed, science history professor Naomi Oreskes writes, "With the release of the new report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change tomorrow,...many will be looking for what's new." But "from a policy perspective" what matters is "that the broad framework is established beyond a reasonable doubt. Although few people realize it, this framework has been in place for nearly half a century." One "early warning that we 'will modify the heat balance of the atmosphere to such an extent that marked changes in climate . . . could occur' came in 1965 from the Environmental Pollution Board of the President's Science Advisory Committee. While the Bush administration has been loath to accept this reality," the Johnson Administration "accepted it as a statement of scientific fact." In 1992, the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change "called for immediate action to reverse the trend of mounting greenhouse gas emissions. One early signatory was President George H.W. Bush, who called on world leaders to translate the written document into 'concrete action to protect the planet.'" The "treaty was unanimously ratified by the Senate." Oreskes concludes, "In 1965, the concern that greenhouse gases would lead to global warming was a prediction. Today, it is an established scientific fact."

Ethanol Transportation Strains Railroads. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B1, Brat, Machalaba, 2.04M) reports that "as ethanol producers ramp up production, they are straining railroads already taxed by burgeoning shipments of coal, containers and grain. And they worry that the transportation crunch could make it difficult for ethanol, despite its surge of support in Washington, to compete with energy rivals." Because ethanol cannot be shipped through the pipelines that move gasoline, natural gas and oil, "the ethanol industry has been forced into a marriage with the already groaning railroads." Although few "think the strains will derail the boom," "ethanol's popularity has meant that producers have had to struggle to upgrade their rail yards and secure enough tank and grain cars to efficiently ship both ethanol and its byproducts."

Ethanol Imports Soar Despite Tariff. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, B1, Etter, 2.04M) reports, "Even as the U.S. looks to ethanol as a way to wean itself off foreign petroleum supplies, imports of the biofuel are soaring. Despite a sharp tariff levied on most ethanol shipped from abroad, importers are finding they can compete with domestic ethanol on price." The "surge in imports has yet to cause political backlash because U.S. ethanol supplies haven't caught up with demand. But tensions could arise this year as production at a slew of new domestic ethanol plants threatens to outstrip demand." The "ethanol industry benefits from a 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit as well as a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff levied on most imports. The tariff drives up the price of imported ethanol. Neither subsidy is likely to change despite Bush administration hints that it wouldn't mind seeing the tariff disappear."

Wessel Says Bush Plan Would Make Ethanol Tax Credit, Tariff Unnecessary. In his Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, 2.04M) column, David Wessel evaluates President Bush's energy initiative, writing, "Bush is allergic to anything that smells like a tax. So he opted for a not-very-Republican alternative. He would use the government's muscle to force Americans -- or more precisely, the companies that blend motor fuel -- to consume less gasoline than they otherwise would and more of something else." It "isn't the economists' first choice, but economists don't often run for office. The president's proposal has some logic: The government isn't picking winners, just guaranteeing lasting demand for alternatives to gasoline." Wessel adds, "With all that guaranteed demand, more than makers of corn-based ethanol could ever meet, one might think there was no longer any need for the 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit for ethanol." One "might also think that...there is little reason to continue a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff on imports of sugar-derived ethanol from Brazil." But Bush "didn't say anything about repealing the tax credit" or the tariff. The "reason has little to do with economics, and a lot to do with the politics of corn."

Federal Judge Schedules Near Hearing On "Divine Strake" Challenge. The AP (2/1) reports from Las Vegas, "A federal judge told government lawyers Wednesday he wants to be kept closely informed on plans for a non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would send a mushroom-shaped dust cloud high over the Nevada desert." The AP continues, "With no date set for the test, dubbed 'Divine Strake,' U.S. District Court Judge Lloyd George set another status hearing March 2, and said he wants to see a draft environmental assessment prepared about the Defense Threat Reduction Agency experiment. … 'I'll pay a lot of attention to this case, I assure you,' the judge said." The AP adds, "Justice Department lawyer Caroline Blanco said if a date is picked for the explosion, it will be at least 30 days after the environmental assessment is completed and a finding is made that the explosion would pose no significant threat to the environment or people. … Blanco, speaking by conference call from Washington, D.C., said that until a decision is made to go ahead, it was premature to address opponents' claims that the test will kick up and spread radioactive dust from the Nevada Test Site. … Robert Hager, a Reno-based lawyer representing Western Shoshone tribe members and 'downwinders' in Utah and Nevada, said that he plans to challenge flaws in the environmental assessment. … The document has been the focus of public meetings this month in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, where elected officials have questioned the safety of the experiment. It was postponed last year after Hager filed suit."

Quirk In Law Leaves Many Native Americans Without Counsel. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A1, Fields) reports, "The right of defendants to legal counsel is guaranteed by the Constitution. But due to a little-known quirk in federal law, Native Americans aren't assured this protection. That's because under U.S. law, Indian tribes are considered sovereign nations, and are not subject to all privileges afforded by the Bill of Rights." The Journal continues, "The country's 560 tribes are largely responsible for funding government services such as schools, police, and hospitals, as well as courts. The tribes have jurisdiction over crimes committed on reservations by the nation's 2.4 million American Indian and Alaska Natives. … Many of these tribal courts, like their federal and state counterparts, have their own prosecutors, tribe-appointed judges and jail facilities. Court proceedings can be judge or jury trials. There are 275 such courts in the U.S., each governed by the laws of an individual tribe or village. According to the U.S. Justice Department, more than 9,200 Native Americans convicted in tribal courts are locked up in tribal facilities or local jails off tribal lands." The Journal adds, "Mostly absent from this parallel justice system are public defenders -- a luxury that many poor tribes say they cannot afford. The defense gap means that accused criminals often end up representing themselves. As a result, many plead guilty and risk exposing themselves to additional charges at the federal and state levels. In some instances, they may be subject to double jeopardy -- two trials, sentences and punishments for the same crime. … The Indian Civil Rights Act, passed in 1968, gave individual tribe members some protections, such as the right to a speedy trial and the right to a trial by jury. But it did not provide the right to counsel for defendants too poor to hire attorneys. … Over the years, various congressional bills have sought to address the problem of tribal defense funding. Last year, Arizona Sen. John McCain, then chair of the Indian Affairs Committee, held a hearing to argue for more government assistance. The issue has yet to gain traction."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Schumer Proposes Plan To Fight Gang Violence, Drug Dealing Nationwide. The Journal News (1/31) in White Plains reported U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer has "proposed spending more than $1 billion and passing tougher laws to fight a nationwide surge in gang violence and drug dealing. Schumer unveiled a staff report showing a rise in violent crime and drug arrests across New York from 2000 to 2005 as an example for the entire country. The Gang Abatement and Prevention Act of 2007 includes spending $1 billion over five years for law enforcement to fight gangs on the streets and $50 million for police and educational programs in schools."

Empire State News (2/1) reports Schumer "released a new report showing that there has been a 10-percent increase in reports of violent crime and a nearly 20 percent jump in the number of drug arrests in cities and communities across upstate New York. 'Every sheriff, every police commissioner, the DEA, shows that a remarkably high percentage these days of both violent crimes and drug arrests are gang-related.'"

Pro Leagues Face Criticism For Not Requiring HGH Blood Tests For Athletes. The AP (2/1) reports Olympic athletes "soon will have their blood tested for human growth hormone, but the NFL and baseball officials instead are embracing the unproven concept of urine testing in their bid to stop use of the performance-enhancing drug. Critics question whether the pro leagues truly are intent on rooting out HGH, thought to be widely abused because no one currently is testing for it. But baseball and football officials say they are stymied by union contracts that prohibit taking blood from players, and they cite privacy concerns and doubts about the accuracy of blood tests." The World Anti-Doping Agency "plans to test the blood of elite amateur athletes by the end of this year. The agency's chief, Dick Pound, dismissed efforts by the NFL, Major League Baseball and their unions as 'a piddling little amount' spent on unproven technology to combat a major problem."

House Subcommittee Leaders Back Mitchell's Steroids Investigation. The AP (2/1) reports Congress "is monitoring George Mitchell's investigation of steroids in baseball and could intervene if he doesn't get more cooperation. The leaders of a House subcommittee that held hearings on steroids in 2005 pledged their support for Mitchell in a letter sent to him Tuesday and released to the media Wednesday. 'We sincerely hope that all relevant parties will work constructively to facilitate the completion of your investigation and your ongoing efforts to clean up the sport,' wrote House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade, and Consumer Protection chairman Bobby Rush, a Democrat from Illinois, and ranking Republican Cliff Stearns of Florida."

The New York Times (1/31, Curry) reported that by "warning the owners that Congress could again get involved with baseball and steroids, Mitchell is trying to persuade more people within the sport to testify. If nothing else, Mitchell has now succeeded in getting a reaction from Congress. 'We appreciate your warning to team owners and concur with your recommendation for better cooperation with your independent investigation,' Rush and Stearns wrote."

Bush Administration May Shift More Plan Colombia Resources Toward Economic Development. In Bogota, the Miami Herald (2/1) reports the Bush administration "will seek almost $600 million from Congress this year to aid Plan Colombia II, the second phase of a multi-pronged effort to battle drug trafficking and insurgency. The strategy may include shifting more resources to economic development projects, administration officials said Wednesday. … Analysts in Colombia, however, were skeptical that there would be any significant changes to Plan Colombia and considered possible alterations in terms of the Bush administration's efforts to appease the Democrat-controlled Congress in Washington."

Deputy Marshal Pleads Not Guilty To Alleged Mob Leak. The Chicago Tribune (2/1) reports, "A deputy U.S. marshal pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges that he leaked confidential information that a mob hit man was cooperating with the FBI against organized crime." The Tribune continues, "John Ambrose was charged last month with telling a family friend that Nicholas Calabrese, the only member of the Chicago Outfit ever to become a government informant, was releasing details of gangland slayings." The Tribune adds, "Ambrose's alleged role as the inside source came to light in cryptic conversations between imprisoned Outfit boss James Marcello and his brother, Michael, that were secretly recorded by the FBI. … Following Wednesday's arraignment, Ambrose's lawyer, Francis Lipuma, said he has been told that federal officials plan to place Ambrose on unpaid leave from his job, but Lipuma intends to fight the move. He is currently on paid leave."

IMMIGRATION:

US Seeks Dismissal Of Cuban Militant's Bid For Freedom. The AP (2/1, Caldwell) reports from El Paso, "U.S. immigration officials have asked a federal judge to toss out Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles' bid to be set free pending his ordered deportation." The AP continues, "In a four-page motion filed Wednesday in El Paso, the government argued that Posada's lawsuit is moot because he was transferred to the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service after being indicted Jan. 11. He had filed the lawsuit last year after spending nearly a year in a federal detention center on an immigration violation. He has been charged with several counts of lying during an interview and on an application in a bid to become a naturalized U.S. citizen. … Posada, who has pleaded not guilty, is being held without bond at the Otero County jail in New Mexico." The AP adds, "The motion was filed a day before a court-imposed deadline for immigration authorities to justify Posada's continued detention pending his deportation. … A federal immigration judge ruled in 2005 that Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier who had roles in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba and the Iran-Contra scandal, had to leave the U.S. But Judge William L. Abbott also ruled that the ailing anti-Castro militant could not be sent to Venezuela, where is a naturalized citizen, or Cuba, where he was born, because of fears that he would be tortured. … Governments of both countries want Posada sent to Venezuela to stand trial on charges that he was in Caracas when he planned the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner. Posada has denied any wrongdoing. … Several countries, including Mexico, have refused to let Posada in and Posada has argued that he should be set free while the government continues efforts to find some place to send him."

Plan To Increase Immigration Fees Draws Criticism. The Washington Post (2/1, A7, Fears, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) joined a chorus of immigrant advocacy groups in condemning the Bush administration's plan to charge legal immigrants significantly more money to obtain green cards, adjust their residency status and bring relatives to the United States." Kennedy said the "drastic increase will price the American dream out of reach for qualified immigrants wanting to be citizens of our country," and "called on Congress to appropriate more money to USCIS, which depends on fees for 99 percent of its budget." The senators "comments were echoed by Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the US Conference of Catholic Bishops: 'This increase reflects a disturbing trend which places the benefits of citizenship on the open market, with only those of a certain economic level able to access it.'"

The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 88K) reports CIS "said the increases will pay for more employees and equipment, reducing wait times. Director Emilio Gonzalez said immigrants will 'see the difference' in service." The Times adds, "On the other side of the ledger, Mr. Gonzalez has proposed eliminating the fee for applying for a visa as a victim of human trafficking. The fees would go into effect in about six months, after a public-comment period that begins today. The fees would add $1 billion to the agency's $2 billion annual budget."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Clark, Chardy) reports immigration advocates compared the proposed fee increase "to a 'second wall' that could make it harder for many new arrivals to earn US citizenship." McClatchy also notes Kennedy's opposition to the increase, and adds that Rep. Zoe Lofgren, the chair of the immigration subcommittee, "said she planned to 'carefully examine' the agency's justification for the increases."

TAX:

Massachusetts Man Faces Tax Fraud Charges. The Lowell (MA) Sun (2/1) reports, "A Groton (MA) resident faces charges in U.S. District Court for defrauding the government on his tax returns." The Sun continues, "According to the U.S. Justice Department, Joseph K. Berardi, 50, failed to report his sales to S. Strogoff & Co. a scrap-metal dealer in Chelsea, as taxable income on his federal returns in 1997, 1998 and 1999. He is believed to be one of the parties involved in a conspiracy to defraud the government of tax revenue." The Sun adds, "Yale Strogoff, of Swampscott, pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud the government in 2004. Strogoff conspired with his customers to pay those customers checks payable to fictitious payees for scrap metal sold to his company. Strogoff also arranged for the banks to cash the checks with no identification required. The customers would then keep the money for themselves instead of recording it as corporate income. … If convicted, Berardi faces up to three years in prison with another year of probation, and a fine of up to $250,000."

Wal-Mart Avoids State Taxes By Paying Itself Rent. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A1, Drucker) reports, "As the world's biggest retailer, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. pays billions of dollars a year in rent for its stores. Luckily for Wal-Mart, in about 25 states it has been paying most of that rent to itself -- and then deducting that amount from its state taxes." The Journal continues, "The strategy is complex, but the bottom line is simple: It has saved Wal-Mart from paying several hundred million dollars in taxes, according to court records and a person familiar with the matter. And Wal-Mart is far from alone." The Journal adds, "The arrangement takes advantage of a tax loophole that the federal government plugged decades ago, but which many states have been slower to catch. Here's how it works: One Wal-Mart subsidiary pays the rent to a real-estate investment trust, or REIT, which is entitled to a tax break if it pays its profits out in dividends. The REIT is 99%-owned by another Wal-Mart subsidiary, which receives the REIT's dividends tax-free. And Wal-Mart gets to deduct the rent from state taxes as a business expense, even though the money has stayed within the company. … Partly thanks to sophisticated financial strategies like these, states' tax collections from companies have been plummeting. On average, Wal-Mart has paid only about half of the statutory state tax rates for the past decade, according to Standard & Poor's Compustat, which collects data from SEC filings. The so-called 'captive REIT' strategy alone cut Wal-Mart's state taxes by about 20% over one four-year period. Now several state regulators are trying to crack down on the strategy, used largely by retailers and banks, and some other states have changed their laws to try to end the practice. Yesterday, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer included elimination of the loophole as part of his proposed budget, a fix he said would bring the state $83 million a year. … North Carolina tax authorities are challenging Wal-Mart, saying its REIT strategy was intended to 'distort [the company's] true net income,' according to its filings in the case in Superior Court in Raleigh, N.C. … Regulators in at least a half-dozen states are going after companies that have trimmed their taxes through similar arrangements, including Regions Financial Corp.'s AmSouth Bancorp. unit; AutoZone Inc. of Memphis, Tenn.; and two units of Bank of America Corp."

IRS, Consumer Advocates To Promote Earned Income Tax Credit. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Block, 2.27M) reports the IRS, the US Treasurer and "a coalition of consumer groups plan to launch a nationwide initiative today to encourage more low-income families to claim the earned income tax credit, an often-overlooked benefit that's worth up to $4,536 this year." Consumer advocates "and the IRS say they hope the program will also reduce the number of low-income taxpayers who take out refund-anticipation loans — high-interest loans offered by some tax-preparation companies. Though the use of those loans fell by more than 20% in the 2005 tax-filing season, they're still used by about 30% of EITC recipients, says Chi Chi Wu of the National Consumer Law Center."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Touts Economy, Addresses "Income Inequality" In Visit To Wall Street. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 6, :50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush was…in New York today, on Wall Street, where he criticized those giant salaries and bonus us for CEO's. He said corporate boards should take more responsibility to tie executive pay to performance. He was then greeted by spontaneous applause on the trading floor of the New York Stock Exchange. A photo op meant to emphasize an economy that he says is stronger than he gets credit for."

The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) also noted that "in New York, to talk up the economy…Bush surprised traders at the stock exchange by dropping by for an unannounced visit," while ABC World News (1/31, story 3, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) said the President "got a very warm welcome. Indeed, feelings were warm all day long, for stock traders." ABC (Stark) added, "The President was back on the offensive again today…steering the conversation…to the economy." Wall Street "is certainly friendly territory. It's hard to imagine a warmer reception than the one the President got today from traders on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. But his message to the nation's leading capitalists was laced with tough love. At a speech at Federal Hall, he first made a nod to the outrage sparked by CEOs getting giant severance packages after being fired for poor performances." Bush was shown saying, "The salaries and bonuses on CEOs, should be based on success and improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders. We need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve." Bush, "for the first time," also "acknowledged that not everyone has shared equally in the recent economic prosperity." Bush: "The fact is that income inequality is real. It's been rising for more than 25 years. And the question is, whether we respond to the income of the inequality we see with policies that help lift people up, or tear others down."

The Washington Post (2/1, A4, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) reports Democrats "said Bush's speech is a reaction to the success of their agenda and to growing anger among voters who feel they are being left behind. 'They recognize the unhappiness voters have with inequity in this country,' said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee. 'For much of last year, they tried to deny this. But the election finally clinched it. So I guess there's no point in denying it anymore.'" The Post adds, "Bush aides did not deny that Bush was seeking to address Democratic concerns, but they said income inequality has been on the minds of senior administration officials such as Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who mentioned the subject in his first major address last spring, and chief economic adviser Edward Lazear." The Washington Times (2/1, Dinan, 88K) also focuses on Bush's comments on "income inequality," and describes Bush's message as "markedly populist."

The President's visit to New York was widely reported on by local TV stations throughout the country. The coverage often focused on Bush's comments about executive salaries. In a report typical of much of the local coverage, WCBS-TV New York (1/31, 11:05 pm) said in its broadcast, "Bush was in the city today to talk about the state of the economy and to take large American corporations to task on fat executive bonuses." The report added the President "paid a surprise visit to the New York Stock Exchange floor, where he mingled with traders." CLTV-TV Chicago (1/31, 9:55 pm) noted Bush "played up lower inflation, interest rates and rising wages."

A significant number of local TV newscasts across the country showed the President saying, "Government should not decide the compensation for America's corporate executives. But the salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders." Among them were WPBN-TV Traverse City, MI (1/31, 11:09 pm), KYMA-TV Yuma, AZ (1/31, 10:01 pm), WWBT-TV Richmond (1/31, 5:35 pm), and WAVE-TV Louisville (1/31, 5:12 pm).

White Bush's visit to Wall Street was mentioned in most reports dealing with yesterday's economic news, most print reports focusing solely on the President largely address his comments on CEO compensation. The AP (2/1, Feller), for example, says he issued "a sharp warning for corporate boards to 'step up to their responsibilities' and tie compensation packages to performance."

The New York Times (2/1, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Bush's comments on CEO pay "were met with silence from an otherwise friendly crowd gathered to hear what the White House billed as a 'State of the Economy' speech." However, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, Hamilton, 850K) titled its report "Bush Sides With Corporations On Executive Pay Issue," and says Bush argued "corporate directors, not government officials, should be the ones to judge whether chief executives are earning their keep."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, McKinnon, Conkey, 2.04M), meanwhile, in a story headlined "Bush Gives Hope To Foes Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law," says that that in his speech, Bush "backed business demands to pare post-Enron reforms, which he called 'costly for businesses.' But he also used the forum to join the chorus of critics questioning lavish executive pay."

USA Today (2/1, Jackson, 2.27M) reports that in his speech yesterday, Bush also "called on Congress to extend tax cuts and renew 'fast track' trade authority, which requires Congress to cast an up-or-down vote on any international trade deal and make no amendments to the agreements." The President "highlighted the economy's growth and low unemployment and noted the earnings gap between the rich and poor is twice what it was in 1980. The president said an improved education system is vital to lifting wages and repeated his call for Congress to renew his No Child Left Behind education law."

The New York Times (2/1, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports the President "may be buffeted by bad news out of Iraq and record-low poll ratings, but he was buoyed on yesterday by positive economic signals. And he purposely chose Wall Street as the arena for his message that the economy is vibrant, a theme his aides hope can help him rebuild his flagging support. … With Democrats and some Republicans continuing to discuss resolutions critical of his new plan for Iraq in Washington, Mr. Bush used his speech earlier at Federal Hall to flaunt new economic data."

Bush Touts Positive Economic News In Wide-Ranging Interview. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed Bush yesterday before his visit to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. In an interview that touched on a variety of subjects, including Iraq, Katrina, and his post-2008 plans, the President was eager to tout the positive economic news released yesterday. Said Bush "War's difficult. It's negative. And, so, I'm not surprised that some of the good economic news is overshadowed by the -- the difficult news out of Iraq." But instead of focusing on negative press, Bush said he was "more concerned about than anything is whether or not people are putting more money in their pocket -- personal income was up by about 5 percent last quarter -- you know, whether people are finding jobs, and -- but, equally importantly, whether or not the policies we're working with Congress on will make this economy good, you know, in the future."

Bush Blasts Rationale For Higher "Taxes On The Rich." In his interview with Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto), Bush was asked to respond to Democratic claims that tax hikes on "the upper income" were justified by excessive CEO pay packages, Bush said, "That's the old saw, you know, raise the taxes on the rich. And, when you try to raise taxes on the rich, you also raise taxes on small business owners, sole-proprietorships, Subchapter S corporations. You know, it turns out that these tax increases are going to have to reach fairly far down the income level to meet the spending appetite of the Democrats."

Economy Grew At 3.5% Last Quarter. The CBS Evening News (1/31, story 5, :25, Couric, 7.66M) said "the US is economy is picking up after growing just 2% in the third quarter of last year. It gained strength in the final quarter, growing 3.5%." The AP (2/1, Aversa) reports "the economy snapped out of a sluggish spell and grew at a faster-than-expected" rate, adding the data "underscored the resilience of the economy; it has managed to keep on moving despite the ill effects of the residential real-estate bust and an ailing automotive sector." The Washington Post (2/1, A1, Henderson, 690K) says "the US economy turned in a surprisingly strong performance last year, new data show," dispelling "any lingering doubts about the momentum of the economy going into this year. Many economists predict growth will slow this year, but gone are the recession worries of last summer." The Financial Times (2/1, Callan), Wall Street Journal (2/1, Whitehouse, 2.04M), New York Times (2/1, Peters, 1.16M), Christian Science Monitor (2/1, 59K), Washington Times (2/1, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/1, Havemann, 850K), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

Fed Holds Rates Steady, Deliver Positive Economic Assessment. The AP (2/1, Aversa) reports, "Pointing to a revved-up economy and encouraging news on inflation, the Federal Reserve held interest rates steady on Wednesday and extended a half-year breather for US borrowers." Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "and his central bank colleagues left an important interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, the fifth straight meeting without budging the rate. The decision was unanimous." Fed policymakers also "delivered a more positive assessment of the economy than in December, recognizing improvements in economic growth, inflation and even the troubled housing sector. 'Overall, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace over coming quarters,' they said." USA Today (2/1, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) describes the Fed as "more upbeat economic assessment than in recent months," while the Financial Times (2/1, Guha, Callan, Beales) notes the central bank "signaled growing confidence that the economy was heading for a soft landing." Its report "cited progress on inflation, noting 'readings on core inflation have improved modestly in recent months.'" The New York Times (2/1, Andrews, 1.16M) and Washington Post (2/1, Henderson, 690K) also report the story. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A2, Ip, Whitehouse, 2.04M), meanwhile, reports there has been growing praise for Bernanke among economists following the last economic reports.

Stocks Soar Following Fed Announcement. NBC Nightly News (1/31, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported that after the Fed announcement, the Dow soared "up to 98 points [to close at 12,621.69] to a new record close. NASDAQ was up more that 15 points [to close at 2,463.93] on today's trading." The AP (2/1, Paradis) says the Federal Reserve "answered two of Wall Street's major concerns, indicating that the economy remains healthy and that inflation pressures are easing." The Washington Times/AP (2/1) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 9.42, or 0.66 percent." Similar stories on the soaring market appear in USA Today (2/1, 5B, 2.27M), the Wall Street Journal (2/1, C1, McKay, 2.04M) and New York Times (2/1, 1.16M), among other sources. USA Today (2/1, 4B, Shell, 2.27M) also reports that "if January lives up to its reputation as a good predictor of future stock market performance, then 2007 is likely to be another profitable year for stock investors." However, the New York Times (2/1, Bajaj, 1.16M) runs a story titled "What Could Bog Down The Bull," in which it says, "Investors may want to enjoy it while they can. The road ahead promises to be a long, hard slog as corporate profits are starting to slow."

Bush Warns Against Lurch Toward Disengagement, Isolationism. On its editorial page, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, A16, 2.04M) recounts the President's meeting yesterday with the Journal's editorial board, noting, "If Mr. Bush is beaten down by the polls and his party's loss of Congress, he isn't showing it. The President talked about a wide range of subjects, from warrantless wiretaps, to the politics of immigration, to diplomacy with North Korea." But Bush's "biggest theme was pushing back against what he feared might be a national lurch away from engagement with the world." Bush said, "I'm concerned about protectionism, isolationism." The Journal adds, "In his speech yesterday he hit on the need for new trade promotion authority. And in his conversation with us he also stressed his familiar arguments about the stakes of failure in Iraq." Asked about his decision to "change gears" on the NSA warrantless wiretap program, Bush said, "'Scrap the program' is not accurate. The program exists. And now we've had a program ratified by the judiciary which is going to make it easier for a future President to have this program in place. . . . It had nothing to do with diminution of Presidential authority. It had everything to do with getting a second branch of government to support that which I have done." The Journal adds, "It sounds to us as if the President believes he's made a tactical concession in order to achieve what he thinks is a larger strategic victory. Let's hope he's right." The Wall Street Journal (2/1, A16, 2.04M) also ran extensive excerpts of its interview with the Journal's editorial board.

WSJournal Says Those Predicting A Recession Were Wrong. The Wall Street Journal (2/1, 2.04M) editorializes, "If the US economy keeps growing like it is, Rodney Dangerfield is going to have to rise from the dead and file a patent claim. The expansion that gets no respect keeps cruising along -- past $70 oil, above rising interest rates, and now apparently around even the housing and auto slumps. Yesterday's report that fourth quarter GDP rose a healthy 3.5% was merely the most recent repudiation of the media and Beltway bears who have predicted a recession in each of the past four years." The "latest scare came last fall, as the decline in housing accelerated and many of Wall Street's Keynesian forecasters predicted the consumer would slump along with it. (We hope someone offered smelling salts to the economists at Goldman Sachs yesterday.) To the contrary, the consumer remains confident."

Bush Praised For Promoting Free Trade. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, 850K) says in an editorial that Bush "has never worked harder to promote free trade. On Wednesday, he made a powerful case on Wall Street for extending his fast-track trade negotiating authority, though even more impressive was his effort the day before to explain to factory workers in East Peoria, Ill., why they should care about such off-the-radar topics as the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks." The US economy "is as strong as it is because of, not in spite of, the world's increased openness. But this is a message the president has not done an effective job of selling in the past, and it's a message that plenty of Democrats in the new Congress do not embrace, given their ties to narrower interests adversely affected by competition. So Bush now has a tough fight ahead of him."

Bush Seeks To Cut Farm Program Funds. The AP (2/1, Quaid) reports, "Thousands of the richest farmers would lose their government subsidies under a Bush administration plan to curb spending." Proposals released Wednesday "would reduce agriculture spending by $18 billion over the next five years." They "represent President Bush's vision of a new farm bill: a system of supports that would protect farm income and crop prices and keep food prices stable." The AP notes that anyone "making more than $200,000 in adjusted gross income would be cut off from farm payments under Bush's plan."

The New York Times says that "if approved by Congress, [the farm bill] would also reduce some trade-distorting payments that have gotten the United States into trouble with the World Trade Organization, and might put pressure on the European Union to reduce its own farm subsidies, steps that could restart stalled global trade talks." However, "aspects of the plan, especially the proposal to cut off payments to farmers earning more than $200,000 a year, are already rankling some farm groups." Mary Kay Thatcher, a lobbyist with the American Farm Bureau Federation, "said farmers would have 'serious concerns' about that provision." On the other hand, "the Agriculture Department was able to propose billions in increased spending on some programs because of expectations that prices for commodities like corn, soybeans and wheat would be much higher." For example, "The proposal would increase conservation financing…by $7.8 billion and direct almost $5 billion to … 'specialty' growers. … It would also provide $1.6 billion for research and development on cellulosic ethanol, which comes from agricultural waste and nonfood crops."

In an front page story, the Washington Post (2/1, Morgan, Gaul, 690K) reports, "The administration proposal addressed a number of problems raised last year in a nine-part series in The Washington Post." For example, "The plan would close a major loophole highlighted by The Post that in 2005 allowed corn farmers to receive $3.8 billion more than needed to ensure they got the government-guaranteed price." Farmers "would no longer be able to collect these 'loan deficiency payments' when prices are low and then sell later when prices rise." In reaction to the bill, Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) said "there were 'a number of good ideas' but also complained that the proposal shortchanged a key conservation program he had created as well as spending on biofuels."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, Hitt, 2.04M) adds that the proposed spending increases on conservation and direct income payments "are more acceptable than subsidies of specific crops under the World Trade Organization." The Journal notes that the "unveiling of the administration's new farm package came as WTO chief Pascal Lamy signaled that he intends to formally reconvene negotiations in the Doha Round." However, "US Trade Representative Susan Schwab "said the Doha Round is not going to write the farm bill." She asserted that "the changes outlined yesterday should send 'a signal to our trading partners that we care about farm reforms.'" The Washington Times/AP (2/1) and The Hill (2/1, Swanson) also report on the Administration proposals.

House Committee To Probe Bush Signing Statements. The Politico (2/1) reports the House Judiciary Committee "has launched an investigation challenging repeated assertions by President Bush that he need not enforce aspects of laws he deems unconstitutional." Committee members "clashed over the validity of the investigation, which began with a committee hearing on Wednesday. Democrats said Bush is overstepping his executive role and meddling with the legislative process. Republicans maintained the president's assertions are merely guiding interpretations and follow long-term precedent." The investigation "will cover Bush's commentary on bills approved by both congressional chambers that require presidential approval."

McClatchy (2/1, Douglas) reports Bush "has issued 147 signing statements," according to Sen. Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee." Roll Call (2/1, Yachnin) notes House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers says his investigation "would include both Democratic and Republican staff and will focus on the approximately 150 signing statements issued by Bush, which the American Bar Association estimates have affected more than 1,100 provisions of federal law."

Bush Says He's Found Presidency An "Exhilarating, Joyous Experience." Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed President Bush yesterday. Asked if he was eager for the end of his term, Bush said, "No, not yet. I mean, I'm -- I have got two years to go, and I'm going to sprint to the finish. I have got too much on my mind to worry about, you know, standing in the polls or what life's going to be in 2009. I'm -- this may come as a shock to you, but I have found this to be an exhilarating, joyous experience. I love representing our country."

Hoyer Open To Negotiations On Social Security. Fox Your World With Neil Cavuto (1/31, Cavuto) interviewed House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, who said, "All of us need to come to the table to solve Social Security without preconditions, without saying you either do this or that or you don't do this or that. I think we can get Social Security on a sound fiscal footing for the foreseeable future if we work together. … I have talked to Secretary Paulson, the secretary of the Treasury. He clearly is very focused on accomplishing that objective. And I have indicated that I am willing to work with and look forward to working with him." Asked if raising the Social Security threshold from $97,500 would be raising taxes, Hoyer said, "Is it taking more money from some people? It is. And in that sense, is it raising taxes? Yes, it is. Obviously, that level has been an arbitrary level over time. It's reflected the needs of the Social Security system, so that a number of people have suggested that is one solution, not to raise the tax level but to raise the income subject to the tax. … The issue is, is there a free lunch?"

Democrats Pass $463.5 Billion Spending Bill. USA Today (2/1, 5A, 2.27M) reports, "The House of Representatives passed a $463.5 billion spending bill Wednesday that covers about one-sixth of the federal budget. The vote was 286-140." The bill "would increase spending on education, veterans, health research and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies. The legislation would cut President Bush's budget requests for NASA, foreign aid and aid for communities affected by the latest round of military base closings. The measure heads to the Senate. Bush has signaled he will sign it."

The AP (2/1, Taylor) notes "a sizable chunk of Republicans joined virtually all Democrats in approving spending increases for education, veterans and the AIDS battle in Africa." The vote, "with 57 Republicans voting in favor -- was a pleasant surprise for Democrats who expected far less GOP support. … The winning vote would have been even higher had there not been such hard feelings over how Democrats powered the bill through the House: just an hour of debate time, no amendments allowed." Republicans also "said the measure was not entirely free of parochial 'earmarks,' saying powerful senators such as Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Pete Domenici, R-N.M., received special treatment for home-state projects." The White House "has signaled that President Bush would sign the bill despite cuts to his requests for NASA, foreign aid and communities affected by the latest round of military base closings."

In a similar report, the Wall Street Journal (2/1, A4, Rogers, 2.04M) titles its story "House Democrats Show Strength In Passage Of Spending Measure," and calls the vote the "strongest showing yet of their new legislative muscle."

The Washington Post (2/1, A4, Kane, 690K) headlines its report "House Passes $463 Billion Spending Bill After Deleting Earmarks," and calls the measure "an austere plan stripped of billions of dollars worth of special-interest provisions."

The Washington Times (2/1, Miller, 88K), on the other hand, says Democrats "yesterday broke a pledge to strip pork spending from a massive funding resolution that contained about $500 million in what Republicans called questionable projects, including $44.6 million for a rainforest biosphere in Iowa and $50 million for the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. … Critics said Democrats rammed through the $463.5 billion spending package without a committee hearing, without a committee mark-up process and without accepting amendments on the House floor. 'It is unfortunate that we are going to see a return to the days when you have decisions about how money is appropriated made by bureaucrats and made in smoke-filled rooms,' said Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican. 'That's the kind of change [Americans] did not vote for when they went to the polls in November.'" The Times adds, "What's more, Republicans said, the legislation was fraught with accounting gimmicks to disguise higher spending. It actually increased spending, and therefore the budget deficit, by more than $6 billion from the last fiscal year, they said."

The Hill (2/1, Kucinich) notes "GOP members again took issue with the way the bill was pushed through the House, saying they had been 'shut out of the process.'"

House Panel To Examine Outside Ethics Enforcer. The AP (2/1, Abrams) reports House leaders "on Wednesday announced a task force to examine whether an outside panel should investigate ethics problems involving House members." Speaker Nancy Pelosi "said in a statement that she and the House Republican leader, Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, had agreed that the task force would report by May 1." Rep. Michael Capuano, D-Mass., "will lead the eight-member task force, which has four lawmakers from each party."

NYTimes Says House Democrats Resisting Bundling Disclosure. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Now that House Democrats are beyond the spotlight of their ballyhooed first 100 hours, there are signs of foot-dragging on the keystone of their promised lobbying reform: forcing disclosure of the huge sums in campaign donations that lobbyists package to grease privileged access in the Capitol. This practice — called bundling — has lobbyists mass hundreds of donations of a few thousand dollars each into special-interest piñatas of hundreds of thousands. Full disclosure of bundling is the sine qua non of lobbying reform. Speaker Nancy Pelosi cannot let the new House majority backslide."

Pelosi Seeks Routine Use Of Military Aircraft. The Washington Times (2/1, Scarborough, 88K) reports Speaker Nancy Pelosi's office "is pressing the Bush administration for routine access to military aircraft for domestic flights, such as trips back to her San Francisco district, according to sources familiar with the discussions." The sources say Pelosi is "seeking regular military flights not only for herself and her staff, but also for relatives and for other members of the California delegation. A knowledgeable source called the request 'carte blanche for an aircraft any time.'" The Times adds Pelosi's "request is not new for a speaker, who is second-in-line in presidential succession. A defense source said the speaker's regular access to a military plane began after the September 11, 2001, attacks. Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who was speaker at the time, started using U.S. Air Force planes for domestic travel to and from his district for security reasons." But a former Hastert aide "said the congressman did not use military planes for political trips or regularly transport his family." Sources "said Mrs. Pelosi's request goes beyond what Mr. Hastert received."

Senate Republicans To Discuss Domestic Agenda. Roll Call (2/1, Billings) reports when GOP Senators "go behind closed doors Friday to plot a unifying strategy for the 110th Congress, they likely will sidestep the one issue occupying most Members' attention: the Iraq War." Instead, Senate Republicans "plan to focus on producing a domestic-heavy agenda, message and game plan for the next two years that positions them to reclaim the Senate majority in 2008. And even though their long-planned retreat lands right in the middle of a Senate debate over Iraq policy, GOP Senators and aides say they are optimistic they will find more togetherness than divisiveness." Republicans "believe that one reason they lost so handily in 2006 is because they lost sight of their defining party principles and didn't effectively lay out their vision to the electorate." Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) is "coordinating the session, which is set to include broad discussions of party principles such as fiscal discipline, national security and personal responsibility. Members also are expected to begin setting their two-year legislative goals on issues such as energy, health care, tax policy, immigration reform and judicial nominations."

GAO Adds Food Safety To List Of Flawed Federal Programs. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports the GAO "on Wednesday added food safety to its list of critically flawed federal programs, saying that splintered jurisdiction among 15 agencies has left the nation vulnerable to outbreaks of food-borne illness or, worse, a terrorist attack. Meanwhile, a senior administration official said President Bush would seek an increase of about $11 million for food safety in the fiscal 2008 budget he is scheduled to release Monday." The GAO said food safety was added to the list "because the system is out-of-date, often unscientific and lacks accountability." Lisa Shames, director of food and agriculture issues at GAO, called it "a collection of 15 agencies trying to administer some 30 laws," adding that the system "results in inefficient use of resources, inconsistent oversight, and overlap and duplication."

Sanchez Resigns From Hispanic Caucus. The Politico (2/1, Hearn) reports Rep. Loretta Sanchez "has quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, accusing the chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, of telling people she's a 'whore.' Baca denied the charge." Sanchez also "cited concerns about whether Baca was properly elected Hispanic Caucus chairman in November and about his general attitude toward female lawmakers. The caucus represents 21 Hispanic Democrats in Congress." Sanchez said, "I'm not going to be a part of the CHC as long as Mr. Baca illegally holds the chair … I told them no. There's a big rift here. You treat the women like shit. I have no use for him." The Politico ads Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC), and has chosen to air baseless statements. Let me be clear; her comments are categorically untrue."

Obama Introduces Election Fraud Bill. The Hill (2/1, Schor) reports Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) "added election fraud to the spectrum of weighty issues he has covered since informally launching his presidential bid, further fleshing out a legislative record that could be an inviting target in the intensifying 2008 campaign." Obama "sought to stay focused on his bill criminalizing voter suppression and deceptive electoral tactics, his third momentum-building effort in two weeks, even as the Republican National Committee drove a wedge through the Democratic field by circulating critical comments made by Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) about his fellow White House hopefuls." Obama's "voter-deception bill, which would allow injunctive relief for individuals targeted by fraudulent flyers and automated phone calls during the run-up to Election Day, earned plaudits from civil-rights groups and the co-sponsorship of Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Caucus's No. 3 and a backer of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in 2008."

Senators Oppose Closure OF FDA Labs. The Washington Post (2/1, A7, Lee, 690K) reports the Food and Drug Administration "should suspend plans to close as many as nine of 13 laboratories that test the safety and effectiveness of food, drugs, cosmetics and medical equipment, a bipartisan group of senators said this week." The network of labs, "run by the agency's Office of Regulatory Affairs, 'could prove particularly vital in rapidly responding to public health crises' during national emergencies, the lawmakers wrote Tuesday to FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach."

FEC Reports Show Lawmakers' Legal Fees. Roll Call (2/1, Murray) reports that as 2006 "came to a close, lawyers' bills continued to pile high for a half-dozen or more House Members widely named in ongoing criminal investigations." Year-end FEC reports "showed that at least five Members previously cited as subjects of investigations wrote checks or listed debts to firms with substantial criminal defense practices worth a combined total of more than $200,000 from Nov. 28 to Dec. 31." That's "in addition to ex-Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who received the FEC's blessing last week to use leftover campaign cash to fend off Justice Department scrutiny." The campaign of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), "who currently is under investigation by federal law enforcement for allegedly inappropriate contact with Congressional pages, paid the Washington, D.C.-based law firm of Zuckerman Spaeder nearly $50,000 in mid-December." Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), "who was banished from the ethics panel in 2006 amid a federal probe into earmarks he steered to his home state, doled out $70,000 during the reporting period to Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, an area law firm specializing in white-collar criminal defense. Mollohan reported that he owes the same firm another $20,000."

Insightful Question Lifted Senate Aide's Profile. The Politico (2/1, Lowe) reports Daniel J. Cox Jr. "doesn't look like a troublemaker, but the Senate Armed Services Committee aide knows how to stir things up." Cox, the committee's "principal staff member for Iraq issues…ignited a firestorm when he fed his boss a simple but profound question to ask Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army chief of staff, at a 2003 pre-Iraq war hearing." Levin asked, "General Shinseki, could you give us some idea as to the magnitude of the Army's force requirement for an occupation of Iraq following a successful completion of the war?" The Politico adds Shinseki's "candid answer -- that it would take "several hundred thousand soldiers" to pacify Iraq -- still reverberates. It became powerful ammunition for those who see the U.S. occupation as a tableau of preventable blunders. It stoked criticism that the Bush administration low-balled Iraq war needs. And, many believe, it eventually cost Shinseki his job, particularly since his assessment was so publicly dismissed by the Bush administration." The incident "marked a turning point in Cox's career, catapulting him into the center of one of the most controversial conflicts in U.S. history."

Senate Chaplain Backs Out Of Religious Conference. Roll Call (2/1, Stanton) reports Senate Chaplain Barry Black "informed Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) Wednesday that he was canceling a planned appearance at a religious conference set for next month after a left-leaning civil liberties organization urged him to pull out due to the organizer's controversial political and religious beliefs, a spokesman said Wednesday." Chaplain spokeswoman Meg Saunders said "Reclaim America originally invited Black to attend in the fall of 2005 and billed the conference as a generic religious meeting. Saunders explained that Black, who attends a number of conferences each year, agreed to participate because it would not conflict with the traditional nonpartisan, nonsectarian role of the Senate chaplain." But "following a review of the group's Web site Wednesday, Black determined it was, in fact, both a political and highly sectarian event and quickly informed the organization and Senate leaders that he was not attending." Founded "by Dr. D. James Kennedy, Reclaim America is an offshoot of Coral Ridge Ministries, one of the largest evangelical organizations in the United States."

GAO Takes HUD, USPS Off "High Risk" List. The Washington Post's (2/1, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that HUD and the USPS, two "ugly ducklings of the government -- programs so vulnerable to waste, fraud and mismanagement that they are dubbed 'high risk' by the" GAO, made news "[y]esterday, [when] the GAO announced that "[f]or the first time in 13 years, no HUD program appears on the GAO risk list, which David M. Walker, the head of the GAO, called a 'historic achievement.'" HUD "Secretary Alphonso Jackson said the announcement reflects the progress that HUD has made 'to ensure taxpayer dollars are spent wisely and well.'" The Post adds that during the 1980s, "HUD was buffeted by allegations of corruption and influence-peddling that often masked systemic problems," but the agency "worked through its problems, and, by 2001, had only two programs left on the GAO list -- single-family-housing mortgage insurance and rental-housing assistance." The GAO "put the Postal Service on the high-risk list in 2001 because of a bleak financial outlook that included cash-flow problems and heavy debt. But the post office has increased employee productivity while reducing staff -- and saved $5 billion since 2001, the GAO said."

NFIB President Makes Case For Senate's Minimum Wage Bill. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/1, 10A, 2.27M) Todd Stottlemyer, the president and CEO of the National Federation of Independent Business, the nation's leading small-business advocacy group, says small businesses "operate in a highly competitive, global marketplace and can ill-afford to raise prices on their customers by 40%," the proposed increase in the minimum wage, "and stay competitive." Knowing this, "members of the Senate Finance Committee worked together in true bipartisan fashion to craft a package of proven ways to lessen the impact of a minimum-wage increase on small businesses." Stottlemyer adds, "The Senate bill is fair. It is balanced. The full Senate should pass it, and the House should follow its example."

USA Today (2/1, 10A, 2.27M), disagrees, writing in an editorial, "Voters who thought Democrats were now the unchallenged masters of Capitol Hill got a quick reality check this week as the Senate lurched toward the end of a debate on the minimum wage." Today, the Senate "is expected to approve a hybrid bill that raises the minimum wage at last — but ties it to an $8.3 billion package of unnecessary tax cuts for small business." USA Today adds, "Eventually, the House and Senate will have to agree on a final bill. Democrats, along with the five Republican senators and 82 GOP representatives who voted for a clean wage increase -- should hold their ground."

White House Hopeful Budget Will Lead To Serious Negotiations. In his Washington Post column (2/1, A15), David Broder says, "This year, as I learned from conversations with two senior White House officials last week, the president hopes his budget will become a starting point for serious negotiation -- not a partisan football or simple laughingstock." That hope "was encouraged by a letter to the president last week from the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, Rep. Nancy Pelosi and Sen. Harry M. Reid, and the chairmen of the two budget committees, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. and Sen. Kent Conrad." The White House officials "with whom I met certainly pledged to make visible the costs of the war and to be specific about the trade-offs needed to maintain budget discipline, both in the short term and the long term. They said that the economic assumptions underlying the president's budget are modest -- if anything, an underestimate of the revenue likely to be produced by a growing economy. And the officials indicated that the president will recommend that, for a second year in a row, overall growth in discretionary domestic spending -- the part separate from Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security -- be held close to zero."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Set Rules For Stranded Plane Passengers. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Travelers and airlines have a deal. In exchange for transporting them safely, passengers agree to give up a great deal of freedom of movement." But "several high-profile failures this past holiday travel season suggest that Congress needs to intervene and set some ground rules to enforce this deal for people unreasonably stranded on aircraft. Delays at the gate are a hassle, but extraordinary delays on planes can be dangerous for the handicapped, chronically ill, elderly or small children."

Judge Adjourns Holocaust Settlement Hearing After Objections. The New York Times (2/1, Treaster) reports, "A federal judge abruptly adjourned a hearing yesterday on the settlement of a dispute over unpaid life insurance policies of Holocaust victims after a Miami lawyer and a survivor of a Nazi concentration camp raised objections." The Times continues, "Judge George B. Daniels of Federal District Court in Manhattan gave no explanation for ending the session that he had convened to determine the fairness of a settlement in which an Italian insurance company agreed to provide several million dollars to Holocaust victims. The company, Assicurazioni Generali, has repeatedly denied allegations that it systematically refused to pay billions of dollars in claims on insurance policies of Holocaust victims." The Times adds, "Lawyers for Generali and others who worked on the settlement said Judge Daniels called them into his chambers during a brief recess to express new concerns. They would not say what was discussed, but said he asked them to try to resolve the concerns over the next week. … One lawyer for the Holocaust survivors, Robert A. Swift, said Judge Daniels asked him and the others 'to renegotiate one provision in the settlement.' … Earlier, Sam J. Dubbin, a Miami lawyer opposing the settlement, had argued that it would prevent tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors from ever knowing whether they were owed money by Generali."

Schumer Sees Middle Class Economic Anxiety As Key Issue. The Washington Post (2/1, D1, Montgomery, 690K) reports Sen. Charles E. Schumer "wants to transform a sleepy congressional committee into a high-profile platform for examining the troubles of" middle class families with the goal of coming up "with a cure for middle-class angst that will carry Democrats into the White House." Schumer is "betting that economic insecurity will replace the Iraq war as the most important issue in the 2008 elections." Schumer said, "The party that can create a model paradigm, a platform that can answer some of these questions, will not only win in 2008 but could create a long-term majority." The Post adds that as Schumer "convened his first hearing as chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, two House panels were also taking testimony on the travails of the middle class."

The Hill (2/1, Heil) reports Sen. Schumer "devotes much of his new book, 'Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time,' to an imaginary family, the Baileys. According to the tome, he runs every policy decision he makes by the average, middle-class, swing-voting family."

Biden's Entry In '08 Race Overshadowed By Furor Over Remarks. The AP (2/1, Fouhy) reports that Delaware Sen. Joe Biden (D) "spent his first day as an official presidential candidate regretting his description of Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama as 'clean,' and explaining why he had dissed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards." Biden, who "formally established his presidential committee Wednesday and launched a campaign Web site," was inundated "with questions from reporters in an afternoon conference call, and late in the day, issued a terse statement, saying: 'I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama.' In the weekly newspaper's article, published Wednesday, Biden harshly criticized Clinton and Edwards for their proposals to end the Iraq war. He also questioned the credentials of" Obama, "while calling him 'a mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean.'"

In a report titled "A Biden Problem: Foot in Mouth" on the website of ABC News (1/31), reporter Jake Tapper wrote, "Immediately the conservative media establishment -- Rush Limbaugh, the Drudge Report, bloggers -- publicly pounced." For instance, Limbaugh -- on his radio show -- said, "He is a clean African-American? If Biden thinks that Obama is clean then he has to think that others are not clean. Does he mean that he knows that Jesse Jackson is not clean? Does he mean that he knows that Reverend Sharpton is not clean?" Tapper noted, "But it wasn't just conservatives. 'When I heard his comments I thought Joe Biden was referring to a bygone era,' said Donna Brazile, the former campaign manager for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign and a prominent African-American political consultant. 'Years ago when white folks referred to black people with education they often used words like articulate. To suggest they were different, they were acceptable. That they were OK as compared to rest of African-Americans. So I think it came across that Joe Biden was referring to Sen. Obama as if he was a candidate running in the 1960s, not in the 21st century.'"

Meanwhile, ABC World News (1/31, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M), in a report by Tapper, related, "Obama refused to tell ABC News whether he thought Biden was complimenting him." Sen. Barrack Obama: "I'm not going to…" Tapper: "But in this candid moment, Obama told the senator he was not taking the remarks personally." Sen. Barack Obama: "He just said he didn't mean it." Jesse Jackson: "I know Joe Biden to be a decent man and a smart man. This foot in mouth disease was a mistake."

National political correspondent Gloria Borger reported on the CBS Evening News (1/31, story 6, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M), "This morning, the Senator used the Internet to introduce his presidential campaign the way he really wanted to. But tonight his campaign is doing damage control. But within hours, this audiotape of an interview he gave to the New York Observer talking about Barak Obama was all over the web." Sen. Biden: "You've got the first sort of mainstream African American who is articulate, and bright and clean and nice looking guy. I mean, that's a story book, isn't it?" Borger: "Some people listening to those descriptions of Obama -- 'articulate, clean' -- heard racial overtones. … Biden called Obama and apologized. He said he used the word clean as fresh and new."

The New York Sun (2/1, Gerstein) reports that African-American columnist and commentator Roland Martin said Biden's "description of Mr. Obama as 'articulate' could rankle many blacks. 'Of course, it's offensive,'" Martin, the executive editor of the Chicago Defender, said. He added, "I am sick and tired of individuals coming across an African-American and saying, 'Oh, my goodness, you're so articulate. … 'You never see that kind of statement made about white candidates.'" Martin, "who hosts a radio program, said he expects Mr. Biden to take some heat from black voters. 'I can guarantee you Biden is going to get lit up like Christmas,'" said Martin.

USA Today (2/1, Gaudiano, 2.27M) reports, "During a conference call with reporters, Biden said Obama is 'probably the most exciting candidate that the Democratic or Republican parties have produced' in a long time. His comments reflected his mother's expression: 'Clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack,' he said. He told reporters to call Obama and that Obama understood his meaning when he talked to him earlier. 'I really regret that some have taken totally out of context my use of the word 'clean,'' Biden said."

The New York Times (2/1, Nagourney, 1.16M) leads its coverage of the Biden brouhaha with this line, "In an era of meticulous political choreography, the staging of the kickoff for this presidential candidacy could hardly have gone worse." The Times notes, "Asked about Mr. Biden's comments, Mr. Obama said in an interview, 'I didn't take it personally and I don't think he intended to offend.'" Obama added, "But the way he constructed the statement was probably a little unfortunate." However, "later in the day, with Mr. Biden coming under fire from some black leaders, Mr. Obama issued a statement that approached a condemnation. 'I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate,' he said. 'African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate.'"

The Chicago Tribune (2/1, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "Biden told reporters that he has long enjoyed the support of the African-American community in Delaware and did not intend to cause offense. He also said he did not believe that Sharpton, Jackson or other black leaders would misunderstand his remarks. … In an interview, Jackson called Biden 'a decent man' who had made a verbal gaffe while trying to slight the competition. 'He was saying in effect that Barack is more style than substance, that he is just coming onto the scene,' Jackson said. 'In doing so, he seemed to be dismissive of our 1988 campaign and diminishing Barack's potential campaign.'"

During an appearance last night on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" (1/31), host Jon Stewart asked Biden to comment on his quote from the Observer article in which Biden said of Obama, "I mean, you got the first mainstream African American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy. I mean, that's a storybook man." Biden: "Well, let me tell you something, I spoke to Barack today --" Stewart: "I bet you did!" Biden: "I also spoke to Jesse and Al Sharpton and -- and I also --" Stewart: "And Michael Jordan and anybody you could get your hands on! The Jackson Five. Who else?!" Biden went on to say "the word that got me in trouble is using the word 'clean.' I should have said fresh. What I meant is he's got new ideas."

Senator's Comments Said To Recall Past Gaffes. The Washington Post (2/1, A6, Balz, 690K), in an article titled "Biden Stumbles at the Starting Gate," reports, "With his remarks about Obama, Biden began his second campaign for the White House much as the first one ended, arguing that his public comments were being misinterpreted. He quit the 1988 campaign after being captured on videotape adopting the rhetoric and in some cases the life story of British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock."

The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Neuman, 850K), noting that Biden withdrew from the '88 presidential race "amid accusations that he had plagiarized portions of speeches by a British politician," reports, "Asked Wednesday what he learned from the experience, Biden said: 'I took a real gut punch. I learned how to take it, and I got back up.'"

In a report on NBC Nightly News (1/31, lead story, 3:45, Williams, 9.87M), senior White House correspondent David Gregory related, "Biden, who admits he has a tendency to bloviate, has made indelicate remarks before. Last year speaking about Indian Americans." Sen. Joseph Biden: "You cannot go to a Seven Eleven or Dunkin' Doughnuts unless you have an Indian accident." Gregory: "Biden's first presidential run 20 years ago was undone after evidence emerged that he plagiarized a speech from a British politician, Neil Kinnock."

McClatchy Newspapers (2/1, Thomma, Talev) reports, "Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, dismissed Biden's comment -- and candidacy -- with a thinly veiled slap at his forced withdrawal from his last presidential campaign. 'I didn't even know he was a candidate, so I don't see how he could have hurt himself,' Rangel deadpanned. 'It probably was something someone else said and he picked it up and used it himself,' he said, adding with emphasis, 'by mistake.'"

The Washington Times (2/1, Bellantoni, 88K) relates that Biden "told the Observer interviewer that" Sen. Clinton's "plan for Iraq is 'a serious mistake.'" And that Biden "jabbed at former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina: 'I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about.'" The Times also points out that Biden "polls in the single digits, well below the Democratic front-runner, Mrs. Clinton, and her two top rivals, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards."

Bloomberg (2/1, Salant) notes, "A Gallup Organization poll last month showed Clinton leading among Democratic voters. She got support from 33 percent, followed by Obama with 20 percent and former Vice President Al Gore with 12 percent. Biden was favored by 3 percent."

The Politico (2/1) provides a link to Biden's presidential campaign website where the Senator's announcement speech can be viewed.

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/31), Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia Center for Politics said, "It's classic Joe Biden. It's really history repeating itself."

On CNN's The Situation Room (1/31), Democratic political strategist Donna Brazile said, "I know Joe Biden. I believe his intentions are good. He has a strong civil rights record. But it came across pretty damaging. His first, you know, major event, his announcement, and he stepped on his own story by criticizing Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Edwards, even making some weird remarks about, you know, Al Gore and John Kerry."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Jay Carney of Time said, "We all knew that this would happen to Joe Biden in his presidential campaign. It is a little shocking that it happened on the first day."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Anne Kornblut of the Washington Post said, "This is classic Joe Biden. … He tends toward the hyperbolic often in his speech, and he talks and talks and talks."

On MSNBC's Hardball (1/31, Matthews), Tony Blankley of the Washington Times said, "If a conservative Republican had said this, I think the media would have jumped down his throat. The media is not jumping down Biden's throat. I think he's getting, more or less, a pass from the mainstream media on this. I think he should get a pass, but I think others should get a pass, too, when they stumble."

Rothenberg Says Hillary Clinton Could Win Presidency. In his Roll Call column (2/1), Stuart Rothenberg says Hillary Clinton can win the White House in 2008: "While some of my colleagues doubt that the New York Senator can overcome her high negative ratings and attract a majority of the electorate in her bid for the White House, I've come to the conclusion that she can, as long as she runs the high-quality campaign I think she can." Though not predicting Clinton would win the Democratic nomination, Rothenberg says, "I don't agree with those who have concluded that her negatives are so great that she cannot beat a strong Republican nominee next year."

A17), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standards says, "Mrs. Clinton wants to run as a centrist, not a liberal, in the general election. But there's a problem. She is being tugged to the left in the nomination fight, forced to take positions that may jeopardize her chances later against the Republican candidate." Clinton's "opponents in the Democratic primaries next year don't have this problem. They are unabashed liberals who have done nothing to place themselves near the ideological center of American politics. Mrs. Clinton, however, spent her first term as senator from New York downplaying her image as a staunch liberal. Instead, she has sought with some success to fashion a reputation as a centrist on some several key issues, particularly national security."

Social Issues A Challenge For Giuliani In Seeking GOP Nomination. USA Today (2/1, 1A, Page, 2.27M) reports Rudy Giuliani "would seem to have all the credentials a candidate for president could want: A hero of 9/11, a crime-busting federal prosecutor, a two-term Republican mayor in an overwhelmingly Democratic city and one of the most admired politicians in the country. He's got a big problem, though. First, he has to be nominated by Republicans who don't yet know his views on social issues." The question "is this: Can the thrice-married New Yorker — a supporter of abortion rights, gay rights and gun control — win the nomination of a Republican Party that has become increasingly dependent on and influenced by conservative Christians?" GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said, "As a presidential candidate, Rudy Giuliani should absolutely be taken seriously. As a contender for the Republican nomination, he should be taken significantly less seriously. He has the stature to be president, but how does he get the Republican nomination? That is the fundamental disconnect."

Franken To Challenge Coleman. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/1, Hotakainen, 395K) reports, "Comedian and radio talk show host Al Franken has begun calling Democratic members of Congress and prominent DFLers to tell them he will definitely challenge Republican Sen. Norm Coleman in 2008, the Star Tribune learned Wednesday. On Monday, Franken announced that he is quitting his radio show on Feb. 14, and he told his audience that they'd be the first to know of his decision." But "Franken has been working the phones, telling his political friends he's ready to declare his candidacy."

The AP (2/1, Frommer) reports that "in a statement, Minnesota Republican Party Chairman Ron Carey said he was confident Minnesotans 'will reject Franken's divisive, scorched-earth attacks.' The state Democratic Party declined to comment."

Spitzer Outlines Plan To Reform New York Healthcare Industry. The New York Times (2/1, Hakim, 1.16M) reports that "among several ambitious proposals," New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer (D) "proposed to radically restructure aid to New York's sprawling health care industry in his first budget Wednesday, saying that the system props up failing hospitals and too often overlooks patients' needs, while consuming roughly a third of the state's budget." The Times continues, "To control health care spending, Mr. Spitzer would hold the growth of Medicaid to 1.7 percent, compared to 8 percent growth rates in recent years, by cutting subsidies to hospitals and nursing homes, slashing Medicaid reimbursement rates and by stepping up efforts to combat fraud. Conversely, he outlined a plan to make low-cost health insurance coverage available to the state's 400,000 uninsured children."

In a separate article, the New York Times (2/1, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports that the plan "contains the seeds of an epic battle — $1.2 billion a year in cuts — that could make everything else he wants harder to attain." The Times continues, "The proposed cuts, mostly in Medicaid, the health plan for the poor, pit the governor against the Legislature, health care workers and the hospital industry — powerful camps that welcome some of his ideas, but that fiercely protect their share of Medicaid spending."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) editorializes, "Unions, hospital advocates and politicians have already begun to raise the alarm" over Spitzer's healthcare proposals, "[b]ut the governor is right to fight for a fairer, more cost-effective distribution of public funds."

Union Seeks To Unionize Laborers In Wealthy Florida Enclave. The New York Times (2/1, Porter, 1.16M) reports after "successful campaigns last year to organize janitors and other maintenance workers at several universities in South Florida, the Service Employees International Union has set its sights on Fisher Island, one of the most concentrated pockets of wealth in the nation." Amid "mounting political attention to the substantial widening of the income gap over the last two decades, the service employees union hopes that Fisher Island — where a share in the golf club costs $250,000 and dues run to $20,000 a year while workers tending the grounds or washing linens can make as little as $8.50 an hour — will serve as a rallying cry for low-wage service workers across the nation." But the "union drive, which is just getting under way, might not play out as a straightforward battle pitting the haves against the have-nots. Some residents, of course, oppose the union's arrival. But others are already being courted by the union, which hopes that they will be moved to support it when confronted with the contrast between their affluence and the meager existence of many of their workers."

Mary Cheney Defends Pregnancy. The New York Times (2/1, Seelye, 1.16M) reports Mary Cheney, "the lesbian daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, today for the first time publicly defended her decision to become pregnant and asserted that same-sex couples are equally capable of raising children as heterosexual couples." Ms. Cheney said, "When Heather [Poe, her partner of 15 years] and I decided to have a baby, I knew it wasn't going to be the most popular decision. … This is a baby. This is a blessing from God. It is not a political statement. It is not a prop to be used in a debate, on either side of a political issue. It is my child."

Will Says School Choice Is Expanding. George Will writes in his column for the Washington Post (2/1, A15, 690K), "The public school lobby…lives in fear of competition -- the fear that if parents' choices are expanded, there will be a flight from public schools. But the tide is turning." He cites examples of tax credits for donations "to organizations that provide scholarships" for "children to attend private schools" in Arizona, a similar proposal by Newark, New Jersey Mayor Cory Booker and New York Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer's (D) plan to lift a state cap on charter schools. Finally, he praises New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R) for a plan based on the idea "that public money should follow wherever students are attracted by competing schools."

Rice To Push For "Roadmap" Fast-Track At Quartet Meeting. AFP (2/1, Millikin) reports during a meeting of the so-called Quartet Friday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will "push a plan to fast-track" the "Roadmap" plan for Mideast peace. At Friday's meeting, Rice will also "press for renewed efforts to bolster" Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "in his power struggle" with Hamas, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. Friday's gathering of Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Germany Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon is "timed to precede a rare three-way meeting between Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in mid-February, though no firm date or venue for those discussions have been set," officials said.

Timing Of Meeting Questioned. The Christian Science Monitor (2/1, LaFranchi, 59K) says Friday's meeting "comes at what would seem to be a particularly unpromising moment," with Palestinian factions "battl[ing] each other in Gaza, and Israel founders under a weak and scandal-torn government." Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, it writes, "would seem to be in the kind of position needed to make hard choices and painful compromises. And even before the Quartet meets, cracks are appearing in its position, with Russia calling for a lifting of the freeze on international aid to the Palestinian government."

Envoy Says Regional Crises Will Not Be Eased By Peace Deal. Meanwhile, in an interview with the Washington Times (2/1, A1, Sands, 88K), Israel's Ambassador in Washington, Sallai Meridor, said "foreign-policy crises in Iraq and Iran will not be eased by pressuring Israel to cut a peace deal with the Palestinians." The ambassador said Israel does not "see any connection between our dispute with the Palestinians and the level of violence on Haifa Street in Baghdad. And there is no linkage in my mind between the Israeli-Palestinian question and what Ahmadinejad is planning for the region and the world by pursuing a nuclear weapon." Meridor said "he saw the beginnings of a realignment in the Middle East, linking Israel and the United States with moderate Sunni Muslim Arab states fearful of the rising power of Shi'ite Iran. But he said it was too soon to tell whether an anti-Tehran coalition would form."

Hamas Criticizes US Aid To Abbas. AFP (2/1, El Oun) reports Hamas Wednesday "slammed a multi-million dollar US aid package to bolster security forces loyal to its rival Fatah." Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said, "There is no doubt that this is part of American policy aimed at provoking an escalation and a civil war in the service of a Zionist plan." Radwan alleged that "each time the American administration sees that we have arrived, or are on the verge of arriving, at an agreement, it sends Condoleezza Rice to poison the atmosphere or announces financial aid (to President Mahmud Abbas) to maintain tensions among Palestinians."

Former DOD Official To Prison For Selling Equipment To Mideast Buyers. The Washington Times (2/1, Seper, 88K) reports that "a former Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service (DRMS) official," Gayden C. Woodson, "was sentenced yesterday in U.S. District Court in Washington to 33 months in prison and $342,000 in restitution payments for illegally selling stolen surplus military equipment to Middle Eastern buyers." Woodson, who was in charge of disposal "by reuse, sale, transfer or donation -- of excess U.S. military property," was accused by prosecutors of having "willingly joined an ongoing conspiracy among DRMS personnel and local contractors and purchasers to sell surplus military equipment outside regular channels and pocket the proceeds."

Frazer Says Islamic Militants From Somalia Regrouping. In an interview with the Financial Times (2/1, Wallis), Assistant Secretary of State for African affairs, Jendayi Frazer, said the US "believes militant Islamists from the ousted coalition that held sway over parts of southern Somalia may be regrouping in Saudi Arabia, Eritrea and also Yemen." Speaking to the Times in Addis Ababa, Frazer "said it was too early to tell who among the Islamist leadership had survived Ethiopia's invasion last month and subsequent US air strikes on alleged affiliates of al-Qaeda." But she was "very concerned" that extremist elements from among the defeated Islamists were "trying to reconstitute themselves either out of Saudi Arabia or Eritrea," and that international jihadist networks would see this as an opportunity. She said the US must "engage with the Saudi government and their services to try to prevent that from happening as well as engage regionally." She also described Eritrea, "with whom the US has deteriorating relations," as a "source of regional instability."

LATimes Says Africa Can Police Itself. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/1, 850K) writes, "When African leaders met this week in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, they fell short of their goal to get commitments for 8,000 troops for a peacekeeping mission in Somalia. But what has attracted less attention is that, for the first time, the rest of the world is counting on Africa to police itself -- and the continent is nearly in a position to do it." For example, the African Union's 7,000 peacekeepers in the Darfur, "though grossly undermanned and underfunded, represent the closest thing to security and justice that blighted land knows," the Times says. Going forward, the newspaper says "having AU peacekeepers as an option to stabilize a failed state such as Somalia is a boon to the international community, whose own peacekeepers, from NATO to the United Nations to the US military, are badly overstretched."

US Official Says Talks With Pyongyang Ready To Move Forward. The AP (2/1, Olesen) reports Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser, who concluded two days of talks Wednesday with North Korean officials, "said his agency's suspicions of illegal financial activity involving bank accounts linked to the communist nation were accurate." Glaser "said that he went over bank information of 50 account holders from the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia with his North Korean counterparts in Beijing," adding that US concerns that the bank was being used for money-laundering purposes had "been vindicated" by the discussions. Speaking with reports, Glaser said, "I think we are now in a position after a very lengthy investigation...to start moving forward and trying to bring some resolution to this matter," but did not elaborate.

Russia Warns North Korea Over Nuclear Tests. AFP (2/1, Smith) reports North Korea's nuclear weapons capability "threatens Russian interests," Moscow's chief negotiator at international talks with Pyongyang said Wednesday, "warning the country against carrying out another military test." Alexander Losyukov was quoted by Russia's Interfax news agency as saying, "Our interests are under threat. I think a very negative reaction would follow another test and that tougher measures would probably be taken." Analysts said Losyukov's statement "marked a hardening of the Russian position" on North Korea ahead of February 8 talks in Beijing.

Senate Express Impatience, Threaten Action On Chinese Currency. The Washington Post (2/1, D7, Goodman, 690K) reports, "Since becoming Treasury secretary last summer, Henry M. Paulson Jr. has pleaded for patience on the issue of China's currency." But on Capitol Hill yesterday, Paulson "learned that patience in Washington may be wearing thin" as several senators at a Senate Banking Committee hearing "sharply questioned the value of his talks, and threatened legislative action against China." Committee chairman Christopher Dodd (D-CT) warned, "The Congress is not going to wait and see how this is progressing when they watch 3 million manufacturing jobs leave this country. You are going to get blown by if we don't get a better handle on this." For his part, Paulson "offered assurances that he, too, is disappointed by China's slow movement."

The Washington Times/AP (2/1, Crutsinger) reports Paulson "insisted yesterday that new high-level talks with China offer the greatest chance of success in reducing the soaring US trade deficit," but notes that he "faced a skeptical Senate banking committee where both Democratic and Republican senators said they thought China would listen only if the country faced punitive economic sanctions."

The Wall Street Journal (2/1, C7, Phillips, 2.04M) says Paulson was "grilled for more than two hours by skeptical senators, several of whom complained of the difficulty of explaining benefits of free trade to constituents who have seen their jobs move to China or elsewhere."

UK Arms Deal Charges Would Require Testimony Of Saudi Royals. In an interview with the Financial Times (2/1, Adams, Peel, Burns), UK Attorney General, Lord Peter Henry Goldsmith, said he "believed that senior Saudi royals, possibly even King Abdullah, would have been needed as essential witnesses had a corruption inquiry into the al-Yamamah arms deal led to charges against BAE Systems." However, he "judged it would have been unrealistic to expect the country's rulers to submit themselves to questioning. This, combined with uncertainty over whom to approach in Riyadh, posed 'insuperable' obstacles to a prosecution, he said." During the interview, Goldsmith "spelt out his belief that Saudi Arabia's 'particular constitutional position' was a key reason why" an inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE "was doomed to failure."

UK Concludes Poisoning Probe. The Los Angeles Times (2/1, Murphy, 850K) reports British police said Wednesday they have concluded their investigation into the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, "and handed the file to prosecutors for a decision on whether to file charges." Though authorities refused to disclose their findings, sources close to the family "said they believe the authorities are leaning toward suspects in Russia as the probable perpetrators." Prosecutors have said they will "review the results of the detectives' work and determine whether it is appropriate to file charges," but "said it would be impossible under Russian law to extradite them to Britain for trial."

Chavez Seen Moving Closer To "Dictatorship." The Washington Times/AP (2/1, Sanchez) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez was granted "free rein yesterday to accelerate changes in broad areas of society by presidential decree -- a move critics said propels Venezuela toward dictatorship." Lawmakers unanimously voted to give Chavez "sweeping powers to legislate by decree and impose his radical vision of a more egalitarian socialist state," which he said he "plans to use…over the next 18 months to transform broad areas of public life, from the economy and the oil industry in particular to 'social matters' and the very structure of the state."

Expert Urges US To Develop Global Social Agenda To Appeal To Poor. Francis Fukuyama, professor of international political economy at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/1, A17, 2.04M) op-ed that what "leaders like Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah and Venezuela's Hugo Chávez all have in common" is their "ability to promise, and to a certain extent deliver on, social policy -- things like education, health and other social services, particularly for the poor." Fukuyama says that "if the US wants to support liberal democracy around the world, it needs to start thinking seriously about a well-designed social agenda that will appeal to the poor," which he says are "desperately need help, and have often been ill-served by the interventions of well-intentioned outsiders."

Expert Urges Partition As Solution To Kosovo. Timothy William Waters, who helped prepare the indictment of Slobodan Milosevic for war crimes in Kosovo, writes in the New York Times (2/1, 1.16M) that now "more than seven years after NATO ended Serbia's brutal dominion over" Kosovo, the international community "is about to impose a solution," which he says is "the wrong one." Waters says the likely plan "gives too little to Albanians and takes too much from Serbs. But there's an alternative, if only the international community would consider it: partition. Flexibility on borders could make a fully independent Kosovo easier to govern, provide more protection for minorities and make a negotiated deal attainable. Partition is possible, and possibly the right thing to do." Conceding that partition" isn't perfect," he says the current plan "will neither resolve Kosovo's uncertain status nor prevent an entire Balkan people from once again taking to the road."

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House To Share Surveillance With Congress (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — A two-week standoff over documents in the White House domestic spying program came to an end Wednesday when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to turn over to Congress classified material about secret eavesdropping.

The Bush administration last month said it would put its surveillance of potential terrorist activities under supervision of a federal court but did not disclose details of the revised program. A key Senate panel, newly controlled by Democrats, demanded access to the records to gauge whether the administration was going too far or breaking any laws in tracking terrorism suspects.

The decision to share information with Congress was the latest concession by the Bush administration, which had argued that it had the right to conduct its "war on terror" as it deemed necessary and that secrecy was vital to national security.

The documents, which include applications for electronic wiretaps and orders from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, will be made available to congressional committees only and not released to the public.

"We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country," Gonzales said. "But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs."

Some of the documents were made available to Congress on Wednesday, according to a Capitol Hill source.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said his panel would review the records before "deciding what further oversight or legislative action is necessary." Only then, he said, "can the judiciary committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a moderate who is the ranking Republican on the panel, had joined the Democrats in demanding the records be turned over. At a feisty hearing last month, he sharply criticized the attorney general for his refusal to release the documents even though the FISA court's presiding judge had no objections.

On Wednesday, Specter, while thanking the administration for releasing the records to the committee, added that he might at some point make them public, as long as that would not violate privacy rules or jeopardize legitimate ongoing federal investigations.

"They will not be made public until I've had a chance to see them," he said. But "my own view is that there ought to be the maximum disclosure to the public consistent with national security procedures."

Central to the dispute has been the White House argument that extraordinary steps must be taken to protect Americans from further terrorist plots since the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and conflicting concerns among Democrats and civil libertarians that the spying appears to be a wholesale violation of individual freedoms.

Under the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the National Security Agency eavesdropped on telephone and e-mail conversations between people in the U.S. and abroad without first getting a warrant from the FISA court. The program was launched weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks and remained secret until it was exposed in the New York Times in late 2005, creating a public furor.

Now, with the Democrats controlling Capitol Hill, the spying program is likely to become the target of several congressional investigations into operations by the Bush White House.

For instance, House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) said Wednesday that his panel members also would read the material, and that he and Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the ranking Republican, would have their own questions into "whether the program is effective at tracking terror suspects and whether the program adequately protects the liberties of the American people."

Gonzales said that the Justice Department would cooperate with both committees, and that he hoped the congressional leaders would realize how important the domestic spying program had become to national security.

"It's important for us that they understand what we're doing," the attorney general said. "All they have to do is ask."

Justice Expands On Spy Program Details (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, February 1, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales expanded Congress' access Wednesday to classified documents detailing the government's domestic spying program but still didn't satisfy several lawmakers demanding information about surveillance.

Investigators' applications, legal briefs and orders issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court are now open to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House and Senate intelligence committees, Gonzales said.

Two weeks ago, the Senate Judiciary Committee — led by Democratic Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — criticized the attorney general for refusing to answer specific questions about the secret court's new oversight of the controversial program.

"We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country," Gonzales told reporters Wednesday. "But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs."

The documents would not be released publicly, the attorney general said. "We're talking about highly classified documents about highly classified activities of the United States government."

Leahy and Specter both said they welcomed the Bush administration's decision to show them the documents, which could give insight on how judges on the secret court consider evidence when approving government requests to spy on people in the United States who have suspected links to al-Qaida.

But Leahy said he will decide after he reviews the papers whether further oversight or legislative action is necessary. Specter stopped short of calling for them to be released publicly but said "there ought to be the maximum disclosure to the public, consistent with national security procedures."

"They will not be made public until I've had a chance to see them," Specter said.

The documents also are available to lawmakers and staffers on the House and Senate intelligence committees, who already were cleared to receive details about the spy program. But several lawmakers accused the Justice Department of still holding back crucial classified documents about the surveillance, including the original presidential order that created it in October 2001.

"We have informed Justice Department officials that the committee's requests for those documents remains in effect," House Intelligence Chairman Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, said in a statement. "We are hopeful that the administration will comply with those requests in a timely fashion and that further efforts to secure that material will not be necessary."

Congressional aides did not rule out the possibility of issuing a subpoena for those documents.

Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the department and Bush administration intelligence officials have provided "numerous documents and many briefings" to help lawmakers oversee the spy program.

The continued demands for more information underscores Congress' suspicions of the spying program, which President Bush secretly authorized after the 2001 terror attacks without court review. It was not revealed until December 2005, and has been a sore point for many lawmakers from both parties, as well as civil libertarians who fear people's privacy rights are being violated.

The warrantless program, run by the National Security Agency, monitors phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries that are suspected to be linked to agents of al-Qaida or affiliated terror groups. A federal judge in Detroit last August declared the program unconstitutional, and government lawyers were back in court Wednesday asking a Cincinnati-based appeals panel to drop a civil lawsuit against it.

The Justice Department argued that the American Civil Liberties Union's lawsuit is moot since the surveillance now is monitored by the FISA court. But the ACLU is asking the appeals court to uphold the earlier decision in August, since Bush retains authority to continue warrantless surveillance.

Gonzales described the decision to release the documents to Leahy and Specter as the result of ongoing negotiations between Congress and the administration. He said lawmakers most likely will not have to review the documents at the Justice Department, which keeps a tight grip on classified information, but offered few other details.

"It's important for us that they understand what we're doing," Gonzales said. "All they have to do is ask."

Records On Spy Program Turned Over To Lawmakers (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The Justice Department turned over documents about the government's controversial domestic spying program to select members of Congress yesterday, ending a two-week standoff that included pointed threats of subpoenas from Democrats.

The deal appears to resolve the latest conflict between Congress and the administration over the National Security Agency's surveillance effort, and it provides new evidence of the administration's more accommodating approach to the Democrats who now control Congress.

The agreement follows the administration's announcement two weeks ago that it was replacing NSA's warrantless surveillance program with a plan approved by the secret court that administers the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. The NSA had conducted the domestic spying for more than five years without court oversight.

Under yesterday's accord, announced by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, more than three dozen lawmakers will have access to the secret court orders governing the spying program that were issued Jan. 10 and the applications from the Justice Department that preceded them. The lawmakers include the House and Senate leaders, the members of the two intelligence panels and the heads of the two judiciary committees, officials said.

But Gonzales and other Bush administration officials also indicated that they had no intention of making the orders and related documents available to the public. The lawmakers and staff who view the records will be subject to strict statutes that bar disclosure of classified information. Congressional aides said it was unclear how much new information could be shared with the public.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the documents would help determine "what further oversight or legislative action is necessary.

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances," Leahy said.

Gonzales -- in remarks to reporters during an unrelated event announcing the formation of a human-trafficking unit at Justice -- played down any conflict with lawmakers. He said: "It's never been the case where we've said we would never provide access."

Gonzales said the orders cannot be released publicly because the subject matter is "highly classified."

One Justice official said Gonzales decided two weeks ago that both of the intelligence panels, along with Leahy and Arlen Specter (Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, should have access to the records.

But several congressional aides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the details of the negotiations, described a tense two-week standoff between the administration and lawmakers from both parties over the issue.

The staff members said the push for access was driven by Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.) and Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) -- the heads of the House and Senate intelligence panels -- who warned Justice Department officials that they would face congressional subpoenas if they did not turn over the records.

Reyes and other lawmakers said they would continue to push for other documents that the administration has refused to turn over, including the original order that created the NSA program in October 2001.

Shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, President Bush authorized the NSA to monitor telephone calls between the United States and overseas without warrants if one of the parties was believed to be linked to al-Qaeda or related groups. The program's existence was disclosed in media reports in December 2005.

Many lawmakers and civil liberties advocates called the program illegal, and a federal judge in Michigan ruled last August that it was unconstitutional and should be stopped. In oral arguments in an appeal of that case yesterday before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit, in Cincinnati, government lawyers said the lawsuit should be thrown out because of the new FISA orders.

Administration officials said previously that the NSA program could not be accommodated under FISA and that Bush had the power to authorize it on his own.

The administration abruptly changed course last month, however, by obtaining approval for the spying from an unidentified judge on the FISA court. But the outlines of the new effort remain unclear because the government has refused to release details.

One key question is whether the new approach resembles traditional criminal procedures -- which require the government to obtain a separate warrant for each individual it wants to monitor -- or whether it allows eavesdropping on a more broadly defined group of people. Several sources who have been briefed on the program have described it as a hybrid of the two.

Specter said on the Senate floor yesterday that earlier briefings by Justice "fell short" because the details of the new program were left unclear. "In order to meet the traditional safeguards for establishment of probable cause, there would have to be individual warrants," he said.

Key Lawmakers Getting Files About Surveillance Program (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Bowing to bipartisan pressure from lawmakers, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that it was turning over to selected members of Congress secret documents with details of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program.

The decision was made two weeks after Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales faced senators' withering questions about why the Bush administration had refused to provide details about the legal underpinnings of the program.

Last week, Representative Silvestre Reyes, the Texas Democrat who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, joined other committee members in threatening to subpoena documents related to the program.

Those threats prompted negotiations over the weekend between staff members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and Steven G. Bradbury, who leads the Office of Legal Counsel in the Justice Department.

The decision on the documents, which Mr. Gonzales confirmed Wednesday, will let members of the House and Senate intelligence committees, as well as a few Congressional leaders, review those court orders to determine whether the administration had significantly changed the program by putting it under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

A central question is whether the court will approve requests case by case or issue broad orders giving the government wide leeway to choose targets.

The document package for the lawmakers includes the Justice Department application for surveillance warrants from the special court and the legal briefs before the court approved a request on Jan. 10 for eavesdropping warrants.

Lawmakers from both parties applauded the decision, but promised that the new Congress would continue to scrutinize closely the legality of the program.

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Congressional officials said they were pressing the administration for more documents, including President Bush's original executive order that authorized the program, which was secretly established after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and did not require court warrants for certain wiretaps of calls between overseas and the United States.

Administration officials said they continued to want to limit future disclosures to Congress and were not agreeing to a precedent-setting arrangement in which everything that the special court reviewed would also be subject to Congressional review.

Just members of the intelligence committees and certain House and Senate leaders have been briefed on the highly classified program. Mr. Gonzales said a special provision would be made to allow the top members of the Judiciary Committees, who have not received the classified briefings, to review the FISA court documents.

Gonzales To Give Congress Secret Surveillance Papers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday agreed to hand over to some members of Congress previously secret documents on the government's domestic terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Gonzales, who acknowledged last month that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court had issued orders bringing the program under its jurisdiction, said the documents would be shared with members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and the Senate Judiciary Committee's chairman and ranking Republican.

The documents, which contain classified information, will not be made public.

"We've been working hard and having discussions to reach an appropriate accommodation as to how that access should be provided," Mr. Gonzales told reporters in Washington. "Access will be made available starting today."

The surveillance program, begun in 2001 after the September 11 attacks, gave law-enforcement authorities the ability to monitor telephone calls and e-mails to and from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

The Bush administration vigorously defended the legality of the program, saying it would be impossible to obtain warrants in time to intercept phone calls of those suspected of belonging to al Qaeda.

The Justice Department has said the program is "essential" in the war on terrorism, adding that it "ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack."

Last month, Mr. Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court would monitor Justice Department intercepts of international calls involving terrorism suspects in this country.

He said an order establishing oversight was issued Jan. 10 and gave the department, which conducts the program through the National Security Agency, the "necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages."

The announcement was considered a major concession by President Bush, who has argued since the secret program was publicly disclosed in 2005 that he did not need or want to use the special intelligence court.

During a Jan. 18 hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Mr. Gonzales was challenged by panel members on why the Bush administration had taken more than five years to seek oversight by an independent court for its wiretapping program.

Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, has been critical of the White House for its refusal to disclose details of the surveillance program. He called the policy a "clear-cut violation" of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) and said the administration could have moved quicker to get court approval.

"I cannot help but conclude that there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency on behalf of the Department of Justice to get this job done faster," he said.

He said yesterday that the documents would "not be made public until I've had a chance to see them."

Rep. Heather A. Wilson, New Mexico Republican and a senior member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said the administration did not intend to release other documents that explain how the FISA court's orders comply with the 1978 surveillance law the court oversees.

"We are playing hide the ball down at the Justice Department," said Mrs. Wilson, who told House intelligence committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat, that she would support the issuance of a subpoena if necessary.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, said the Bush administration made "the right decision" in changing its course of "unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program."

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances," he said.

Lawmakers Receive Details Of Government Surveillance Program (MCT)

By Greg Gordon, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125253

WASHINGTON - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Wednesday turned over to key legislators copies of a secret court's "highly classified" orders spelling out how the administration has stopped wiretapping suspected terrorists without warrants and is now spying with judicial supervision.

Gonzales disclosed the decision, which averts a confrontation that might have brought congressional subpoenas, during a news briefing at the Justice Department.

The classified documents lay out details of a secret arrangement approved by a judge on an 11-member national security court that puts the spying program under its jurisdiction. The material was delivered to members of the House and Senate intelligence committees late in the day, congressional aides said.

The documents also will be made available to Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, both of whom have asked to review the new arrangement.

Leahy, Specter and members of the intelligence committees have voiced concern that the eavesdropping on some Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails may have violated their constitutional rights. Leahy and Specter praised President Bush for granting their requests to review details of the latest arrangement.

"The president has made the right decision in changing his previous course of unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program, to now following the law by seeking court approval for these wiretaps," Leahy said.

But he said he would "have to look at the court's order to determine whether the administration has reached that proper balance to protect Americans while following the law."

Specter called the move "a significant step forward" but said he would reserve judgment until he had reviewed the documents.

Those include Justice Department applications for what administration officials have described as a complicated arrangement to expedite the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's approval of electronic surveillance on American citizens' overseas phone calls and e-mails. The court was created under a 1978 law to approve warrants in espionage and terrorism investigations.

The administration has said it's eavesdropping only if one party to the communication is likely to be affiliated with al-Qaida or an associated terrorist group.

Gonzales said that the documents being released detail "highly classified activities" and must remain secret because their public disclosure "may jeopardize the national security of our country." He said that other documents on the program are "especially sensitive," and it's still not clear whether they'll be given to Congress.

The National Security Agency started the surveillance program shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and ran it for years without warrants or judicial review and in apparent violation of constitutional protections. The New York Times disclosed the program in December 2005, provoking an outcry from civil libertarians and others.

After a federal judge in Detroit ruled the program illegal last summer and Democrats seized control of Congress, Gonzales disclosed in January that the Justice Department had worked out an arrangement under which the FISA court would oversee the program. Justice Department officials said the new arrangement was under way for some time and was unrelated to an American Civil Liberties Union lawsuit that led to a court injunction halting the program or to the Democrats' election victory.

A panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments Wednesday on the government's petition for dismissal of U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's ruling last August ordering the government to halt the surveillance program because it was unconstitutional. Administration lawyers argued that that case is now moot, because the surveillance is now under the jurisdiction of the national security court.

But lawyers for the ACLU, representing 10 groups and individuals that contend that they have had to arrange secret meetings to communicate with overseas associates because of the wiretaps, said the case cannot be moot because the administration claims that Bush still has the power to conduct the surveillance without warrants.

Judges Weigh Arguments In U.S. Eavesdropping Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

DOJ_NMG_0125254

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 31 — Three federal judges hearing the first appellate argument about the legality of a National Security Agency domestic surveillance program on Wednesday indicated that they were not that convinced the issue was moot now that the Bush administration had agreed to submit the program to a secret court.

In a series of sharply worded questions to an administration lawyer defending the program, the judges noted that the administration did not promise to continue working with the secret court in the future.

"You could opt out at any time, couldn't you?" asked Judge Ronald L. Gilman of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre acknowledged the possibility.

But the judges pressed Mr. Garre's adversary, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union, just as hard on a different point — whether her clients had suffered injuries direct and concrete enough to give them standing to sue.

"Explain to me how we get to a finding of standing?" Judge Julia S. Gibbons asked.

Judge Gibbons repeated the question in similar form several times.

Ms. Beeson said the plaintiffs, who include lawyers and journalists, have had to change the way they communicate with clients and sources in the Middle East because they feared that their discussions would not be confidential.

But Judge Gibbons and Judge Alice M. Batchelder seemed skeptical about whether that sort of general and speculative fear was sufficient.

The government has refused to say whether it eavesdropped on the plaintiffs.

"Telling our enemies who is the subject of surveillance would reveal information that could harm the national security," Mr. Garre said Wednesday.

The A.C.L.U. brought suit last year after an article in The New York Times disclosed the existence of the program, which monitors the international communications of people in the United States without court approval.

In August, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court in Detroit ordered the program shut down. The decision has been stayed during the appeal to the Sixth Circuit.

Judge Gilman raised the possibility that the legality of the program might never be adjudicated. "If the plaintiffs here don't have standing," he said, "who would possibly have standing?"

While Mr. Garre urged the court to dismiss the case under threshold questions like mootness and standing, Ms. Beeson tried to steer the judges toward the merits.

"A failure to decide the case will leave it up to the president whether and when to follow the law," Ms. Beeson said.

Over the course of the litigation, the government has refined some of its arguments.

Early statements from various administration officials appeared to concede that the program violated a 1978 law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

But the government's appellate filings say that is an open question and one that cannot be answered without disclosing state secrets.

At several points in the argument, Mr. Garre said that the so-called state secrets privilege was a litigation showstopper. The privilege requires courts to limit or dismiss cases when allowing them to proceed would disclose information harmful to national security.

Several courts have ruled, however, that the administration's general description and defense of the N.S.A. program meant that it was no longer secret and that questions about its legality could be decided without raising national security concerns.

Assuming the court finds a path through the thicket of preliminary objections, it will be left with the question of whether the president was entitled to ignore the 1978 law when he authorized eavesdropping that bypassed warrants.

Mr. Garre said that a 2001 Congressional authorization to use military force after the Sept. 11 attacks overrode the law.

Judge Gilman seemed unconvinced. "I understand your argument," he said. "I'm not sure I agree with it."

The administration has also said that the president has the constitutional power, regardless of what Congress has to say, to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance in wartime.

DOJ_NMG_0125255

Judge Taylor's decision striking down the program was sweeping, and her reasoning, which was in places unorthodox, attracted criticism even from legal scholars who supported her conclusion.

In its public briefs, the government said Judge Taylor had taken "the unprecedented step of permanently enjoining a foreign intelligence gathering program authorized by the commander in chief to protect the nation from foreign attacks in wartime."

The government has also filed classified versions of its briefs and other documents, which are available only to the judges.

Judge Batchelder was appointed by President George Bush, Judge Gilman by President Bill Clinton, and Judge Gibbons by President George W. Bush.

Appeals Court Hears Wiretapping Case (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

The ACLU says the program is illegal and has done harm. The Justice Department argues it's both legal and moot.

CINCINNATI — A lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union urged a federal appeals court on Wednesday to affirm a lower-court decision that the Bush administration's Terrorist Surveillance Program was illegal and show "the president that he has to obey the law."

But a Justice Department lawyer maintained that the program was legal and called on the judges to overturn the ruling, while also arguing that the case was now moot.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals peppered the attorneys with questions about broad constitutional principles as well as the issue of whether the ACLU's clients had legal standing to challenge the program.

In a related development in Washington, the administration agreed Wednesday to turn over to Congress classified documents related to the surveillance program.

At the hearing in Cincinnati, Justice Department attorney Gregory Garre said that when Congress authorized the use of military force after the Sept. 11 attacks, it clearly contemplated that the president would have the authority to conduct counterintelligence surveillance of the type used in the program. Garre said it would be unprecedented for a U.S. court to say that a president did not have such power.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled in Detroit that the warrantless domestic surveillance program violated the 1st and 4th amendments to the Constitution and ran afoul of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law was created in 1978 in response to revelations about illegal government surveillance of hundreds of Americans, including the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

ACLU attorney Ann Beeson said that the administration's post-Sept. 11 surveillance program clearly violated FISA, which requires a warrant to be issued before surveillance is conducted.

She told the judges that if they accepted Garre's argument, it would, in effect, mean that the FISA law had been overridden without Congress saying that it wished to do so. "To rule for the government" in this case would mean "the president has unbridled power," Beeson told the judges.

"Congress did its part," by passing the FISA statute, Beeson said. Now, after the government acted in "direct violation" of FISA for more than four years, she said, "it is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil."

She also asked the court to unseal secret documents the government had filed in the case.

Garre asserted though that the case was moot now because of the Jan. 17 announcement by Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the Bush administration had made an agreement with the FISA court to get surveillance warrants there. "We have eliminated the central premise" of the case, Garre said.

At least two of the judges hearing the appeal — Ronald Lee Gilman, an appointee of President Clinton, and Alice Batchelder, an appointee of the first President Bush — expressed skepticism about that contention.

"The FISA court didn't wake up one morning and call — you went to them," Batchelder said.

"You could opt out of FISA any time, couldn't you?" Gilman asked.

"That's absolutely true," Garre responded. But he reiterated the central arguments the Justice Department had made since the ACLU filed the suit a year ago on behalf of a group of lawyers, journalists and scholars. He said the suit had to be dismissed because it violated the "state secrets" privilege.

First recognized by the Supreme Court 54 years ago in U.S. vs. Reynolds, the privilege bars disclosure of information in court proceedings when "there is a reasonable danger that the compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged."

The plaintiffs have not been able to demonstrate that the program concretely harmed them, Garre said. They have alleged only "speculative" harm, and that is insufficient to entitle them to sue, he said. Moreover, the only way the plaintiffs could find out whether they had been the targets of wiretapping was if they obtained information about the surveillance program in violation of the state secrets privilege, Garre said.

"Telling our enemies who is subject to surveillance … would harm national security," he said.

Beeson countered that Garre had overstated the breadth of the state-secrets privilege, and she maintained that her clients had suffered "concrete harm" by having to forego conversations with individuals who they reasonably believed that might be the targets of surveillance.

She noted, for example, that New Mexico defense lawyer Nancy Hollander had to travel to Africa and the Middle East to do research on behalf of clients — work she normally could have done through telephone conversations or e-mail.

Beeson said that hundreds of lawyers had to change their behavior as a result of the surveillance program and that this hampered their ability to effectively represent their clients.

The judges did not indicate when they would rule.

Warrantless Wiretapping Challenged In US Court (AFP)

AFP, February 1, 2007

President George W. Bush's domestic surveillance program came under fire in a federal appeals court, when opponents challenged it as an unconstitutional abuse of presidential power.

Critics of the program asked the US 6th Circuit Court of Appeals to uphold a lower court decision that the spy program is illegal unless it is subject to court supervision.

They also asked for the appeals court to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in the case, which describe how the program is being administered.

At issue is whether or not the administration will receive blanket approval to spy on its citizens or if every case will be approved individually.

They have the support of Senator Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who accused the Justice Department of "limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome of these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday that the high ranking senators would have access to the documents in order to oversee the program but refused to declassify them.

Bush started the wiretapping program after the September 11 attacks five years ago and has said he does not need court oversight to authorize the surveillance.

A district court judge ordered Bush to shut down the program on August 17, ruling that there are "no hereditary kings in America and no power not created by the Constitution."

Bush agreed on January 10 to allow that court to oversee the surveillance program, but he maintains he is not obligated to do so.

Government lawyers argued that the case is moot because the president has agreed to court supervision.

The judges, however, suggested a constitutional issue remains, since Bush has said he could resume the program without court oversight in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0125257

"You could opt out at any time, couldn't you?" asked Judge Ronald Lee Gilman.

"That's absolutely true," said Gregory Garre, a deputy solicitor general.

Critics said that's why the 6th Circuit must declare Bush's original program unconstitutional.

"A failure to decide this case would leave it up to the president to decide whether or when to follow the law," said Ann Beeson, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, which sued last year to halt the program.

"It is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil."

Government lawyers told the three 6th Circuit judges Wednesday that the ACLU's case compromises national security because it would require the government to publicly discuss the surveillance.

"Telling our enemies who is subject to surveillance ... would harm national security," Garre argued.

The three-judge panel did not decide the case Wednesday and could take months before issuing an opinion.

U.S. Probes Equity Firm Tied To Islamic Investors (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The counterterrorism division of the Justice Department is investigating whether a private equity firm in Boston that manages hundreds of millions of dollars for Muslim investors overseas violated tax laws.

The investigation of Overland Capital Group was disclosed in a filing with U.S. District Court in Boston and reported by the Wall Street Journal yesterday.

The filing claims that Overland and a subsidiary of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust (DMI), a financial group in Geneva, conducted acts "that implicate potential violation of the Internal Revenue Code." The filing does not mention terrorism , though it was submitted by a U.S. attorney who works in counterterrorism.

Subsidiaries of DMI, an umbrella organization for Islamic financial institutions, have been named as suspects in probes by U.S. counterterrorism agencies. DMI also is a defendant in a civil lawsuit brought by families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who claim that it funded al-Qaeda. DMI has denied those claims and noted that none of its officials has been charged with terrorism-related crimes.

DMI officials say it has no direct relationship to Overland. But corporate filings in the U.S. show that the firms have a joint venture called First Leasing Bank in Bahrain. The Journal reported that DMI's chief executive headed some of Overland's investment ventures.

DMI was founded in the early 1980s by Prince Mohammed al-Faisal al-Saud, a member of the Saudi royal family. It caters to investors who want to follow the Koran, which prohibits the collection of interest payments.

Overland was founded in October 2001 and has investments worth $1.5 billion, mainly in real estate, according to its Web site. Chief executive James M. Godec said in a written statement yesterday that Overland "followed both the letter and the spirit of the law in every instance" and that he would "vigorously defend our reputation."

The filing came to light through litigation between Overland and a former employee, Laird A. Fairchild, who claimed that he was wrongfully dismissed. Fairchild cooperated with federal investigators after his termination, an act that Overland said violated his confidentiality agreements with the company.

Overland and the DMI subsidiary sued to compel Fairchild to reveal to them what he had told federal investigators. Through its filing in Boston, the Justice Department obtained a court order that allowed Fairchild to remain silent.

Geoffrey Harper, Fairchild's attorney, said yesterday that U.S. attorneys went to "elaborate lengths" to make sure that Fairchild would not reveal what he told government investigators. He said the Justice Department has concerns beyond the tax practices of Overland and DMI.

"It would be inaccurate to suggest that the only thing they are looking at is taxes," Harper said.

Hub Firm Denies Tie To Terror (BOS)

US tax probe studies links to groups that may fund extremists

The chief executive of a Boston private equity firm under federal investigation for its connection to groups that allegedly finance Islamic extremists denied yesterday that his company is linked to terrorism.

"We do everything appropriately and by the book, and we adhere not just to the letter of the law but to the spirit of the law," said James M. Godec of Overland Capital Group. "I am extraordinarily cautious about this kind of stuff."

The US Department of Justice probe centers on alleged criminal tax law violations by Overland. A federal grand jury in Boston is examining suspected tax evasion by the company, according to a filing last week in US District Court in Massachusetts, and Overland's offices at 111 Huntington Ave. in Boston and in Braintree were raided two weeks ago by Internal Revenue Service agents who seized numerous records.

The Justice Department lawyer named in the filing, Corey J. Smith, works in the terrorism financing unit of the department's criminal division; since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorism attacks, prosecutors have increasingly used tax laws to bring terrorism cases against wealthy Middle Easterners suspected of funneling money to terrorist groups. The investigation was disclosed in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

"By policy, we never confirm or deny whether or not there's an investigation into an entity or a person," said the spokesman, Dean Boyd.

Overland, which has more than $1.5 billion in assets under management, was founded in October 2001 by Godec and several other former KeyBank investment professionals. The 23-person firm represents international investors, particularly in Europe and the Middle East, seeking real estate and equipment-leasing investment opportunities in the United States.

The original majority owner of Overland was Islamic Investment Co. of the Gulf Ltd., a unit of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust, or DMI, a Geneva-based financial group founded by a senior member of the royal family of Saudi Arabia. DMI specializes in Islamic banking, which prohibits paying or receiving interest and dealing in liquor, pork, gambling, or pornography. The US government suspects that terrorist groups sometimes access money with support from people involved in Islamic banking.

A DMI affiliate called Faisal Private Bank was investigated by US counterterrorism agencies in the mid-1990s for suspected connections to extremists, and both DMI and Faisal are defendants in civil litigation in New York brought by families of Sept. 11 victims who claim they funded al Qaeda.

Overland's two primary institutional investment clients are Islamic Investment Co. of the Gulf Ltd. and Shamil Bank of Bahrain, according to Godec. He said Overland, which is audited by KPMG, goes through an extensive due diligence process with its investors, whom he described as "mature, sober, older guys in their 50s and up."

"I know these guys," he said. "I believe in these guys, and I believe in their integrity and honesty.

"I understand and sympathize with what the government needs to do for national security, but I believe in what I do and will stand up in defense of it," added Godec, noting that his family has a long history of military and government service. He said his father was a career member of the US Air Force, his mother was a 25-year IRS employee, and his brother, Robert F. Godec, is US ambassador to Tunisia.

"In my heart, I know what we've done is entirely appropriate and entirely correct," he said.

Godec said he has not been subpoenaed or contacted by prosecutors.

"We'd like to get to the bottom of this, and we have offered to cooperate," he added, "and it would be nice if people would be forthcoming with us so we can have the opportunity to be forthcoming with them."

Godec, 44, who lives in Brookline, left KeyBank in Cleveland to start Overland. He had previously practiced at several Boston law firms, including Bernkopf, Goodman & Baseman; Goodwin Procter; and Rackemann, Sawyer, & Brewster. He has bachelor's and law degrees from the University of Virginia, where he majored in Middle Eastern studies and studied Islam, Islamic history, Arabic, and Farsi.

Last week's filing in Boston federal court, which disclosed the grand jury probe, stemmed from a wrongful termination lawsuit filed by a former Overland employee, Laird Fairchild, who left the firm in March 2004 when Overland closed its Dallas office, according to Fairchild's lawyer, Geoffrey S. Harper. Fairchild, who is now with the Dallas office of Hunter Chase, a real estate private equity firm, did not return a call for comment.

But according to Harper, "Laird has been identified as a material witness in [the federal] investigation, and he has been providing them documents for the grand jury. . . . He has been working with them for some time."

Harper also said , "Overland wants to know what Laird has been telling the government, and the government doesn't want to answer that question."

Overland also has an office in Clifton Park, N.Y.

Judge Shelves Gitmo Detainee Cases (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

Sixteen lawsuits by Guantanamo Bay detainees were put on hold Wednesday by a federal judge who said he may no longer have jurisdiction to hear their cases.

U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton in Washington said the Military Commissions Act, signed into law in October, has left him unable to consider whether the detainees can challenge being held at the Navy facility in Cuba.

An appeals court in Washington is considering whether civilian jurists can rule on those cases. Until that issue is resolved, Walton said, "it is this court's view that it lacks the authority to take any action in these cases."

Walton's six-page order denying the motions challenging detention of the 16 men left open the possibility of refiling the requests if the appeals court decides civilian courts can review detainee cases.

If the appeals panel "concludes that this court retains some degree of jurisdiction over any or all of the above-captioned cases, the matters will be automatically reopened as appropriate," he wrote.

The Justice Department welcomed the ruling, said spokesman Erik Ablin. He called the military tribunals, which can be appealed, "more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts."

The New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the detainees, said Walton's decision will delay justice for an estimated 200 people imprisoned at Guantanamo.

German Court Challenges C.I.A. Over Abduction (NYT)

By Mark Landler

FRANKFURT, Jan. 31 — A German court on Wednesday issued an arrest warrant for 13 people in the mistaken kidnapping and jailing of a German citizen of Lebanese descent, in the most serious legal challenge yet to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret transfers of terrorism suspects.

Prosecutors in Munich said the suspects, whom they did not identify, were part of a C.I.A. "abduction team" that seized the man, Khaled el-Masri, in Macedonia in late 2003 and flew him to Afghanistan. He was imprisoned there for five months, during which, he said, he was shackled, beaten and interrogated about alleged ties to Al Qaeda, before being released without charges.

His ordeal is the most extensively documented case of the C.I.A.'s practice of "extraordinary rendition," in which terrorism suspects are seized and sent for interrogation to other countries, including some in which torture is practiced.

"This is a very consequential step," August Stern, the prosecutor in Munich, said in a telephone interview. "It is a necessary step before bringing a criminal case against these people."

The Central Intelligence Agency has never acknowledged any role in Mr. Masri's detention, and a C.I.A. spokesman declined to comment on Wednesday. The German government said it would not comment on the case, except to affirm the independence of the public prosecutor.

Mr. Stern said investigators would seek to establish the true identities of the 13 people, most of whom are believed to use aliases. They include the four pilots of the Boeing 737 that picked up Mr. Masri, a mechanic and several C.I.A. operatives, people familiar with the case said.

Issuing an arrest warrant is a major expansion of the legal challenge to the C.I.A.'s rendition program in Europe. Italian prosecutors are seeking indictments against 25 C.I.A. operatives and Italy's former intelligence chief for the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric in 2003.

In Germany, unlike Italy, defendants cannot be tried in absentia. As a practical matter it is unlikely that the Bush administration will acquiesce in the extradition to Germany of the 13 suspects. But the arrest warrant could further hinder their ability to move around Europe. The German case also carries more weight, legal experts said, because of the reputation of courts here for painstaking deliberation and because of recent efforts to repair damaged diplomatic ties between Germany and the United States.

It is, in fact, a delicate time for both countries. The Bush administration has faced a drumbeat of criticism because of its antiterrorism policies since the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, while the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, has been eager to heal rifts over the Iraq war.

"It is unique that a German court would issue warrants against 13 C.I.A. agents," said Hans-Christian Ströbele, a Green Party member of a German parliamentary committee that is investigating the flights.

The arrest warrants, which were first reported in The Los Angeles Times on Wednesday, also have political implications within Germany, where the role of the government in tolerating — or even facilitating — C.I.A. flights has come under increased scrutiny. Frankfurt Airport was reportedly used for many of the flights, as was the American air base at Ramstein.

On Wednesday, a German broadcaster, NDR, published what it said were the names of the 13 people — 11 men and 2 women. Mr. Stern declined to discuss the names, which have been picked up by other German news organizations.

Although the prosecutor's action on Wednesday was the first major legal development in the case, the German news media have been speculating about it for months. In September a television program, "Panorama," tracked down three of those named in North Carolina. They declined to comment on their activities.

For Mr. Masri, who has had to overcome a tide of public skepticism about his account since it was first reported in The New York Times in early 2005, the court's action is a significant step in bolstering the credibility of his claims, said his lawyer, Manfred Gnjidic.

"This is unbelievably important for our case," Mr. Gnjidic said in an interview. "It's the first direct sign of the German government against the C.I.A. that they did the wrong thing."

Mr. Masri, who is unemployed, lives in the southern German city of Neu-Ulm. The lawyer said Mr. Masri had been buoyed by a statement of support from the former German interior minister, Otto Schily.

Mr. Masri is petitioning a federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., to reinstate a lawsuit against the agency. Last May a federal judge threw out a suit brought by Mr. Masri, accepting the government's contention that it would be impossible to hold a trial without disclosing state secrets.

The Justice Department has declined to help the German prosecutors in their investigation, which has made the Germans dependent on information from other sources, including journalists investigating the C.I.A. practice of transferring suspects across international borders.

A major break, Mr. Stern said, came from a Spanish reporter who compiled a list of the names of people said to have been involved in Mr. Masri's abduction from sources in the Civil Guard, a Spanish paramilitary police agency. The C.I.A. used the Spanish island of Majorca as a logistics center for its flights, Mr. Gnjidic said, and the authorities found the names of members of the rendition team on hotel logs there.

Mr. Stern also credited tips from prosecutors in Milan and from Dick Marty, a Swiss senator who conducted an inquiry on the transfer issue on behalf of the Council of Europe.

The nature of Germany's role in Mr. Masri's case, and in other C.I.A. flights, remains murky. Mr. Masri has asserted that he was interrogated three times inside his prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, by a German who identified himself as "Sam."

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, has said he was not told of the abduction until June 2004, after Mr. Masri had been released in Albania. As chief of staff to Gerhard Schröder, then the chancellor, Mr. Steinmeier oversaw all German intelligence services.

Mr. Steinmeier is facing questions about his role in another case, involving a German-born Turkish man imprisoned for four and a half years at the American military jail in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The man, Murat Kurnaz, was released by the United States last August after lengthy negotiations between Germany and the United States. But internal German intelligence documents indicate that the Germans turned down an offer by the Americans to send Mr. Kurnaz home as early as 2002.

Mr. Steinmeier has insisted that the Americans never made an official offer to release Mr. Kurnaz. He has also noted that worries about security were running high in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. German newspapers have been full of speculation about whether the affair will cost Mr. Steinmeier his job.

Germans Charge 13 CIA Operatives (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 31 -- The CIA's clandestine program of abducting suspected terrorists and taking them to secret sites for interrogation unraveled further on Wednesday as German prosecutors issued arrest warrants for 13 agency operatives in the kidnapping of a German citizen in the Balkans in December 2003.

The case is the second in which European prosecutors have filed charges against CIA employees involved in counterterrorism operations. Italian prosecutors have charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric on a Milan street in 2003 and taking him to Cairo, where he says he was tortured.

European law enforcement authorities acknowledged that it is highly unlikely that any CIA officers -- most of whom work undercover, using false identities -- would be apprehended or extradited from the United States. But the arrest warrants, filed in Munich, mark yet another case in which CIA activities in Europe since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, have strained diplomatic ties and underscored deep differences between the United States and its transatlantic allies over how to fight terrorism.

Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld, the chief prosecutor in Munich, said the 13 CIA operatives were wanted on suspicion of kidnapping and inflicting bodily harm on Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent. Masri has said he was detained by border guards Dec. 31, 2003, while en route to a holiday in Macedonia, and handed over to the CIA, which took him to a secret prison in Afghanistan and interrogated him about his alleged ties to Islamic radicals in Germany.

After five months in detention -- during which, he said, he was physically abused -- Masri was flown back to the Balkans and dumped on a hillside in Albania after his captors apparently decided they had apprehended the wrong man. German prosecutors said they were skeptical when he came to them with his bizarre-sounding story but later corroborated many parts of his account.

Robert Wood, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Berlin, declined to comment on the arrest warrants, as did a State Department spokesman in Washington. The CIA also declined to comment.

German prosecutors said they received a list of CIA operatives suspected of involvement in Masri's disappearance from authorities and a journalist in Spain. According to hotel records and flight logs, the crew of the privately chartered CIA plane that carried Masri from the Balkans to Afghanistan had stopped for a few days beforehand on the Spanish resort island of Palma de Mallorca.

Prosecutors in Munich did not name the suspects publicly and released few other details about the probe. But Schmidt-Sommerfeld said that all of the suspects used aliases and that investigators were still trying to learn their true identities.

"Ongoing analysis will concentrate on, among other things, determining the correct personal details of the suspects," he said.

The German state television network NDR released a list of 11 men and two women it said were named in the arrest warrants. According to the station, some of the suspects worked as pilots for Aero Contractors, an aviation firm based in Smithfield, N.C. Flight data show that Aero operated the Boeing 737 that carried Masri to Kabul on Jan. 24, 2004.

Aero Contractors was named as a defendant in a lawsuit Masri filed in U.S. District Court.

An employee who answered the phone at Aero's headquarters said no one was available to comment on the arrest warrants.

At a news conference in Augsberg, Germany, Masri's attorney called the arrest warrants "a great success" and said his client was "very satisfied" with the outcome of the investigation. At the same time, the lawyer, Manfred Gnjidic, said he realized it was doubtful that German authorities would be able to track down any of the suspects and bring them to trial.

"It is a very clear signal that the German ruling powers will not tolerate this action, this criminal action, against a German citizen and would like to hold those accountable," Gnjidic said.

German arrest warrants are not legally enforceable in the United States, although the prosecutors in Munich could seek to have the suspects arrested if they traveled to other nations in the European Union.

The German government said it learned of Masri's abduction from Daniel R. Coats, then the U.S. ambassador to Germany, in May 2004. Coats told Otto Schily, then Germany's interior minister, that Masri had been grabbed mistakenly but was paid off to keep quiet, according to German officials. Coats also asked Schily to keep the affair a secret, the officials said. Masri has denied receiving any money.

U.S. officials have not publicly admitted any guilt or responsibility. In December 2005, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged in a meeting in Berlin that Masri had been "erroneously taken." But U.S. diplomats denied she had done so.

A year later, when asked by a reporter in Washington whether the United States owed Masri an apology, Rice declined to offer one. "We have tried to deal with this case in a way that is responsible and -- you know, that's all I'm going to say about this case," she said.

Masri filed suit against the CIA, but his complaint was dismissed in May on grounds that it could damage national security operations. The decision is on appeal.

Some details surrounding Masri's disappearance remain murky. The ponytailed car salesman has said he was interrogated in Afghanistan by a man named "Sam" who was fluent in German and hinted that he worked for German intelligence. The German government has denied any involvement in Masri's kidnapping or detention.

Johannes Jung, a member of a German parliamentary committee that has scrutinized Masri's case, said the arrest warrants would send a strong message to the United States. The committee has investigated the extralegal abductions of two other German residents by U.S. counterterrorism agents, a practice known as "extraordinary rendition."

"This policy of rendition has to be stopped," said Jung, a member of the Social Democratic Party. "It's totally out of control, and the U.S. needs to rethink its policy in this regard. We couldn't imagine that this policy of rendition could really be true, but we have learned that it is true."

Germany Orders Arrest Of 13 CIA Operatives (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

BERLIN — A Munich court has ordered the arrest of 13 U.S. intelligence operatives in connection with the kidnapping and beating of a German citizen who was interrogated for five months at a secret prison in Afghanistan, prosecutors announced today.

The suspects belong to a CIA-sponsored team that allegedly flew Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, from Macedonia to Afghanistan in January 2004. Each of the accused, all but one of whom were identified only by aliases, were charged with kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm.

Police found a "strong suspicion" that the operatives were involved in Masri's disappearance, said a statement released by the Munich prosecutor's office. "According to the information we have, the suspects listed in the arrest warrants are believed to be so-called code names of CIA agents. The investigation will now focus on learning the actual names of the suspects."

Legal experts said it was unlikely the accused, including four pilots, a medic and members of an operations unit, would appear before a German court. CIA and State Department officials have refused to comment in detail about the Masri case, but the Bush administration has said anti-terror laws allow for such covert operations, known as "extraordinary renditions." U.S. officials have denied allegations of torture.

"As far as I know, the German court has never issued an arrest warrant against 13 CIA officials all at once," said Hans-Christian Stroeble, a member of a parliamentary committee investigating the Masri case. His Greens Party has criticized the renditions program as a violation of human rights. "This is a great success."

The intelligence operatives, most of whom are believed to be Americans, are alleged to have been involved in a mission that loaded a bound and drugged Masri onto a Boeing 737 that flew him from Skopje, Macedonia to Afghanistan in the early morning of Jan. 24, 2004. Masri had been detained weeks earlier by Macedonian security officials when he attempted to cross the Serbian-Macedonian border. He said while in Macedonian custody he was beaten and photographed naked.

German prosecutors were initially skeptical about Masri's tale of disappearing into a hidden dimension in the fight against terrorism and being held for five months of interrogation and abuse until he was released in the mountains of Albania in May 2004. But German authorities said they concluded that the car salesman and father of four was telling the truth.

German officials believe Masri was the victim of mistaken identity: a man with the same name as a suspected terrorist linked to Al Qaeda. Former Interior Minister Otto Shilly has told a German government committee that U.S. officials privately apologized for the abduction.

U.S. authorities never charged Masri with a crime and German prosecutors have criticized Washington for not cooperating with their investigation. German officials allege that the operatives, many of whom live in North Carolina, work for Aero Contractors, which has links to the CIA. The company is connected to Premier Executive Transport Services Inc., which held the registration for the Boeing that transported Masri, according to European aviation documents.

The case has led to questions within the German government. The parliamentary committee is investigating whether German agents were involved in the abduction and why Foreign Minster Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who then oversaw intelligence agencies for the chancellery, did not immediately disclose his knowledge of the affair.

The case, at times, has agitated the improving relationship between Berlin and Washington. In 2005, after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rise, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said she was pleased that the Bush administration "admitted this man [Masri] had been erroneously taken."

But a senior U.S. official quickly denied such a characterization, saying that Masri was released because Washington "no longer had evidence or intelligence to justify" his detention.

Warrants Target 13 CIA Agent Suspects (WT/AP)

By David Rising

BERLIN -- German prosecutors said yesterday that they have issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA agents suspected of abducting a German citizen in an apparent anti-terrorist operation gone wrong.

It was Washington's second European ally to seek the arrest of CIA agents on charges of spiriting away a terrorism suspect. Italian prosecutors want to question 25 agents and one other American in the purported kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric suspected of terrorism.

Prosecutor Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld said the warrants were issued in the past few days against the 13 on suspicion of false imprisonment and serious bodily harm in connection with the abduction of Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent.

Mr. el-Masri maintains he was abducted in December 2003 at the Serbian-Macedonian border and flown by the CIA to a detention center in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he says he was abused.

None of the suspects was identified. But Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld later said in a statement that "the personal details contained in the arrest warrants are, according to our current knowledge, aliases of CIA agents."

Germany's NDR television released a list of the names of the 13 -- 11 men and two women -- it said its reporters had obtained.

At the State Department, spokesman Tom Casey said the United States would review the claims. "Certainly, we will take a look at that information once it is actually made available."

But he declined further comment, referring to a lawsuit by Mr. el-Masri against the U.S. government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. officials have declined to address the case. But German Chancellor Angela Merkel has said Washington has acknowledged making a mistake with Mr. el-Masri.

Mr. el-Masri has said he was released in Albania in May 2004 after the CIA discovered they had the wrong person.

DOJ_NMG_0125264

Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld said prosecutors in December 2005 received a list of people thought to be involved in the kidnapping. The list was compiled by a Spanish journalist from sources within the country's Civil Guard, a paramilitary police unit.

With help from Spanish authorities, they were then able pursue an investigation against "concrete persons," Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld said.

Investigators also received tips from others, including the Milan, Italy, prosecutor's office and Dick Marty, a Swiss senator who led an inquiry into CIA renditions on behalf of the Council of Europe.

The CIA agents are suspected of having flown from the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca to Macedonia in January 2004 aboard a Boeing 737 to pick up Mr. el-Masri, Munich prosecutor August Stern said.

Mr. el-Masri has asked a federal appeals court in Richmond to reinstate a lawsuit he filed against the CIA. A lower court dismissed the lawsuit in May, ruling that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

Britain Jails 9 On Terrorism Suspicion (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 1, 2007

LONDON — British police arrested nine people on suspicion of terrorism Wednesday but declined to confirm media reports that the suspects intended to kidnap and behead a Muslim British soldier and post a video of his execution on the Internet.

Eight of the suspects were picked up in pre-dawn raids on their homes in a predominantly Pakistani neighborhood in Birmingham. The ninth was arrested on a highway in the area.

Police in West Midlands, the county that includes Birmingham, said the nine were arrested on "suspicion of the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism."

David Shaw, assistant chief constable of the West Midlands Police, did not say whether the suspects were Muslims. In remarks to reporters, though, he went out of his way to thank Birmingham's Muslim community for its help with the arrests.

Shaw would not comment on reports by the BBC, Sky News and other outlets that the suspects intended to kill a British army soldier and post Internet video of the murder.

The 4 a.m. raids were led by the Midlands Counterterrorism Unit, supported by West Midlands Police and London's Metropolitan Police.

Twelve addresses in several Birmingham areas were sealed off for additional searches, according to police. Four commercial sites were among those sealed, Shaw said.

The raids exposed divides in predominantly Pakistani neighborhoods in Birmingham.

"People don't trust their own children anymore," said Shabir Hussain, chairman of the Ludlow Road Mosque in Birmingham. "You feel like you should challenge your son or daughter: 'Where are you going at night? What are you watching on TV? What are you doing on the Internet?' "

Shaw said the investigation could take several days or weeks. "This remains a dynamic, fluid operation," he said. "And this is by no means finished."

Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism analyst at the Swedish National Defense College, said a plot like that described by British news outlets would signal that terrorists are trying new methods to spread fear in Europe.

"An incident like this would certainly raise the threshold for shock value," he said.

Terrorists, familiar with tactics used by insurgents in Iraq, can be expected to export whatever method they can to induce shock and spread fear, Ranstorp said. "The critical issue is: Are we ahead of the terrorists' innovations?"

Britain's current terrorism threat level is listed as "severe," the second-highest level on the five-stage scale. A "severe" threat means a terrorist attack is "highly likely."

The threat level has remained at severe since the current system was introduced Aug. 1, except for three days after the disclosure Aug. 10 that police had broken up a plot to blow up jets headed to the USA from London's Heathrow Airport. The level was then raised to "critical," the highest on the scale.

Some of the suspects arrested in the alleged airliner plot were from Birmingham.

Last week, police arrested five people in terrorism investigations in the English cities of Manchester and Halifax. Rizwan Ditta, 29, and Mohammed Dilal, 26, of Halifax were later charged with possession of information of use to terrorists.

The head of Britain's domestic security service, MI5, said last year that the service was tracking 30 suspected terrorism plots involving roughly 1,600 people in about 200 domestic cells. Eliza Manningham-Buller, MI5's director general, said in a speech Nov. 9 that many of the plots could be traced to al-Qaeda.

She said Britain's security services had foiled five major plots since terrorists attacked the London transit system July 7, 2005, killing 52 people and injuring more than 770 others.

Police Hold Nine After Terrorism Sweep (FT)

By Jonathan Guthrie And Jimmy Burns

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Police in the West Midlands arrested nine people on terrorism charges and raided a number of properties on Wednesday.

The arrests were in connection with an investigation thought to be connected to an alleged plot to kidnap and execute a Muslim British soldier.

On Wednesday night a senior government official said he was taking seriously a plot he believed underlined the extent to which radicalised British-born Muslims were committed to a terrorist war against the west.

The official said the alleged plot suggested a direct challenge to the British army's policy of encouraging the recruitment of Muslims as a way of integrating them into society and countering the negative publicity regarding the army's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan. In the UK armed forces, 330 Muslims have declared their religion.

Earlier, the police and the Home Office, the department responsible for counter-terrorism, refused to identify the nature of the plot and warned the media against speculation that might be prejudicial to an investigation and any trial.

However, in what they described as a "very major investigation", police raided eight dwellings and arrested eight men, starting at 4am.

They also searched and secured four business premises, including a Muslim bookshop and an internet café. The properties were in Washwood Heath and Sparkhill, areas with big Muslim populations, and in the mainly white area of Edgbaston.

A ninth man was arrested later while driving on a motorway in the Birmingham area.

Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw said police were "at the foothills" of an important investigation that could last for "days and weeks".

Britain Foils Major Kidnapping Plot (AP)

By Rob Harris

AP, February 1, 2007

Police foiled a major kidnapping plot, the first of its kind in Britain, with the arrests Wednesday of nine terror suspects who reportedly planned to torture and behead a British Muslim soldier and broadcast the killing on the Internet.

The alleged plot, said by British media to mirror the brutal executions of foreign hostages in Iraq, was in its final stages and uncovered during a six-month surveillance operation by anti-terror officers in this city of more than 1 million in the heart of England. The arrests came in a pre-dawn raid on homes and businesses in several Birmingham neighborhoods, which were mostly Pakistani.

"The threat from terrorism remains very real," said Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw, who would not confirm reports from the British Broadcasting Corp. and other media outlets that the intended victim was an army soldier to be killed in an "Iraqi-style" execution and broadcast on the Internet.

Britain has been at the heart of several thwarted alleged terror plots, including a scheme by a British Muslim to blow up the New York Stock Exchange and other landmarks, and a plan by Muslim extremists to use liquid explosives to blow up as many as 10 flights between the United States and Britain.

But the Birmingham kidnapping plot raised fears that a new type of terrorism has reached Britain, one which uses individual victims to send a message through kidnappings and publicized beheadings. Although the motive in the new plot was not disclosed, the announcement coincides with other indications that young British Muslims are becoming increasingly angry over this country's involvement in the American-led wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and the U.S. detention camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The four British Muslims who attacked London's transit system in Europe's first suicide bombings had expressed rage over Britain's role in the wars. Their attack at rush hour on July 7, 2005 killed 52 people.

In the past year, the object of that anger has spilled over to the 330 Muslims who serve in the 180,000-strong British armed forces.

The potential victim of the latest plot was reportedly a British Muslim soldier who was under police protection, British media reported, though the Defense Ministry would not confirm this.

Britain's first Muslim soldier to be killed in Afghanistan last year was from Birmingham, where the death prompted militant Islamist Web sites to denounce Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, 24, as a traitor. One site — that of extremist British sect al-Ghurabaa — posted an image of the soldier surrounded by flames.

Non-Muslim servicemen are also being targeted.

Last year, a London street vendor was sentenced to six years in prison in a plot to kill a decorated British soldier. Abu Baker Mansha was accused of targeting Cpl. Mark Byles, whose address and other materials were found in Mansha's apartment.

Byles was awarded a military cross for bravery following an attack in which several Iraqi insurgents were killed — exploits covered by British newspapers. One of the articles with Byles' name was circled and found in Mansha's apartment.

Twelve houses and four business — including two Muslim book stores and an Internet cafe — were cordoned off in Wednesday's raids.

Mohammed Majid, 30, watched as police barged into a house.

"At 4 a.m. I heard a loud bang. I looked through the window and thought it was a fire. I saw anti-terrorism police with shields and guns. They broke windows and doors and raided the place. They took a (South) Asian man with a beard who was in his 30s away in handcuffs. He looked dazed."

Forensic teams removed items from the house and shot a video of the scene, he said.

Sky TV reported that British investigators contacted Pakistani intelligence agents four days ago about the plot. In Islamabad, Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said, "The British authorities have confirmed to us that there is no Pakistan connection." She gave no other details on the contact between authorities in the two countries.

Still, the raid opened fresh divides in Birmingham's predominantly Pakistani neighborhoods.

"People don't trust their own children any more," said Shabir Hussain, chairman of the Ludlow Road Mosque in Birmingham. "You feel like you should challenge your son or daughter: `Where are you going at night? What are you watching on TV? What are you doing on the Internet?'

Muslims in Birmingham are mindful of the dangers inherent in any raid: Police shot a man in a raid last year in London.

"The police and government seem to be against Muslims and are trying to turn us against one another," said Kadir Mohammad, 18, who lives in one of the raided neighborhoods.

Britain's MI5 has said it set up a network of eight new regional offices across the country in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, including a center in the West Midlands. The service had previously had regional branches in Northern Ireland, but uses the new offices to coordinate with police in counterterrorism work.

Counterterrorism experts said Islamic extremists have been looking for new ways to rattle the West with their use of the Web to broadcast propaganda and unsettling images such as the beheadings of Western hostages in Iraq.

One widely publicized case was that of 62-year-old Kenneth Bigley from Liverpool. He was abducted from a Baghdad suburb where he was working in September 2004 and beheaded three weeks later. His death was captured on video.

London's counterterrorism officers had never before dealt with a terrorist plot to abduct and murder, a police spokeswoman said on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

The Irish Republican Army and other Northern Ireland paramilitary groups routinely conducted kidnappings, mainly for the purpose of extortion — often targeting family members of those with access to banks, British military installations and police stations.

"This would be the first case (in Britain) of Islamic extremists using kidnapping as a tactic — but these are not the first terrorist kidnapping threats to Britain. The IRA provided those," said former U.S intelligence officer Bob Ayers, now a security analyst based in London.

A Foiled Plot In Britain May Signal Chilling Tactic (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

LONDON

British security officials were claiming Wednesday to have foiled a terrorist plot which would have imported for the first time to Britain the grisly Iraq-style tactic of kidnapping a victim, torturing and beheading him and filming the atrocity for broadcast on the Internet.

In what police characterized as "the foothills of a major investigation," at least nine arrests were made at a dozen addresses in and around Birmingham, England, including homes, an Islamic bookshop, and a cybercafe,

The suspects were the latest in a succession of hundreds arrested under terrorism legislation introduced seven years ago. Last August, 21 people were arrested in an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic flights.

But experts said this plot's new tactic, if confirmed, would amount to a significant departure in strategy. Thus far, the public has focused its concern on the possibility of suicide bombers seeking to emulate the perpetrators of the July 7, 2005, bombings that killed 52 people. The prospect of being snatched from the street, paraded before video cameras, and decapitated was considered a horror peculiar only to countries like Iraq.

"A plot to kidnap, torture, and execute an individual in the heart of England, and film the gruesome events on a videotape for posting on the Internet, represents a new chilling escalation in tactics by the global jihadi terror groups and carries grave implications for all western nations," says MJ Gohel, a terrorism expert with the London-based Asia-Pacific Foundation.

"In the past, we have witnessed the brutal beheadings of Western hostages in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq, but for it to happen in a major British city would send shock waves to millions of people throughout Europe and the world."

Debate about extent of 'fear factor'

Mr. Gohel recalled the episodes in Iraq, when American Nicolas Berg and Briton Ken Bigley were subjected to the grim fate, and added that repeating the tactic in the West would be "a massive cold-blooded propaganda tool for intimidating the public and governments. The brutal torture and beheading of an identified individual can psychologically resonate far louder than say a car bombing of unknown or anonymous victims," Gohel says.

Paul Rogers of Bradford University also underscored the potential for a negative psychological impact. "If such a plot were to be targeted against an individual, then it would be a very new development as far as Britain is concerned, but obviously worrying as far as the fear factor is concerned," he said in an interview with Britain's national Press Association news agency.

But Bob Ayres, a security analyst at Chatham House, a London-based think tank, contends that the fear-factor would be limited.

"The vast majority of the UK population doesn't believe they're high-profile enough to warrant being pulled off the street," he says. For most Britons, he adds, "getting blown up on the Underground on the way to work is much more of a concern."

But while kidnapping may not instill greater fear among the public, Mr. Ayres says, its strategic advantage for radicals is prolonged media exposure. With the release of periodic video statements, captors can keep the media's spotlight on them and their message for months, he says.

Tackling home-grown terrorism

At least some of those arrested Wednesday were believed to be young Britons of south Asian origins. The local member of Parliament, Shahid Malik, said he had been told they had been under surveillance for six months. Some of the arrests connected with the alleged planes plot were also made in Birmingham.

Pakistan, which crucially cooperated with Britain over the aviation threat last year, was again in contact with British security agencies in the run-up to the latest arrests. British media reports claimed that the target was a British Muslim soldier, though police did not confirm this.

The sudden emergence of homegrown terrorists and suspected plotters has forced domestic security services to improve their game, spread the recruiting net wider, and accelerate efforts to infiltrate the cells believed to be planning attacks.

Recently, signs have emerged that counterterrorist forces tracked radicals subsequently involved in plots without detaining them. One of the 7/7 perpetrators, Mohammad Sidique Khan, was known to security services as a radical intent on waging jihad. In the ongoing trial in London of the suspects involved in an alleged plot to bomb the mass transit network two weeks later on July 21, 2005 – a plot that failed – evidence has emerged that suspects were under police surveillance as early as 2004.

Balance of rights and security

Though police believe that the raids and multiple arrests of recent years have foiled major terror attacks, Britain's Muslim minority often complains that rights are trampled over during the police action – and that often charges are not even brought. Two suspects were roughly arrested, and one shot, during a police raid last summer; both were later released without charge. Some in the Muslim community argue that the police action is just driving more disaffected youths into the arms of radicals.

Last year, the head of MI5, Dame Eliza Manningham Buller, warned that the security services had identified 30 major terrorist plots in Britain and more than 1,600 individuals actively engaged in promoting attacks.

New tactic?

But after the 7/7 attack and the failed 7/21 attack, heightened security and a greater police presence, particularly on the London Underground, has arguably persuaded radicals to change their targets. Experts say that mass-transit systems, even airports and aircraft, are easier to defend against than the threat of abduction.

"Kidnapping is a highly cost-efficient strategy for terror groups to deploy because no expensive bomb-making materials or detonators are needed, no skill or training is necessary – all that is required is a terrorist willing to wield a knife on a defenseless hostage," Gohel says.

Terrorism experts said that it was important to establish whether the kidnapping plot, if confirmed, was a one-off action or a new tactic.

Patrick Mercer, Conservative homeland security spokesman, said: "If this proves to be accurate, this is a disturbing departure.

"We have got to learn the lessons of this," he added, "to see what we can do to thwart future attacks."

Britain Arrests 9 In Anti-Terror Raids (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Kevin Sullivan

BIRMINGHAM, England, Jan. 31 -- British police arrested nine people Wednesday in a large counterterrorism sweep reported to involve an alleged Iraq-style plot to kidnap, torture and kill a Muslim soldier serving in the British army and post video of his execution on the Internet.

Such a plot would represent a dramatic turn in tactics by Islamic extremists in Britain -- a single murder rather than a bomb plot designed to kill large numbers of people. It would also be the first known case of radicals in Britain targeting a fellow Muslim for serving in the British army.

Birmingham police did not release the names of the people arrested in pre-dawn raids on eight homes and four businesses in two predominantly Muslim neighborhoods. Neighbors reported that police broke down doors and hauled off suspects beginning about 4:30 a.m.

David Shaw, a top police official, said the arrests were the "culmination of many months of activities" and "a very, very major investigation" that is "by no means finished." At a news conference, he declined to elaborate on the alleged plot or comment on reports by the BBC and many other news organizations that police sources said the plot involved the planned abduction and execution of a particular Muslim soldier. Several reports said the soldier had served in Afghanistan and has been placed under protective custody in Britain.

The arrests and raids stunned this city of 1 million residents northwest of London where the Muslim population, estimated at 14 percent in the 2001 census, has grown in recent years.

"If it were another bombing plot, I wouldn't be as scared," said Vera Bates, 65, who has lived for 40 years in the Alum Rock neighborhood, a predominantly Muslim area. "But because now they are talking about kidnapping someone off the street, beheading him and putting him on a video -- now that is scary." Her home is near a brick rowhouse and a business, Khan's General Store, that were raided by police.

Many Muslims who gathered at police lines said they viewed the raids as unfairly targeting their community and probably based on false intelligence. "We feel like we are under siege," said Allah Ditta, a businessman in Alum Rock and a member of a mosque a block from Khan's General Store.

Ditta said that he had already felt a backlash from the police operation when several men drove past him in a van and swore at him simply because he was dressed as a Muslim. "We will be picking up the pieces of this raid for years to come," he said.

Police counterterrorism raids have become increasingly common since Islamic extremists killed 52 people on subway trains and a bus in London in July 2005. What police call a virtually identical attack two weeks later failed when the alleged attackers' bombs failed to detonate; six men are on trial in that case.

Eliza Manningham-Buller, head of Britain's MI5 domestic security agency, which was involved in Wednesday's raids, gave a rare public address in November and said British authorities were monitoring as many as 30 potential terrorism plots involving up to 1,600 individuals in 200 radical groups.

"If anyone is involved in terrorist activities, I condemn it," said Shaukat Ali, who lives on Jackson Road, where one of the arrested men lives.

He said he knew the man, describing him as a 28-year-old named Amjad and a father of two, and found it hard to believe he was involved in such a plot. He said the man worked behind the cash register at his father's business, Khan's General Store, from early morning until late at night seven days a week. "Many people knew this hardworking family and we are shocked," Ali said.

Ditta, the Alum Rock businessman and a member of the mosque a block from Khan's General Store, noted that none of the nine men had been charged. Under new anti-terrorism laws, police can hold suspects without charge for up to 28 days. Many times, he said, there have been high-profile raids and then days later the detainees are let go without charge.

He said he believes police could and should make arrests more quietly because these dramatic arrests, with dozens of officers breaking down doors and windows with hammers, are unfairly harming Muslim communities.

Tariq Khan, a Birmingham City Council member who represents the neighborhood, joined the street scene of police, TV cameras and large numbers of neighbors. He said he wanted people to know that "ninety-nine percent of these people are law-abiding citizens."

Others in Birmingham said they supported the police. "If they saved a life, it is certainly worth it," said Paul Hockney, a construction worker. "These raids have become the norm -- how sad is that? Our country is in big trouble."

Several miles from Alum Rock, police were standing guard Wednesday night outside an electronics shop and had shut down an Islamic bookstore. The Maktabah Al Ansaar bookshop has drawn scrutiny for years from British and U.S. counterterrorism investigators.

In 1999, the shop published the autobiography of Dhiren Barot, a Hindu convert to Islam who was arrested in 2004 and charged with plotting to bomb financial targets in New York, New Jersey and Washington on behalf of al-Qaeda. A British judge sentenced him in November to life in prison.

One of the store's former employees is Moazzem Begg, a British citizen who traveled to Afghanistan in 2001 and was arrested in January 2002 and imprisoned at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Begg was released in January 2005 without being charged with a crime.

Sullivan reported from London. Correspondent Craig Whitlock in Berlin and special correspondent Karla Adam in London contributed to this report.

Britain Arrests 9 In Terrorist Kidnapping Plot (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

LONDON, Jan. 31 — The British police conducted a series of raids on Wednesday, arresting nine suspects on terrorism charges in what appeared to be a shift in the tactics of terrorism in Britain. The suspects are accused of devising a plot that included plans to kidnap, torture and behead a British Muslim soldier and broadcast video images of his killing on the Internet.

The arrests, in the central city of Birmingham, were part of what the authorities called a major operation involving hundreds of officers after months of preparation. Eight suspects were arrested in eight different homes, and a ninth was seized on a highway near the city, the police said. Four businesses were also searched.

"We are right at the foothills of a very major investigation for us," Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw, the Birmingham police officer leading the inquiry, said at a news conference. He declined to describe any details of the case or identify the suspects by name.

However, the British news media have widely reported details of the supposed plot, which have not been officially denied. If true, the plan would be a marked departure from previous terrorist plots, like the July 7, 2005, London bombings, intended to cause mass fatalities using explosives.

Last August, for instance, British and American investigators said they averted a plot by terrorists to use liquid explosives to blow up trans-Atlantic airliners carrying hundreds of people. A plan of this kind would also support what counterterrorism experts have depicted as the central role of the Internet in modern insurgencies and conspiracies to broadcast propaganda and spread images. Web sites have been widely used to broadcast gruesome images of beheadings in Iraq and to spread militant Islamic views.

"If such a plot were to be targeted against an individual, then it would be a very new development as far as Britain is concerned," said Paul Rogers, an expert on terrorism at the University of Bradford. "The key point is whether this alleged plan was something being encouraged by the wider Al Qaeda movement or was a one-off, independent action."

The target for the attack was reportedly a soldier in his 20s who had served with British forces in Afghanistan and is now hiding in a police safe house in Britain.

Britain's terrorism laws allow the police to detain suspects for up to 28 days without bringing formal charges. "This remains a dynamic, fluid operation and this is by no means finished," said Assistant Chief Constable Shaw of the Birmingham police. The search of premises, he said, "will take days or possibly weeks."

The police began to move in on the suspects at 4 a.m. in Birmingham, Britain's second largest city, which has a large Muslim minority drawn initially from Pakistani immigrants in the 1960s. The police action spread through the run-down Sparkhill neighborhood and other areas, including raids on the Maktabah Islamic bookstore, the Blades Cyber Cafe and an innocuous-seeming row house. Several vehicles, including a white van, were towed away.

The announcement of another suspected terrorism plot has not surprised many Britons, who are used to regular warnings from the authorities. Six men are currently on trial in connection with four attempted bombings on July 21, 2005, two weeks after the London bombings that killed 52 people and the 4 suicide bombers.

Last November, MI5, the domestic intelligence agency, said it was keeping 1,600 suspects in 200 terrorist cells under surveillance. At the time, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director of MI5, spoke of around 30 conspiracies that might include "the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

The Pakistan Foreign Office acknowledged on Wednesday that British officials had recently inquired about whether some of the nine men arrested in Birmingham had traveled to Pakistan.

Some people in Birmingham said they were skeptical about the raids, particularly in light of a similar high-profile operation last year in Forest Gate, east London, when the police shot and wounded one of two Muslim brothers who were soon released for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism.

Such events have deepened Muslim anxieties.

"There is a fear about who is next," said Mohammed Naseem, the chairman of Birmingham's Central Mosque, in a telephone interview. "People will need to know the facts, but there is a longstanding perception that this climate of terrorism is being maintained to further the political aims of the government."

Indeed, Salma Yaqoob, a member of the Birmingham City Council representing the antiwar Respect Party, said: "There's a shock and disbelief that these arrests are being made in such a high-profile manner. People are very concerned about the social backlash."

Farooq Haroon, a Birmingham social worker, said that after the raids last year that ended with the suspects being freed without charge, "people are very cynical about these raids."

The Ministry of Defense said there were only about 330 Muslims out of the 180,000 troops in Britain's armed forces. Last July, one British Muslim soldier, Lance Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, was killed in Afghanistan.

Many of Britain's frontline combat units are deployed in Afghanistan and Iraq, and their presence, some Muslim leaders contend, has helped inflame militancy among young British Muslims.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9 / 11 Workers Criticize Bush Health Funds (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- The son of a ground zero rescue worker who died last week from lung disease met with President Bush on Wednesday to urge expanded health services for those who are still sick.

"On behalf of all World Trade Center victims, I expressed the urgency and the desperate need for financial support for health services," said Ceasar Borja Jr., 21.

He said he told the president that the funding should be expanded not just for "the heroes and heroines" who risked their lives to save victims under the twin towers, but also for men, women and children exposed to toxins because they lived or worked in the area.

Borja's father, Cesar Borja, was a police officer who worked 14-hour days in the smoldering pit after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack. He died at 52 while awaiting a lung transplant.

Bush met Borja, his mother, Eva, his 16-year-old brother, Evan, and 12-year-old sister, Nhia, at Federal Hall in downtown Manhattan, where the president delivered a speech about the economy on Wednesday.

About an hour before the speech, sick 9/11 workers and neighborhood residents gathered nearby at the edge of ground zero to criticize Bush's proposal to spend an additional $25 million to fund a health care program.

"Twenty-five million is absolutely not enough," said Marvin Bethea, 47, pointing out that some legislators, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, have proposed $1.9 billion in additional funds.

"First responders who need treatment will get the treatment they need," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday. "Many are already covered by insurance programs, many through their union; but if there are gaps in that, we're going to do it."

Next week, the Bush administration is expected to propose the additional funding for the Sept. 11-related health care program at New York's Mount Sinai Medical Center, where 19,000 rescue workers have been screened.

About seven out of every 10 responders suffered lung problems, according to a Mount Sinai study. One of study authors has said thousands will likely need long-term care.

White House officials said they would consider providing more money, depending on the findings of a separate government task force.

The programs had been expected to run out of money by the summer. A grant of $75 million made last year was expected to last until then.

International Trusted Traveler Program Sought (USAT)

By Barbara De Lollis

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Believing it would help stem the USA's diminishing appeal to travelers from abroad, the U.S. travel industry asked Congress on Wednesday to launch a special trusted traveler program for international visitors.

Since 9/11, international visits to the USA have fallen by 17%. The decline cost about $43 billion in visitor spending in 2005 alone.

The Discover America Partnership, an offshoot of the trade group Travel Industry Association of America, proposed the new program to the Senate trade and tourism subcommittee as part of a broader package of proposals to boost international visits.

"Our travel system is broken," said Geoffrey Freeman, executive director of the partnership. "What we have outlined today is a detailed road map for Congress to solve the crisis."

The group is also asking the government to spend $300 million to finance its proposals, which include stepped-up tourism marketing and faster customs processing.

Under the trusted traveler proposal, regular visitors from abroad could submit extensive personal and biometric information to the U.S. government.

If approved by the government, foreign travelers could count on predictable airport clearance procedures when they arrive in the USA. The tourism industry says heightened scrutiny of foreign visitors in the last five years has led to unpredictable and inconsistent treatment of foreigners at U.S. airports, and has played a major role in diminishing visits to the USA.

Whether or not Congress or foreign travelers would embrace such a program is unclear. But Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., who chairs the tourism subcommittee, says he expects the issue will attract bipartisan support. He plans to develop legislation to reverse the slide in foreign tourism.

The domestic version of the trusted traveler program, which expedites members' passage at airport security checkpoints, is only now getting started, more than five years after it was proposed following the 9/11 terror attacks. For an annual fee of about $100, travelers who have provided personal data and been cleared in advance by the government are allowed use of an expedited security line at certain airports. It's in effect now at airports in San Jose, Calif., Cincinnati, Indianapolis, New York (JFK) and Orlando.

The tourism industry proposal also calls for automatically enrolling approved travelers in the U.S. registered traveler program to make flying around the USA easier.

Yves Walravens, 53, a loan broker in Brussels who traveled to the USA twice last year, says the popularity of such a program would hinge on whether travelers can expect confidentiality.

"A lot of us complain about the heavy procedures (entering the USA) and find them completely paranoid," he says. "And that is certainly not good publicity for the USA."

Travel Lobby Moves To Ease U.S. Tourism (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Travel industry groups yesterday announced a series of proposals aimed at making it easier for international travelers to visit the United States.

The Discover America Partnership (DAP), a travel industry lobbying group, proposed adding more staff to U.S. Consulates to reduce the time it takes for visitors to acquire visas, setting a goal of processing all foreign travelers through customs in 30 minutes, and implementing a national tourism marketing program.

Other DAP proposals included evaluating U.S. Customs officers on their friendliness, greeting foreign travelers by saying "Welcome to America" and offering foreign visitors customer-service evaluations to fill out when they leave the United States -- proposals aimed at improving America's image abroad.

"We can make travel easier and more secure," Stevan Porter, DAP chairman and president of InterContinental Hotels Group, told reporters yesterday.

Overseas travel to the United States has declined 17 percent since the September 11, 2001, attacks, amid perceptions that it has become more difficult to get a visa to the United States than to other countries. Some visitors are waiting up to 100 days for a visa interview, DAP estimated.

The group said the proposed changes would cost $300 million and suggested three ways to pay for it: Charge a $5 fee to enter or exit the country; charge a $10 fee for travelers from countries that do not require visas; or issue government bonds.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat and chairman of a tourism subcommittee , said during a hearing yesterday that he would like to "find some sort of way" to introduce a bill based on the proposal.

Committee Co-chairmen Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, and Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, also said they supported drafting a bill to boost international tourism.

The State Department has been working on improving the visa process, including many of the issues the DAP addressed, a consular affairs official said yesterday.

The department has added 570 consular positions worldwide and implemented an electronic visa application form, which increases the number of applicants an office can review.

As of last month, 90 percent of the U.S. consulates recorded visa appointment waiting periods of 30 days or less.

An airline industry group expressed doubts about the DAP proposals. Air Transport Association of America President and Chief Executive Officer James C. May said his group was opposed to the idea of an exit fee, which could be tacked on to the price of an airline ticket.

"While I appreciate a warm welcome, it is really hard for me to support charging passengers a $5 fee to purchase a smile and a greeting," he said, adding that visitors to the U.S. paid $50 in airline ticket fees last year.

Boston Devices A Cartoon Publicity Ploy (AP)

By Ken Maguire

AP, February 1, 2007

Several illuminated electronic devices planted at bridges and other spots in Boston threw a scare into the city Wednesday in what turned out to be a publicity campaign for a late-night cable cartoon. Most of the devices depict a character giving the finger.

Peter Berdovsky, 27, of Arlington, and Sean Stevens, 28, of Charlestown, were each arrested Wednesday night on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said.

In a news release announcing Stevens' arrest, she said the men worked together to place the devices. At an earlier news conference she said Berdovsky had been hired to place the devices.

Highways, bridges and a section of the Charles River were shut down and bomb squads were sent in before authorities declared the devices were harmless.

Marketing Gimmick Goes Bad In Boston (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

A guerrilla marketing campaign for a cartoon show about a box of french fries and his milkshake pal set off a scare that nearly shut down Boston's commercial district yesterday, as bomb squads closed highways and two bridges in search of what turned out to be magnetic-light versions of the cartoon characters.

Turner Broadcasting, parent company of the Cartoon Network, said the small electronic circuit boards, which hang from girders and bridges, are part of a 10-city marketing campaign for the animated late-night television show "Aqua Teen Hunger Force." Such guerrilla ad campaigns seek to place products in unexpected corners and count on those who spot the characters to "get" the gag.

But much of Boston was not in on this joke. The packages were discovered near the New England Medical Center, two bridges and a tunnel. Attorney General Martha Coakley said Peter Berdovsky, 29, of Arlington, Mass., had been arrested on a felony charge of placing a hoax device and a charge of disorderly conduct.

"We regret that they were mistakenly thought to pose any danger," said an e-mail message released by Turner spokeswoman Shirley Powell. "They have been in place for two or three weeks in Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Austin, San Francisco and Philadelphia."

The light boxes portrayed "mooninites," essentially juvenile delinquents from another galaxy making an obscene gesture.

Boston and Massachusetts officials were not amused. A train passenger spied the first magnetic object, which looked like circuit boards with protruding wires, attached to a girder under Interstate 93 in the Charlestown neighborhood of Boston. A police bomb squad responded and blew up the device, leading to the shutdown of a railway station and the highway. For a while, the Coast Guard blocked off a section of the Charles River.

"I am deeply dismayed to learn that many of the devices are a part of a marketing campaign by Turner Broadcasting," Massachusetts Gov. Deval L. Patrick said in a statement, vowing to consult with Coakley.

Boston Mayor Thomas M. Menino told the Associated Press he was ready to sue.

"It is outrageous, in a post-9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme," Menino said. "I am prepared to take any and all legal action against Turner Broadcasting and its affiliates for any and all expenses incurred during the response to today's incidents."

Bloggers were the first to notice that the boxes were not bombs but representations of late-night cartoon characters that have been around for six years. The lead character, Frylock, is a box of french fries and plays the straight man. Master Shake is a self-centered milkshake. Meatwad is, well, a wad of meat.

"Anyone recognize that?" asks BStu, who has a MySpace site. "I did. It's a Mooninite from Aqua Teen Hunger Force . . . that's what all this fuss is over."

The scare in Boston called to mind Orson Welles's CBS radio broadcast in 1938 of "War of the Worlds," which panicked listeners and triggered many calls to the police and the military. Some bloggers saw yesterday's events in a similar light, an unfortunate confluence of "idiot sensational media" and the "hilarious police overreaction."

And a corporate liability lawyer, R. Bruce Duffield of Brian Cave LLP in Chicago, argued that corporate free speech is protected and that "we're all too skittish in this post-9/11 era."

But W. David Stephenson, a former public relations executive now working as a homeland security adviser, said the world has changed and police must take such incidents seriously.

"It's amazing to me that Turner Broadcasting would think this is acceptable," Stephenson said. "They put these light boxes on bridges and tunnels, places you would clearly associate with terror attacks.

You just can't trivialize this," he said. "It's one of those moments where you just can't figure out what was going on in the brain of the advertising person."

Film Publicity Stunt Sends Bomb Squads Scrambling (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, February 1, 2007

BOSTON — A Cartoon Network publicity stunt gone awry sent police and bomb squads scrambling across Boston Wednesday to investigate at least 10 suspicious devices that turned out to be blinking advertising gimmicks.

Peter Berdovsky, 29, of Arlington, was arrested on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said later Wednesday. He had been hired to place the devices, she said.

At least 14 of the devices were found, Coakley said.

Worried that the unidentified items could have been part of a terrorist plot, authorities shut down a major highway, halted subway service and closed off part of the Charles River.

VIDEO: PR stunt sends panic over Boston

But the devices turned out to be harmless circuit boards with magnetic lights — part of an outdoor advertising campaign for a late-night cable TV cartoon called Aqua Teen Hunger Force. The show features a talking milkshake, a box of fries and a meatball.

"It's a hoax — and it's not funny," Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick said.

Turner Broadcasting put out a statement apologizing for the confusion. The statement said the "packages" have been in place for two-to-three weeks in 10 cities: Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Ore., Austin, Philadelphia and San Francisco.

A movie based on the cartoon is scheduled to be released March 23. Characters from the film were pictured on the devices placed around Boston.

Boston police said they received four calls, all around 1 p.m., reporting devices seen at the Boston University Bridge and the Longfellow Bridge, both of which span the Charles River.

Others were spotted at a Boston street corner and at the Tufts-New England Medical Center.

The device near the Boston University Bridge was found attached to a structure beneath the span, police said. Another was found Wednesday evening just north of Fenway Park, police spokesman Eddy Chrispin said.

The Turner Broadcasting statement said the company was "in contact with local and federal law enforcement on the exact locations of the billboards" in question. "We regret that they were mistakenly thought to pose any danger," according to the statement.

Boston Mayor Thomas Menino urged residents to "go about your business" Wednesday.

But he had sharp words for those responsible, warning that anyone involved in a hoax could be punished — by up to five years in prison per item.

Most Boston-area residents weren't fazed. Wanda Higgins, 47, a nurse at Massachusetts General Hospital, watched TV news coverage of the threat while preparing to leave work at 4 p.m.

"I saw the bomb squad guys carrying a paper bag with their bare hands," Higgins said. "I knew it couldn't be too serious."

In Washington, D.C., Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said officials closely monitored the day's investigation.

"Whether it was intentional or not, the reality is these types of incidents put an enormous burden on law enforcement and counter-terrorism resources, and there's absolutely no room for that in a post-9/11 world," Knocke said.

TV Promotion Rattles Boston (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

BOSTON -- A bomb scare that brought much of this city to a jittery halt yesterday turned out to be a Cartoon Network promotion gone awry, angering Mayor Thomas Menino, who vowed to make Time Warner Inc.'s Turner Broadcasting Systems pay for the mass disruption.

Major arteries were closed. Commuters were booted off subways, river traffic was halted, and bomb squads combed the streets after nine suspicious blinking objects were found on a bridge, under an interstate, and in crowded public areas.

After hours of suspense and gridlocked traffic that began early in the morning, police declared the objects harmless. In late afternoon, Turner's Cartoon Network issued a statement saying the objects were part of a promotion for a TV show, which is a late-night cartoon with characters that are talking fast-food items.

Last night, Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley announced the arrest of Peter Berdvosky, 27 years old, an Arlington, Mass., artist, on felony charges. Mr. Berdvosky allegedly violated a relatively new state law, enacted after an anthrax scare, that prohibits placing a hoax device in a way that results in public panic. He also was charged with one count of disorderly conduct, Coakley said.

Turner hired a third-party marketing firm, Interference, to place the devices. The New York firm says on its Web site that it specializes in alternative and "guerilla" marketing. Representatives of the company couldn't be reached for comment.

Authorities said the devices were placed on public property without required permits.

The promotion went "haywire," said Turner spokeswoman Shirley Powell. The company said the "packages" are part of an outdoor marketing campaign in 10 cities for Adult Swim's animated television show "Aqua Teen Hunger Force." The devices "have been in place for two to three weeks in Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Austin, San Francisco, and Philadelphia," the company said. Phil Kent, chairman and chief executive of Turner, said in a statement last night that "we apologize to the citizens of Boston that part of a marketing campaign was mistaken for a public danger."

Mayor Menino said in a statement that it is "outrageous, in a post 9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme."

The boxes held light bulbs, Ms. Powell said. Each was about a foot square, with a top resembling a circuit board. At night, they would project images. One was placed on an overhang about 15 feet up at the busy Sullivan Square subway station in Charlestown. A morning commuter alerted authorities. The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority summoned an explosives unit of the transit police, and it shut down the Orange line from 8 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. Police were unable to immediately decide if the device posed danger, and they destroyed it, a spokesman said.

Emergency crews rushed to other scenes -- on bridges over the Charles River and at other locations. Part of Route 93 was closed, and nine agencies, from the Coast Guard to the FBI, were sprung into action.

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

SINCE Sept. 11, 2001, Americans have maintained an understandable preoccupation with securing sensitive sites against airborne attack. Hence the appeal of the petition an advocacy group filed with the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission that, among other things, asks the federal nuclear authority to require plant operators to build protective "beamhenges" -- basically tall (and expensive) steel barriers -- around their power stations. This week the NRC's commissioners rejected the request, saying that there are far more cost-effective measures to secure such targets that plant owners and federal authorities have already applied.

It's a controversial decision. After all, without physical barriers to thwart airborne attacks, couldn't a hijacked plane smashing into a nuclear plant produce a widespread catastrophe?

That's not likely, says commission member Jeffrey S. Merrifield. After a $20 million study on the possible effects of an attempted airborne attack on a nuclear power plant, the NRC concluded that the chances of neighboring communities being exposed to radiological materials are extremely low -- the actual number is classified -- because of the strength of the containment domes that seal nuclear fuel from the outside world and because the chances of an errant plane even having the opportunity to approach a nuclear power plant are small.

Such assurances do not convince long-time critics of the NRC such as Daniel Hirsch, who says that a dangerous meltdown is still possible if terrorists on the ground manage to disrupt reactor cooling systems before a plane crash. It's fair to worry about a worst-case scenario, even if the NRC insists that Mr. Hirsch wildly overestimates the chances of any meltdown occurring. And it is difficult to fully trust the NRC's calculations as long as the study it touts remains classified.

But instead of forcing operators to pay for steel beamhenges, the federal government and others concerned about plant safety should focus on measures likely to be more beneficial. These include ensuring that nuclear power stations are well defended from land attack and that storage units for spent nuclear fuel are robust. Federal authorities must also finally establish a long-term storage facility for the spent fuel that continues to accumulate on nuclear plant sites, which is probably a more dangerous target than nuclear reactors themselves.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Foes Of Troop Buildup Join Forces (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 1, 2007

Two senators, a Republican and a Democrat, leading separate efforts to put Congress on record against President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq joined forces Wednesday, agreeing on a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the plan and potentially embarrass the White House.

Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., had been sponsoring competing measures opposing Bush's strategy of sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to the war zone, with Warner's less harshly worded version attracting more Republican interest. The new resolution would vow to protect funding for troops while keeping Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the buildup.

Levin replaced Warner as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when the Democrats took control of the Senate in January. Their resolution could well gain more support from members of both parties than their separate versions had been attracting. It lacks Levin's language saying the troop increase is against the national interest, and it drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he wants to begin debate Monday on the new measure, bypassing committee review. Levin's original resolution would no longer be considered unless offered as an amendment.

"I believe we have a better chance now" of passing a resolution against the president's plan, said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill.

The resolution is likely to pose a threat to the White House because of its potential appeal to Republicans who have grown tired of the nearly four-year war and want a chance to express their concerns. The White House has been hoping to avoid an overwhelming congressional vote criticizing Bush's handling of the war.

"It's been a hard work in progress," Warner said of his resolution, which has been struggling to win support of 60 senators so as to prevent a filibuster.

The agreement comes as several leading Republicans who support the troop buildup said they will give the administration and the Iraqis about six months to show significant improvement. Many other Republicans say they are deeply skeptical additional troops in Iraq, rather than a political settlement, would help calm the sectarian violence.

The widely unpopular war has led to the deaths of more than 3,000 U.S. troops and is blamed for GOP losses in the Nov. 7 elections that handed control of Congress to the Democrats.

The House had planned on waiting for the Senate to vote as a way of testing the waters for Republican support of such a resolution. But according to a Democratic aide, the House may begin the process next week with a committee review. That would set the stage for a House floor debate the week of Feb. 12.

Warner had attracted at least seven other Republicans who were inclined to vote for his resolution. Scrambling to find additional support, Warner added language proposed by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., that would protect funding for troops.

As of late Wednesday, Gregg had not said whether he would support the revised resolution.

"Colleagues have come up to me and said, 'Can you assure me that this doesn't provide a cutoff of funds?'" Warner said.

Warner's resolution will now rival a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., that would identify benchmarks for the Iraqi government. McCain's measure is intended to give Republicans an outlet for expressing that the U.S. commitment in Iraq must not be open-ended, without openly criticizing the president.

McCain's measure also picked up steam Wednesday, with Sens. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., and GOP leaders saying they might support it.

"I don't think this war can be sustained for more than six months if in fact we don't see some progress," said Roberts. His comments came two days after Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said the new U.S. military push was the Iraqis' "last chance."

Bush on Wednesday objected to Iraq proposals from Republicans and Democrats alike and acknowledged that "there's a lot of pessimism" in Congress about his troop buildup.

In an interview with Fox News, Bush took issue with McConnell's statement that his plan needs to be successful over the next six to nine months.

"I think it's a mistake to put timetables on difficult missions because an enemy can adjust," Bush said. "On the other hand, I certainly understand the urgency in Mitch's voice. I also understand the skepticism on Capitol Hill. I mean, no doubt, there's a lot of pessimism there today."

In a statement after the president's interview, McConnell avoided mention of a specific time frame, but he stressed that the U.S. commitment in Iraq "is not open-ended."

"We will know in a relatively short period of time whether or not the Iraqis are committed, and initial results are positive," McConnell said. "Of course we would need to reconsider our strategy if this effort fails."

Bush also criticized a proposal by Sen. Barack Obama, a Democratic presidential candidate from Illinois, to have all U.S. combat forces out of Iraq by spring 2008. "I say that it's important to succeed and that failure in Iraq will cause chaos," Bush said. "My admonition to those who are speaking out is let us back the troops and let us hope for the success" of their mission.

Although deserted by some key Republicans, Bush said: "I don't feel abandoned. ... When times are good, there's millions of authors of the plan. When times are bad, there's one author, and that would be me."

Senate Closer To Rebuke For Troop Increase (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate opponents of President Bush's decision to deploy additional troops in Iraq were unifying Wednesday night behind a single resolution criticizing the plan, increasing the chances that Congress will vote to formally rebuke the White House.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) announced that he was amending his nonbinding resolution that says the Senate "disagrees" with the buildup, adding clauses opposing any cutoff of funds for troops in the field and calling for written commitments from the Iraqi government to achieve certain goals.

The revised resolution drew the immediate endorsement of Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine). Both had been pushing an alternative resolution that more forcefully opposed the president's plan.

And Senate Democratic leaders indicated they would back the Warner proposal as well. "I believe we have a better chance now," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said there was "near unanimity" among Democrats, adding that he wanted to make the Warner proposal the basis for debate Monday, when the Senate is expected to consider the issue.

Reid acknowledged that an alternative resolution sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), as well as Levin and Snowe, could not garner the GOP support to reach the 60 votes needed to overcome a promised Republican filibuster.

Warner's changes appear designed to win over more Republicans, seven of whom have already expressed support for some legislative critique of the president's intention to increase troop levels by 21,500 to contain sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

In an apparent nod to many GOP lawmakers who have fretted publicly about Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, Warner and his cosponsors strengthened language calling for the prime minister to agree to written benchmarks.

These include deploying additional Iraqi security forces to work with U.S. troops, "ensuring equitable distribution" of oil resources and an end to "political intervention" in the tactical decisions of Iraqi commanders. The resolution does not spell out any consequences if the Iraqis fail to comply.

The amended resolution also includes criticism of the complicated command structure in Baghdad that creates two chains of command for Iraqis and Americans, an issue raised by several former military and government officials in the last week.

And it clarifies language in the resolution that some Democrats complained could be read to imply that the Senate might endorse an increase of fewer than 21,500 troops.

In an interview with Fox News on Wednesday, Bush acknowledged the opposition on Capitol Hill to his plan for a troop increase. But he remained firm.

"I say that it's important to succeed and that failure in Iraq will cause chaos," Bush said. "My admonition to those who are speaking out is let us back the troops and let us hope for the success" of their mission.

Warner, Levin and other lawmakers opposed to the White House plan have been working for more than a week to bridge differences between the Warner proposal and the more toughly worded Biden measure that was passed by the Foreign Relations Committee last week.

Meanwhile, other GOP lawmakers have been trying to persuade colleagues to vote against any resolution.

"We sure as heck have a responsibility to be for some plan," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) who was among a group of Republicans criticizing the resolutions as unproductive earlier Wednesday. Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who also was in the group, later acknowledged that he had not read the new Warner proposal.

Other conservative lawmakers have accused Democrats of undermining troop morale in their drive to pass a resolution. And the president has repeatedly said he would not be deterred by congressional opposition.

Drawing on popular dissatisfaction with the Iraqi government, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) also has been developing a resolution that would set benchmarks for Maliki to prove his commitment to reaching a political settlement among Iraq's warring sects.

McCain, who said Wednesday that he plans to finish his resolution by today, had been an outspoken supporter of a troop increase long before the president embraced the idea in a speech Jan. 10.

McCain's proposal has drawn little enthusiasm from Democrats, who have criticized it as a political ploy that would have little effect on the Iraqi government. The measure also does not identify any consequences should Maliki fail to meet his goals.

"This is a very calculated effort by the White House and Republicans to muddy the waters," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman. "They want to do anything to peel away the votes for a resolution."

Warner — whose original cosponsors included Sens. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) — has tried to position his effort in the middle ground between the fierce partisans of both parties.

"We want to see our armed forces succeed in Iraq to help bring about greater stability to that country … so the current elected government can take a firmer and firmer hand on the reins of sovereignty," Warner said on the Senate floor, casting his resolution as a tool to improve the chances of victory in Iraq.

The original resolution unveiled last week included language deferring to the president's authority as commander in chief and acknowledging the costs of failure in Iraq, a line often used by Bush and his congressional allies. It also acknowledged the need for additional forces to combat the Sunni insurgency in Al Anbar province.

That helped draw in three more Republican backers — Sens. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sam Brownback of Kansas — as well as several moderate Democrats.

In the modifications announced Wednesday, Warner, a former Navy secretary and Marine who also chaired the Armed Services Committee, seemed to be trying to entice members of his own party who want to distance themselves from recent proposals to begin withdrawing troops.

(On Wednesday, Democratic Sen. Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, a leading antiwar critic, introduced legislation that would prohibit funding for most military combat operations in Iraq six months after enactment of his bill.)

The changes to the Warner resolution include the addition of this clause: "Congress should not take any action that will endanger the United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

Last week, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) proposed a similar amendment to Biden's resolution. And this week, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) circulated the same language that Warner incorporated into his proposal.

Gregg said Wednesday that he appreciated Warner's action but would not say whether he would support the resolution.

Senators Unite On Challenge To Bush's Troop Plan (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Democratic and Republican opponents of President Bush's troop-buildup plan joined forces last night behind the nonbinding resolution with the broadest bipartisan backing: a Republican measure from Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced the shift, hoping to unite a large majority of the Senate and thwart efforts by the White House and GOP leaders to derail any congressional resolution of disapproval of Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

Although the original Democratic language was popular within the party, it had little appeal among Republicans. Warner's proposal drew support from both sides, and it was retooled last night to maximize both Democratic and Republican votes.

The revised resolution would express the Senate's opposition to the troop increase but would vow to protect funding for the troops. The resolution does not include the Democratic language saying the Bush plan is against the national interest, but it also drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops.

"It's been a hard work in progress," Warner said of the revised resolution, which will require the support of at least 60 senators to prevent a filibuster.

After reviewing the Warner revisions, Reid decided the new text would take the place of the original resolution, by Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). He said the Senate will begin debating the resolution next week, provided Democrats and Republicans can agree on a way to overcome some procedural hurdles.

House Democratic leaders reached the same decision, ordering committees to draft a resolution next week patterned on Warner's language. But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went further, publicly hinting she will push binding legislation that would begin bringing U.S. troops home from Iraq. "I believe that you'll see initiatives on the floor to this effect: that we have this year in which we should be able to drastically reduce the number of troops," she said in an interview broadcast on National Public Radio yesterday.

In both the House and the Senate, Democratic leaders decided to get the largest possible vote, even if it means embracing weaker language than the original Democratic resolution.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino responded to the announcement by saying: "The president wants to win in Iraq -- he's proposed a comprehensive plan to do so, and he's asked Congress to give the plan a chance to work. . . . These resolutions send mixed signals to our troops and our enemy."

The Warner and Biden resolutions reach almost identical conclusions, in that they oppose the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops and call for existing troops to be reassigned to guard Iraq's borders, combat terrorism and train Iraqi security forces. Both measures call for regional diplomacy to draw Iraq's neighbors into a peace process.

But Warner revamped his original proposal, both to win over many reluctant Republicans who thought it was too tough and to reassure Democrats who complained he was not being tough enough on the administration.

He added language specifically opposing a cutoff of funding for U.S. troops in a targeted appeal to Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who had offered an identical separate measure.

The changes came after two meetings earlier in the day, involving Warner, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and authors of the Biden proposal. Levin was the first of the original authors to join Warner as a co-sponsor, offering a brief endorsement on the Senate floor after Warner unveiled the new version.

In the House, Pelosi suggested yesterday that the chamber may consider binding legislation. In comments aired yesterday by National Public Radio, Pelosi said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had told her during her visit to Baghdad last week that, with sufficient funds, his government could stabilize Iraq in four to six months and allow 50,000 U.S. troops to be deployed out of hotbeds of sectarian violence.

"That was his number," she stressed. "The Iraqis must build their own country," she added, "and we have paid a big enough price."

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said no specific decisions had been made related to binding troop withdrawals. Other House leaders said they will not rush toward a legislative confrontation. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense, are holding extensive hearings on the state of the U.S. military and the impact of further deployments, in the hope of building a political case for such a confrontation. But no proposals have emerged from those efforts.

"My position is and has been, we're holding hearings now. We need to hear from Mr. Skelton, Mr. Murtha and others as to . . . their conclusions and recommendations. Until then, the answer is no," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said when asked if the House was ready for such legislation.

But Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of Murtha's subcommittee, said the parameters of the legislation are already coming together. Legislative language, to be attached to a forthcoming "supplemental" war spending bill, would stipulate that only troops deemed fully trained and ready could be deployed to Iraq, and that National Guard and reserve troops could be deployed only for about a year. Such language would initially restrict Bush's ability to fully man his planned troop increase and over time would force troops to come home.

"We need to finish these hearings and put together our recommendations, so it is a little premature to say how we're going to do this," Moran said. "But when the supplemental comes out, people are going to find the speaker has spoken consistently. I think the American people are going to feel they got exactly what they wanted when they voted in a new Congress. You're going to see some dramatic initiatives."

Many Democrats had already expressed support for Warner's effort and had intended to vote for both resolutions, in the event of a showdown on the Senate floor. "It's less important whose resolution and more important what message we send," said Sen. Jack Reed (R.I.), a senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.), a conservative Democrat who had concerns about the Biden proposal, predicted that the Warner resolution will "receive very strong bipartisan support" in its modified form.

Although Bush would not be obliged to follow Congress's direction, should both chambers ultimately pass the Warner resolution, the White House has lobbied hard to prevent such a measure from passing. If the current drive succeeds, it will be the first formal, bipartisan affront to the administration's Iraq policy since the war began.

Not all Republicans are expected to sign on, however. Some believe that the buildup is a worthy cause that should be given a chance. "The critics stop short of offering any constructive alternatives," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). "All they have done is just criticize." Cornyn was assembling his own proposal that endorses Bush's strategy, while calling on the Iraqi government to assume responsibility for security throughout the country by November.

In Fighting Troop Increase, Senator Finds Few Old Allies (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Senator John W. Warner, a lawmaker often admired for his demeanor and experience, has long wielded influence on military policy given his own years at the Pentagon and his tenure as the Republican chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

So when the Virginian, a senator from central casting who turns 80 next month, offered a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq in more muted terms than one broadly backed by Democrats, people took notice. He appeared to have provided a center of gravity for lawmakers anxious about the war yet unwilling to challenge the White House too harshly.

But while Mr. Warner has won some support from within his party, he has also attracted unusually tough criticism from fellow Republicans who have suggested that he — a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary — is undercutting Mr. Bush, the new military command being installed in Iraq and the troops themselves.

It is a time of transition for Mr. Warner in the Senate. Not only are Republicans now in the minority, but he also lost the top Republican slot on the Armed Services Committee to John McCain of Arizona because of term limits and was not successful in efforts to win the top party seat on another panel. In addition, his fellow Republican, George Allen, lost his reelection bid in Virginia to a Democrat, Senator Jim Webb.

So while Mr. Warner fights to stay relevant in the Iraq debate, he has fewer tools at his disposal even as he considers whether to run for re-election next year.

What some Republicans have said in recent days about Mr. Warner has been particularly harsh.

"It is clearly not an act of leadership," said Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina, who joined two of his colleagues Wednesday in dismissing Mr. Warner's proposal as they sought to hold off a Senate repudiation of the president's plan.

"To offer nonbinding resolutions which encourage our enemies and undermine our allies and deflate the morale of our troops is, to me, the worst of all possible worlds," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

Mr. Warner's approach has also caused a policy rift with Senators McCain and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, two Republicans he has often worked closely with on military matters and joined last year in confronting Mr. Bush over the treatment of terrorism detainees.

"John and I have been friends for more than 30 years, and we just disagree on this," said Mr. McCain, who is arguing for time to let the Bush plan work. "But he has held these concerns for a long time."

Mr. Warner, a fierce protector of the Senate as an institution, says his goal is to get the broadest bipartisan vote possible so the Senate makes a clear expression of its sentiment on Iraq.

"I feel strongly that the institution of the Senate has a responsibility, and I feel very strongly that responsibility can be best fulfilled if we are able to construct a document — be it a resolution or whatever — that is truly, and I underline truly, bipartisan," Mr. Warner said Wednesday.

He shrugs off internal opposition, saying time has made him immune. "Nothing bothers me," he said. "It is the blessing of old age."

Mr. Bush on Wednesday implied once again that those who were seeking to support resolutions critical of his war plan were undercutting the Senate's unanimous vote last week to confirm the nomination of Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new top American commander in Iraq.

"He goes up and testified on Capitol Hill; he says we need more troops," Mr. Bush said of General Petraeus in an interview on Fox News Channel. "The fundamental question is, will they back him up? They voted for him; will they back him up? Will they say, 'sure, we'll give you the support you need'?"

But the president said he did not begrudge fellow Republicans who were considering the resolutions, which could reach a vote next week.

"Look, I understand. It's a difficult time on Capitol Hill," he said. "There are people who are doubtful about whether or not the strategy that I've come up with and decided upon as commander-in-chief will work."

Mr. Warner and his partners in drawing up the resolution fought back Wednesday night, offering a refined proposal that they said had been shaped by new information from recent classified military briefings. The new wording spells out clearly that its backers believe Congress should not cut off or reduce any financing for troops in the field.

Mr. Warner's revised resolution retained language saying that the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment" American forces but drops what some Democrats had described as a loophole that might have been interpreted as support for a buildup of fewer troops than the 21,500 sought by the president. As Mr. Warner described his changes on the floor, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, who has sponsored a competing measure, asked to be listed as a co-sponsor.

Mr. Warner and other authors, clearly hoping to restore some momentum for their plan, also spelled out benchmarks the Iraqi government must meet and directed the Pentagon to clarify who is in command when American and Iraqi forces are working together.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and one of the resolution's authors, also took strong issue with suggestions that Mr. Warner was hurting the military.

"It is outrageous for anyone to question his support for our troops," she said. "There is no member of this body who cares more about our troops and the nation's defense than Senator Warner."

As he tried to regain the offensive with the adjustments in his resolution, Mr. Warner said on Wednesday evening that the changes were intended less to "grab votes" than to put forward the best conclusion on such a major issue as the war.

"We feel that if for political reasons all members of the Senate go over to vote with their party and the others go over to vote with their party, we will have lost and failed to provide the leadership that I feel this chamber can provide to the American people," Mr. Warner said.

GOP Members Pressured To Back War (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 1, 2007

House and Senate Republicans with reservations about President Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 are complaining of harsh criticism from their GOP colleagues. This intra-party squabbling, in some cases, has seen

Republicans accusing fellow Republicans of undercutting the American effort in Iraq, a charge previously reserved for Democrats.

These lawmakers, several of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution from party leaders or the White House, are stunned by the hostility expressed by fellow Republicans. They are particularly concerned that anyone who raises questions or challenges the Bush plan will be branded a defeatist who wants to see America lose the war.

They are also worried, especially on the House side, that party leaders haven't prepared their members for the Iraq floor debate that will take place there after the Senate votes on Bush's plan next week.

"We need a full-fledged debate on Iraq within the (House Republican) Conference and we haven't had that so far," said Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill. "This is the issue of our times, and so far, we haven't talked about it."

One GOP lawmaker, who declined to be named, said it is "starting to get really ugly" among Republicans when they try to talk about Iraq and the wisdom of the new Bush policy. This lawmaker said when a Republican stands up who has doubts on Iraq, he's immediately "beaten down" by other Republicans who believe that any deviation from the White House position is intolerable.

Said another Republican with concerns about Bush's new strategy: "It's as if we are stabbing the party in the back, and we are only trying to do what we think is right."

Similar passions were on display Tuesday, when Senate Republicans held a closed-door, members-only meeting to talk about Iraq, a debate that took place in front of Vice President Cheney, who has been one of the most strident voices on Iraq within the administration.

"It was contentious. People feel firmly, and many of us very passionately, in support of our position," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who is opposed to Bush's surge plan. "What really upsets me is that those of us who (are) opposed to the surge are somehow not supportive of our troops and General Petraeus." Gen. David Petraeus has been named to command U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Senate is preparing to debate a handful of non-binding resolutions on the Bush surge plan, and senior Republicans are still trying to develop a party strategy for the floor fight. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has approved a resolution drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., that criticizes Bush's policy.

But a number of Republican senators -- including John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Judd Gregg of New Hampshire -- are drafting their own proposals that, while criticizing the surge, would offer support for the president and the U.S. military campaign in Iraq.

"It is the most serious issue in my career. I don't view it as having gotten personal," said Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla. "Like Senator Warner; we have different views, but I am more cajoling him, trying to come to something that brings us together."

Senate Republicans will meet with Bush on Friday at the White House, and the president is expected to reiterate his message that the surge plan is the only way to end sectarian fighting in Baghdad and surrounding regions, as well as providing Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with time to create a stable political environment.

The Bush plan has infuriated opponents of the Iraq war, and some Democratic senators such as Barack Obama of Illinois, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Chris Dodd of Connecticut have introduced their own proposals to block the additional troops from being sent to Iraq or begin an phased "redeployment" of U.S. forces within a certain period.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, R-Ohio, has been able to garner only "about 50" Republicans to sign onto his proposed resolution establishing benchmarks to measure the progress of Bush's new strategy for Iraq.

The Boehner proposal is designed to provide political cover to GOP moderates, but senior Republicans admit that rank-and-file lawmakers have not shown much interest in it so far.

That is likely to change soon, though, as Boehner is planning to launch a "full-court press" in the words of one senior GOP lawmaker, to get more Republicans to sign onto the resolution.

Privately, Boehner believes that unless he provides his members with an alternative resolution, Republicans who are skittish about Iraq will sign on to whatever proposal is offered by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and the Democratic leadership, according to a top Republican.

If that were to happen, following the Senate's potential approval of an anti-surge resolution next week, it would be "a huge political blow to the president," said the Republican lawmaker, who would discuss leadership strategy only on the condition of anonymity.

"We have to get these guys to see the light here," the lawmaker said.

McCain Backs Away From Iraq Statement (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain backed away Wednesday from a statement issued on his behalf criticizing the Bush administration for not putting more pressure on the Iraqi government to secure its country.

A statement attributed to McCain, R-Ariz., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and quoted Tuesday by The Associated Press said, "America supplying more troops while Iraqi leaders simply supply more promises is not a recipe for success in Iraq."

The statement was issued by the office of Levin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

McCain spokeswoman Eileen McMenamin and Levin spokeswoman Tara Andringa said Wednesday that the statement had been erroneously signed off on by a staffer who works for McCain on the Armed Services Committee.

It is unusual for a senator to pull back a statement issued on his behalf. McMenamin said McCain had not seen the statement and did not endorse it.

McCain, the Armed Services Committee's top Republican, supports Bush's plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad and the volatile western Anbar province. But he also has been a critic of the Bush administration's handling of the war and is drafting a resolution that would identify benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

Senate Resolution Called 'Disgrace' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Senate Republicans yesterday said those in Congress who have turned against the war in Iraq are forsaking the troops on the ground and are ensuring defeat with a resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send in reinforcements.

"This resolution is a resolution of defeat and disgrace," said Sen. Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican who, as a member of the House, voted in 2002 for the war.

"There's no other way it could come out," Mr. DeMint said of the two resolutions that have been authored. "That is the choice that they're making. That is the decision they're making because we know if we withdraw and leave this to the Iraqis when they're not ready, that we will lose all."

The "nonbinding" resolutions rebuke Mr. Bush and his plan for sending an additional 21,000 troops to Iraq. But neither has any force of law that would require troops to come home or cut off funding.

One resolution was co-authored by Senate Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, and Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican. A second was authored by Sens. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican; Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat; and Susan Collins, Maine Republican. All five senators voted to go to war in 2002.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, was not serving in the Senate for the vote authorizing the war but has been an ardent defender of it. He said Congress is sending mixed messages to the troops, to voters and to the world with a "no confidence" vote that carries no force.

"We can't claim to support the troops and not support their mission," he said in a floor speech yesterday. "If we don't support the mission, we shouldn't be passing nonbinding resolutions. We should be doing everything in our power to stop it."

Instead, Mr. Cornyn said, "we should send them the message that, yes, we believe you can succeed and it's important to our national security that you do." He has been drawing up a resolution to do that.

"That's just nonsense," said Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, who voted for the war in 2002. "What undermines the troops is keeping them fighting in a civil war, to keep them fighting for a mistake."

Republicans said the troops in Iraq want the full support of Congress rather than give up on a mission in which they have lost so many comrades. They pointed to an NBC News clip aired last week that has stormed the Internet.

"One thing I don't like is when people back home say they support the troops but not the war," one soldier interviewed said. "If they're going to support us, support us all the way."

Spc. Tyler Johnson said, "You're not supporting what they do. They died for you. It don't make sense to me."

The clip became one of the most-watched clips on YouTube yesterday with more than 38,000 views. William M. Arkin, a Washingtonpost.com columnist, took offense.

"These soldiers should be grateful that the American public ... do still offer their support to them, and their respect," wrote Mr. Arkin. "Through every Abu Ghraib and Haditha, through every rape and murder, the American public has indulged those in uniform, accepting that the incidents were the product of bad apples or even of some administration or command order."

The NBC report "is just an ugly reminder of the price we pay for a mercenary -- oops sorry, volunteer -- force that thinks it is doing the dirty work," he added.

Late last night, leaders of both parties were negotiating the wording and timing of votes for the resolutions. Mr. Warner made changes to his resolution in an effort to win more Democratic backing, picking up support from Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

The new resolution vows to protect funding for existing troops while being silent on funding for the troop surge. It keeps Mr. Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the troop buildup but not calling it contrary to the national interest.

Also yesterday, former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine K. Albright urged Mr. Bush in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to develop a regional strategy that goes beyond the Iraq troop surge, including talks with Iran and Syria, and more autonomy for Iraq's rival ethnic and religious factions.

Mr. Kissinger defended the addition of 21,000 U.S. troops, though, calling it "the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required."

Dems Split On Iraq Bill Strategies (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 1, 2007

Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, is vowing to use the appropriations process to force lawmakers to vote on separate parts of a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. soldiers from Iraq.

The resolution would pay Iraqis reparations of up to $10,000 for damages caused by the war if they made claims; ban American firms from pumping oil in Iraq; cut off funds to build long-term bases in Iraq; pay for the destruction of landmines; and create a House-Senate select committee to study the origins of the war in Iraq.

Lee and Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), the other co-chair of the House Democratic Progressive Caucus, introduced H.R. 508, and they have signed up 28 co-sponsors. Woolsey says she plans to meet next week with House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) to ensure the resolution is considered in committee.

“I want to see this move very quickly,” Lee said.

The start of the appropriations process would be a "turning point" in the debate on Iraq, said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a vocal opponent of the war who is running for president.

Meanwhile, debate in the House is shaping up to be just as contentious as it was in the Senate, where lawmakers are considering six resolutions with varying degrees of opposition to President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more soldiers to Iraq.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has let it be known that she is leaning toward a resolution similar to Sen. John Warner's (R-Va.) bill, said a member of the Democratic leadership. Warner's resolution states that the Senate disagrees with Bush's plan to add the soldiers and to come up with "benchmarks" to measure progress so that American forces can leave "expeditiously."

"I think she would like to support a bipartisan resolution that has passed the Senate and is critical of the escalation," said a senior Democratic leadership aide.

Finally, the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative, mostly Southern Democrats, introduced a resolution last week that would create an independent committee modeled on the Truman Committee of World War II to study waste and fraud in government contracting and require the Bush administration to submit quarterly reports on spending in Iraq. The resolution also would ban the administration from using supplemental spending bills to pay for the war.

But the Blue Dogs' bill does not call for a redeployment or withdrawal of forces. Instead, the non-binding legislation asks that the Bush administration "condition further American financial, military and political resources upon steady improvement in Iraqi assumption of principal responsibility for internally policing Iraq."

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) has proposed that Democrats put together a resolution based on President Bush's words in a speech before the State of the Union Address, and thus force Republican lawmakers either to endorse the "surge" or openly repudiate the president's policy.

If Woolsey's resolution is not considered in committee, it is unlikely that members would have a chance to vote on it on the House floor. The more liberal House Democrats believe that if they don't act quickly and decisively to express their opposition to the Iraq war, they will alienate voters on the biggest issue that propelled them into office.

"Whether we recognize it or not, this Democratic Congress is the House that Iraq built. The Democratic Party will rise or fall on whether we keep faith with the American people," said Kucinich.

Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (N.H.), like many freshman Democrats, campaigned against the war in Iraq and called for a redeployment of troops. She said she would sign on to all the Democratic resolutions and support the strongest one offered.

Asked why the House is waiting for the Senate to finish considering as many as six non-binding resolutions, Woolsey rolled her eyes.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), leader of the Out of Iraq Caucus, said her goal was "to keep [Iraq] on the radar screen and keep a discussion going."

But she also was dismayed by the need to voice strong opposition even after the Democrats had taken control of Congress.

Kissinger, Albright Weigh In On Iraq (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 1, 2007

Former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright urged President Bush on Wednesday to go beyond a planned buildup of U.S. forces in Iraq to develop a comprehensive strategy for the area.

They called for wide-ranging talks with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased autonomy for clashing Iraqi groups. The administration has brushed aside the proposal to engage Syria and Iran.

Kissinger, who served under Presidents Nixon and Ford, said the planned buildup of 21,500 U.S. troops appears to be "the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required by the evolving situation."

"I think the focus has been on the surge," he testified. "My focus is the other way around: to explain the surge in terms of the strategy to which we should go."

The two former officials testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Kissinger suggested a strategy that would permit large regional autonomy for the various Iraqi groups and a stronger Iraqi army.

DOJ_NMG_0125287

And, he said, "All of this has to be in the context of a willingness to talk to Iran" because of its power, even though he did not think Iran "would help us in Iraq as such."

"What we cannot accept is an Iran that seeks to dominate the region," Kissinger said.

Albright, who was secretary of state under President Clinton, said she might have backed Bush's buildup in Iraq if it "had been tied to a clear and achievable mission, and if we were guaranteed our troops would have the best training and equipment."

"I think we need a surge in diplomacy," she said. But she also told the committee, "We are viewed in the Middle East as a colonial power and our motives are suspect."

Like Kissinger, she supported participation by Iran and Syria along with other nations in talks designed to keep Iraq from slipping into chaos. "One gains by communicating with countries with which one disagrees," Albright said.

She said the United States should avoid Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, but "there are ways for us to speak to other people" in Iran.

Kissinger said the U.S. should always be ready to negotiate with governments with which it disagrees.

Their views resonated with the committee, several of whose members have been calling for an international or regional conference on Iraq. Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said the heart of the administration's present strategy — building a strong central government — cannot succeed.

"There is not enough trust within the government, no trust of the government by the people, and no capacity of the present government to deliver services and security," Biden said.

The Iraq Study Group, a private panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., recommended in December that the administration engage in talks with Iran and Syria.

Wherever A Senator's Question Leads, Kissinger Gamely Follows (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

So now it can be told: President Bush has a secret plan to end the war in Iraq.

Henry Kissinger, who as Richard Nixon's secretary of state learned something about secret plans, went before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday to argue that Bush, too, has such a proposal.

"I am convinced, but I cannot base it on any necessary evidence right now," Kissinger told the senators, "that the president will want to move toward a bipartisan consensus" to stabilize Iraq through diplomacy.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) was suspicious of such assurances. "Is there any place that you're familiar with where the administration has articulated this strategy?" he asked.

"I don't know any place where the administration has articulated this particular strategy," the octogenarian diplomat admitted. But he added: "From my acquaintances with some of the people, I think it is possible that they will come to this strategy."

Obama asked Kissinger if "you are suggesting that they have some secret strategy that we have not been made privy to."

"I would be disappointed and surprised," he reiterated, "if they did not accept some of the elements of what has been discussed here."

For Kissinger, the floating of a phantom plan for Iraq provided a deft way out of a tricky situation. Like James Baker, who went before the committee Tuesday, Kissinger was inclined to defend Bush's Iraq policy. But Bush had left the two men, both former Republican secretaries of state, with little ammunition.

The administration rejected the core recommendation from Kissinger and from Baker's Iraq Study Group: a massive diplomatic offensive involving Syria and Iran. And yet, neither man was prepared to turn against the White House.

Baker, testifying on Tuesday, acted as if Bush had, in fact, supported his ideas. He mentioned the "common elements" between the Bush and Baker plans and the "very important points of similarity." Rubbing his fingers together and making motions with his mouth as if sucking on a hard candy, Baker pleaded: "Look, the president's plan ought to be given a chance. Give it a chance."

Kissinger, the master of nuanced phrases such as "not incompatible," provided few such broad pronouncements yesterday. Indeed, he pronounced very little in his low, German-accented rumble.

"I want to make sure I heard you right, because it's hard to hear you, so tell me if I heard you right," Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) directed him.

Kissinger responded with a guttural sound that the transcript labeled "(inaudible)."

It must have been a terrifying hearing for stenographers, who recorded Kissinger's utterances with phrases such as "we should avoid its (inaudible) deployment" and "we should work in the direction that will (inaudible) for maximum stability."

But this hardly mattered. The senators heard in Kissinger's testimony whatever they wanted to hear. On the one hand, Kissinger spoke of "an upheaval that goes across the whole region" and an "explosion of violence." On the other hand, he stated that "I do not believe we can withdraw from Iraq" and he provided a lukewarm endorsement for Bush's proposed increase in troops.

That left each senator in the room with the impression that Kissinger was endorsing the lawmaker's own personal plan. And the venerable diplomat, now stooped and wearing a hearing aid but as shrewd as ever, did not disabuse the senators of these impressions.

Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the chairman, pitched his plan for an Iraq split into autonomous regions. "I'm sympathetic to an outcome that permits large regional autonomy," Kissinger concurred.

Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.), the ranking Republican, asserted that "we cannot be in a situation in which we say 'We're out of there,' " Lugar pointed out.

"I believe very strongly that we cannot withdraw from the region," Kissinger agreed.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) tried to pull the witness in his direction. "I certainly agree with you that we cannot disengage from the region -- but what about redeployment from Iraq?" he asked.

"Of course significant American forces can be withdrawn," Kissinger obliged.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) tugged Kissinger the other way. "Is it your belief that a precipitous withdrawal . . . would have a greater negative long-term impact?"

"That is my conviction," Kissinger said.

"Would you agree," Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) asked, that "every alternative carries with it some rather grave risks?"

"Absolutely," Kissinger complied.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) said he hoped Bush's troop buildup would allow for reconciliation and diplomacy. "Am I wrong?"

"The objectives you've stated are compatible with what the president is attempting to do," Kissinger assured him.

The secretary's agreeability had a calming effect. "I think what I'm seeing here is someone testifying and almost everyone on this committee agreeing," observed Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "It's an interesting thing to watch."

Maybe that's Bush's secret plan to end the war in Iraq.

The President Has Jumped The Shark (LAT)

By Andy Borowitz

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH'S decision to send additional troops to Iraq has puzzled many pundits. Is the president stubborn, isolated, out of touch with reality? While all three may be true, there is another explanation. George W. Bush has been on television for the last six years, and like many TV shows entering a seventh season, Bush has jumped the shark.

Wikipedia defines "jumping the shark" as "the tipping point at which a TV series is deemed to have passed its peak, or has introduced plot twists that are illogical in terms of everything that has preceded them." Three telltale signs:

Same character, different actor: For the first six seasons of the Bush administration, the character of the secretary of Defense was played by Donald Rumsfeld. Then, without warning (unless you count his preelection comment that Rumsfeld was doing a "fantastic" job), Bush replaced him with former CIA chief Robert Gates. Like the producers of "Bewitched" (two Darrins) or "Roseanne" (two Beckys), Bush may have thought that if he made the casting switch with no explanation, the viewers wouldn't notice. Unfortunately for the president, the Rumsfeld-Gates switcheroo was the most jarring since "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" (two Aunt Vivs).

New kid in town: Long-of-tooth TV series often resort to adding younger characters in the hope of breathing much-needed life into a moribund enterprise. Although this ploy almost never works, and the new characters usually wind up being reviled (Cousin Oliver on "The Brady Bunch," Stephanie on "All in the Family"), the decider in chief has ignored the lessons of television history and proposed adding not one but 21,500 new characters. Will the "surge" succeed where those other fresh faces didn't? I have just two words for you: Scrappy Doo.

Special guest star: A true sign of desperation is when a wheezing TV show with plunging ratings (in Bush's case, 30%) gives up on its regular cast altogether and tries to revive viewer interest by importing a guest star — often a celebrity from the world of sports who has no plausible relationship to the series regulars. (Reggie Jackson, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Muhammad Ali all turned up on "Diff'rent Strokes.") Those who harbored any lingering doubts about Bush's shark-jumping status surely became converts during his State of the Union address, when the president looked up into the gallery of the House and introduced, on national television, Dikembe Mutombo.

Now that it is clear that Bush has jumped the shark, one question remains: Have we seen the worst of the president's bizarre stunts and desperate Hail Marys, or are there more to come? On that front, the news is not good: This week marks the beginning of February sweeps.

U.S.-Iran Tensions Could Trigger War (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, February 1, 2007

Citing Iranian involvement with Iraqi militias and Tehran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration has shifted to offense in its confrontation with Iran — building up the U.S. military in the Persian Gulf and promising more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq and Lebanon.

The behind-the-scenes struggle between the two nations could explode into open warfare over a single misstep, analysts and U.S. military officials warn.

Iraq has become a proxy battleground between Washington and Tehran, which is challenging — at least rhetorically — America's dominance of the Gulf. That has worried even Iraq's U.S.-backed Shiite prime minister, who — in a reflection of Iraq's complexity — also has close ties to Iran.

Iran and the United States are already sparring on the ground.

On Jan. 20, militants kidnapped and killed four American soldiers in a raid in Karbala, and a fifth was killed in the firefight. A U.S. defense official said one possibility under study is that Iranian agents either executed or masterminded the attack, a suspicion based on the sophisticated and unusual methods used in the attack, including weapons and uniforms that may have been American.

He spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

There has been speculation that the Karbala assault may have been in retaliation for the arrest of five Iranians by U.S. troops in northern Iraq.

Those five Iranians, who were arrested in the northern city of Irbil, included two members of an Iranian Revolutionary Guard force that provides weapons, training and other support to Shiite militants in the Middle East, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said last week. Iraqi and Iranian officials maintain the five were diplomats.

Since the Karbala raid, U.S. saber-rattling has intensified. President Bush said this week that U.S. forces in Iraq would take action against Iranian operatives in the country, while insisting he had no intention of attacking Iran.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," Bush told National Public Radio.

Although little evidence has been made public, U.S. officials have long insisted that Iran was supplying weapons and training to Shiite militias in Iraq, including some that have killed American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0125290

The No. 2 U.S. general in Iraq told USA Today in an interview published Tuesday that Iran was supplying Iraqi Shiite militias with a variety of powerful weapons, including Katyusha rockets and armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades.

"We have weapons that we know through serial numbers ... trace back to Iran," Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said.

The Air Force is considering more forceful patrols on the Iraqi side of the border with Iran to counter the smuggling of weapons and bomb supplies, the Los Angeles Times reported, citing senior Pentagon officials.

The U.S. is also building up its military presence in the Gulf in what it says is a show of strength directed at Iran. A second aircraft carrier is heading for the region, and Patriot missile batteries are being deployed.

Since Bush announced his new Iraq strategy in early January, Iranian officials have raised the alarm repeatedly that the U.S. intends to attack. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran is "ready for anything" in its confrontation with the United States.

A newspaper close to Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei last week threatened retaliation for any U.S. military action — including stopping oil traffic through the Gulf's strategic Hormuz Straits and attacks on U.S. interests. The top editor of the Kayhan daily warned that Iran will turn the Middle East into "hell" for the United States and Israel if America attacks.

Iran expert Ray Takeyh said the risks are all the greater because Tehran has an "unhealthy" disregard for American power, which "enhances the prospect of a miscalculation."

Prof. Gary Sick, a leading authority on Iran, believes the U.S. is seeking to divert world attention from the crisis in Iraq and organize a coalition of Israel and conservative Sunni Arab states to confront Iran.

"I see this as a very dangerous long-term policy because it promotes the idea that Sunnis and Shiites should be distrustful of each other, and I think that could come back and bite us later on," he said.

Iran and the U.S. also are in dispute over Tehran's nuclear program. The United States accuses Iran of secretly developing atomic weapons — an allegation Tehran denies. Iran's defiant refusal to suspend uranium enrichment prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose limited economic sanctions.

The U.S. has also beefed up support for Lebanon's government in its power struggle with Hezbollah, the Shiite militia that Washington accuses of acting in Iran's interests.

But Lee Feinstein of the Council on Foreign Relations said the U.S. was finding it hard "to calibrate its message" to distinguish "between a stern message and a warning of attack."

The war of words has raised fears among both Democrats and Republicans in Congress that the United States and Iran are drifting toward armed conflict at a time when America is struggling against determined foes in Iraq and Afghanistan.

It has also unnerved the Iraqi government, many of whose members have close ties to Iran.

"We have told the Iranians and the Americans, `We know that you have a problem with each other but we're asking you, please, solve your problems outside of Iraq,'" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, told CNN on Wednesday. "We do not want the American forces to take Iraq as a base to attack Iran ... we will not accept Iran using Iraq to attack American forces. But does this exist? It exists and I assure you it exists."

As the rhetoric grows more strident, a U.S. military official in the Gulf likened the U.S.-Iran standoff to the buildup in hostility in Europe before World War I, when the assassination of the heir to the Austrian throne triggered a tragic war that engulfed a continent.

"A mistake could be made and you could end up in something that neither side ever really wanted, and suddenly it's August 1914 all over again," the U.S. officer said on condition of anonymity, because of the sensitivity of the issue. "I really believe neither side wants a fight."

Iranian coast guard vessels recently veered into territorial waters on the Arab side of the Gulf, an event that could have been viewed as either a mistake or a provocation, the officer said. Both sides are on tenterhooks. "A boat crosses a line ... but what does it mean? You've got to be very careful about overreacting," the officer said.

Even if Iran pulled back from Iraq's conflict, it might not end the country's violence, said Kenneth M. Pollack, research director at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy.

"The truth is that Iraq is a mess. It is in a state of low-level civil war. And all of these groups are largely self-motivated," he said on the Council on Foreign Relations Web site. "But its much easier to blame it on the Iranians."

DOJ_NMG_0125291

In Tehran, political analyst Hermidas Bavand said U.S. force increases were leading many Iranians to believe Washington is looking to pick a fight.

"It's an extremely dangerous situation," Bavand said. "I don't think Tehran wants war under any circumstances. But there might be an accidental event that could escalate into a large confrontation."

U.S. Delays Report On Iranian Role In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has postponed plans to offer public details of its charges of Iranian meddling inside Iraq amid internal divisions over the strength of the evidence, U.S. officials said.

U.S. officials promised last week to provide evidence of Iranian activities that led President Bush to announce Jan. 10 that U.S. forces would begin taking the offensive against Iranian agents who threatened Americans.

But some officials in Washington are concerned that some of the material may be inconclusive and that other data cannot be released without jeopardizing intelligence sources and methods. They want to avoid repeating the embarrassment that followed the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when it became clear that information the administration cited to justify the war was incorrect, said the officials, who described the internal discussions on condition of anonymity.

"We don't want a repeat of the situation we had when [then-Secretary of State] Colin L. Powell went before the United Nations," said one U.S. official, referring to Powell's 2003 presentation on then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's unconventional weapons program that relied on evidence later found to be false. "People are going to be skeptical."

The current debate pits some U.S. diplomatic and military officials in Iraq, who are seeking to compile an aggressive case on Iran, against other officials in Washington, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who are urging greater caution, according to the officials, who spoke in the last several days.

The Bush administration has charged repeatedly that Iranian agents and military personnel have been bringing in explosives and other weaponry for use in Iraq by Shiite Muslim militants. U.S. intelligence and military officials have said they have substantial evidence of Iranian involvement, but have not made it public.

The mounting U.S. charges against Iran have been accompanied by the movement of American warships into the Persian Gulf, giving rise to fears of a possible U.S. attack.

U.S. forces arrested a group of Iranians in Baghdad in December and are holding five Iranian officials who were detained Jan. 11 in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. At the same time, the administration has shunned a proposal by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to open direct talks with Iran and Syria as part of a plan to quell the violence in Iraq.

The U.S. claims led Tehran's ambassador to Iraq, Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, to challenge American officials last month to show "any shred of evidence" of Iranian meddling.

The U.S. ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, promised last week to do so, and American officials initially planned to release their dossier Tuesday.

But the release was delayed, and Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, declined Wednesday to predict when the report would be issued.

"We'll do this on our own timeline," he told reporters. "And we're going to do it in such a way that it is properly presented, it is clear, and that it is done in such a way that … we don't in any way jeopardize [U.S. officials'] ability to further collect information about these networks."

This week, McCormack denied that U.S. intelligence failures and erroneous pre-Iraq war claims had made the job of preparing the new dossier more difficult.

The administration's quandary is one more indication of the difficulties the United States faces in Iraq as it tries to limit the influence of the Iranians, whom it increasingly views as its chief regional rival. There are thousands of Iranians in Iraq. Some of them have strong ties to the U.S.-backed government.

One former senior U.S. defense official said that preparing such a case would involve trying to cull sensitive data for presentation to a skeptical American public.

"It's a losing proposition for the administration," said the former official, who declined to be identified when addressing intelligence issues.

U.S. military and embassy officials in Baghdad have been trying to build a case with a variety of evidence, according to officials.

But officials involved in interagency meetings on the issue in Washington, including some in the State Department and intelligence agencies, believe that some of the material overstates murky evidence and casts a negative light on Iranians who may not be guilty.

Another difficulty is that if some of the most sensitive information is withdrawn to protect intelligence sources, the result could be a weak and unconvincing report, the officials said.

The American official who requested anonymity said that although there were differences over the evidence, there was wide agreement within the U.S. government that Iran's actions were a threat and that the United States, while avoiding war, should be more aggressive in confronting Iran in Iraq.

"But that doesn't mean you want to go overboard," the official added. "Everyone at the Iranian Embassy isn't some kind of spy or revolutionary."

The official said that Rice, despite strongly agreeing that the United States should take a more aggressive approach, was urging caution on the tone of the report.

U.S. military officials in Iraq long have been concerned that Iranian Revolutionary Guards and other military and intelligence personnel are present in Iraq, and have been urging a stronger stance against the Iranians. On several occasions, they have requested broader authority to engage the Iranians, the U.S. official said.

This week the No. 2 U.S. military commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, said in an interview with USA Today that Iranians were supplying Iraqis with truck-mounted Katyusha rockets, armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades and armor-piercing roadside bombs.

Odierno said serial numbers linked the rockets to Iran.

The growing hostility is angering Iraqi leaders, who have begun speaking out against the prospect of conflict between the United States and Iran in their country.

Bullying Iran (NYT)

Given America's bitter experience in Iraq, one would think that President Bush could finally figure out that threats and brute force aren't a substitute for a reasoned strategy. But Mr. Bush is at it again, this time trying to bully Iran into stopping its meddling inside Iraq.

We have no doubt about Iran's malign intent, just as we have no doubt that Mr. Bush's serial failures in Iraq have made it far easier for Tehran to sow chaos there and spread its influence in the wider region. But more threats and posturing are unlikely to get Iran to back down. If Mr. Bush isn't careful, he could end up talking himself into another disastrous war, and if Congress is not clear in opposing him this time, he could drag the country along.

The drumbeat began during Mr. Bush's recent speech on Iraq, when he vowed to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks he said were arming and training anti-American forces. Mr. Bush also announced that he was sending a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. Hours earlier, American troops raided an Iranian diplomatic office in Iraq. If anyone missed the point, aides let it be known that the president had authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian operatives in Iraq.

Iran certainly is helping arm and train Shiite militias. But the administration is certainly exaggerating the salutary effect of any cutoff as long as these militias enjoy the protection of Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. If Mr. Bush is genuinely worried — and he should be — he needs to be as forceful in demanding that Mr. Maliki cut ties to these groups and clear about the consequences if he refuses.

In what passes for grand strategy in this administration, the president's aides say he is betting that bloodying Iranian forces in Iraq, and raising the threat of a wider confrontation, will weaken Tehran's regional standing and force its leaders to rethink their nuclear ambitions. Never mind that Mr. Bush's last big idea — that imposing democracy on Iraq would weaken Iran's authoritarians — has had the opposite effect.

Mr. Bush seems to be grossly misreading Iran's domestic politics and ignoring his own recent experience. In a rare moment of subtlety, the Treasury Department has quietly persuaded some banks and investors to rethink their dealings with Tehran. That has made some in Iran's permanent religious elite — already worried about future oil production — express doubts about President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiance of the Security Council.

As ever, the one tactic the administration is refusing to consider is diplomacy. Mr. Bush has resisted calls to convene a meeting of Iraq's neighbors to discuss ways to contain the crisis. There is no guarantee that Mr. Ahmadinejad can be persuaded that Iraq's further implosion is not in Iran's interest. But others in Tehran may have clearer heads. And any hope of driving a wedge between Iran and Syria will have to start by giving Damascus hope that there is a way in from the cold.

Mr. Bush's bullying may play well to his ever shrinking base. But his disastrous war in Iraq has done so much damage to America's credibility — and so strained its resources— that it no longer frightens America's enemies. The only ones really frightened are Americans and America's friends.

Chirac Unfazed By Nuclear Iran, Then Backtracks (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And Katrin Bennhold

PARIS, Jan. 31 — President Jacques Chirac said this week that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a big danger, and that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran.

The remarks, made in an interview on Monday with The New York Times, The International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur, a weekly magazine, were vastly different from stated French policy and what Mr. Chirac has often said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chirac summoned the same journalists back to Élysée Palace to retract many of his remarks.

Mr. Chirac said repeatedly during the second interview that he had spoken casually and quickly the day before because he believed he had been talking about Iran off the record.

"I should rather have paid attention to what I was saying and understood that perhaps I was on the record," he said.

The tape-recorded, on-the-record interview was conducted under an agreement that it would not be published until Thursday, when Le Nouvel Observateur appears on newsstands.

On Monday, Mr. Chirac began by describing as "very dangerous" Iran's refusal to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used to produce electricity or to make nuclear weapons. Then he made his remarks about a nuclear-armed Iran.

"I would say that what is dangerous about this situation is not the fact of having a nuclear bomb," he said. "Having one or perhaps a second bomb a little later, well, that's not very dangerous.

"But what is very dangerous is proliferation. This means that if Iran continues in the direction it has taken and totally masters nuclear-generated electricity, the danger does not lie in the bomb it will have, and which will be of no use to it."

Mr. Chirac said it would be an act of self-destruction for Iran to use a nuclear weapon against another country.

"Where will it drop it, this bomb? On Israel?" Mr. Chirac asked. "It would not have gone 200 meters into the atmosphere before Tehran would be razed."

It was unclear whether Mr. Chirac's initial remarks reflected what he truly believes. If so, it suggests a growing divide with American policy, which places the highest priority on stopping Iran from gaining the capacity to produce nuclear weapons.

Mr. Chirac has privately expressed the view occasionally in the past year that a nuclear-armed Iran might be inevitable and that it could try to sell the technology to other countries. But publicly the policy has been very different. In fact, Élysée Palace prepared a heavily edited 19-page transcript of the Monday interview that excluded Mr. Chirac's assessment of a nuclear-armed Iran.

The transcript even inserted a line that Mr. Chirac had not said that read, "I do not see what type of scenario could justify Iran's recourse to an atomic bomb."

There are divisions within the French government — and between Europe and the United States — about how much Iran should be punished for behavior that the outside world might not be able to change. Some French officials worry that the more aggressive course of action by the United States toward Iran will lead to a confrontation like the Iraq war, which France opposed.

In noting the sanctions against Iran that were imposed last month by the Security Council, Mr. Chirac warned Tuesday that escalation of the conflict by both sides was unwise. "Of course we can go further and further, or higher and higher up the scale in the reactions from both sides," he said. "This is certainly not our thinking nor our intention."

Mr. Chirac argued that Iran's possession of a nuclear weapon was less important than the arms race that would ensue.

"It is really very tempting for other countries in the region that have large financial resources to say: 'Well, we too are going to do that; we're going to help others do it,' " he said. "Why wouldn't Saudi Arabia do it? Why wouldn't it help Egypt to do so as well? That is the real danger."

Earlier this month, Mr. Chirac had planned to send his foreign minister to Iran to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon. The venture collapsed after Saudi Arabia and Egypt opposed the trip and members of his own government said it would fail.

Mr. Chirac, who is 74 and months away from ending his second term as president, suffered a neurological episode in 2005 and is said by French officials to have become much less precise in conversation.

In the second interview, Mr. Chirac retracted his comment that Tehran would be destroyed if Iran launched a nuclear weapon. "I retract it, of course, when I said, 'One is going to raze Tehran,' " he said.

He added that any number of third countries would stop an Iranian bomb from ever reaching its target. "It is obvious that this bomb, at the moment it was launched, obviously would be destroyed immediately," Mr. Chirac said. "We have the means — several countries have the means to destroy a bomb."

Mr. Chirac also retracted his prediction that a nuclear Iran could encourage Saudi Arabia and Egypt to follow suit.

"I drifted — because I thought we were off the record — to say that, for example, Saudi Arabia or Egypt could be tempted to follow this example," he said. "I retract it, of course, since neither Saudi Arabia nor Egypt has made the slightest declaration on these subjects, so it is not up to me to make them."

As for his suggestion in the first interview that Israel could be a target of an Iranian attack and could retaliate, Mr. Chirac said: "I don't think I spoke about Israel yesterday. Maybe I did so but I don't think so. I have no recollection of that."

There were other clarifications. In the initial interview, for example, Mr. Chirac referred to the Iranian Islamic Republic as "a bit fragile." In the subsequent interview, he called Iran "a great country" with a "very old culture" that "has an important role to play in the region" as a force for stability.

Mr. Chirac's initial comments contradicted the long-held French policy of deterrence, which holds that Iran must not go nuclear. The thinking is that a nuclear-armed Iran would give Iran the ability to project power throughout the region and threaten its neighbors — as well as encourage others in the region to seek the bomb.

Under Mr. Chirac's presidency, France has joined the United States and other countries in moving to punish Iran for refusing to stop enriching uranium, as demanded by the International Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations Security Council.

Iran insists that the purpose of its uranium enrichment program is to produce energy; France, along with many other countries, including the United States, is convinced that the program is part of a nuclear weapons project.

The purpose of the initial interview was for Mr. Chirac to talk about climate change and an international conference in Paris later this week that parallels a United Nations conference on the global environment.

The question about Iran followed a comment by Mr. Chirac on the importance of developing nuclear energy programs that are transparent, safe and secure.

In the midst of his initial remarks on Iran, Mr. Chirac's spokesman passed him a handwritten note, which Mr. Chirac read aloud. "Yes, he's telling me that we have to go back to the environment," Mr. Chirac said. He then continued a discussion of Shiite Muslims, who are by far the majority in Iran but a minority in the Muslim world.

"Shiites do not have the reaction of the Sunnis or of Europeans," said Mr. Chirac, who over the years in private meetings has expressed distrust of Shiite Muslims.

The president had a different demeanor during the two encounters.

DOJ_NMG_0125295

In the first interview, which took place in the late morning, he appeared distracted at times, grasping for names and dates and relying on advisers to fill in the blanks. His hands shook slightly. When he spoke about climate change, he read from prepared talking points printed in large letters and highlighted in yellow and pink.

By contrast, in the second interview, which came just after lunch, he appeared both confident and comfortable with the subject matter.

The attempt by Élysée Palace to change the president's remarks in a formal text is not unusual. It is a long-held tradition in French journalism for interview subjects — from the president to business and cultural figures — to be given the opportunity to edit the texts of question-and-answer interviews before publication.

U.S. Cautions Europeans To Avoid Oil, Gas Deals With Iran (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The Bush administration is warning European oil and gas companies against investing in Iran, trying to head off a push by Tehran to attract new investment by international petroleum giants.

In the past two weeks, the administration has met with European oil company executives about the Middle East, and during one session a senior State Department official cautioned that the situation with Iran was "hot and is going to get hotter," one executive said.

An executive from another major European company said, "The administration is putting the full-court press on foreign companies and is going all out to impress upon them that it would be a mistake to do anything with" Iran.

Despite the administration's pressure, however, many of the world's biggest oil companies were expected to attend a meeting in Vienna today and tomorrow held by National Iranian Oil Co. to drum up interest in 12 onshore and five offshore blocks. Executives from Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Russia's Lukoil, China's Sinopec International Petroleum Exploration and Production Corp. and Austria's OMV will give presentations.

"Obviously Iran is very interesting oil territory for everybody," said Patricia Marie, spokeswoman for the French oil company Total S.A., which invested about $4 billion in Iran between 1995 and 2002 and is sending a representative to the meeting. As for U.S. admonitions, Marie said, "We are listening. . . . But we respect the French law, the European laws; we are not obliged to respect American law."

Marie said Total will decide this year whether to proceed with a liquefied natural gas (LNG) project in the south of Iran.

Last week, Royal Dutch Shell and the Spanish company Repsol YPF S.A. signed a preliminary agreement with Iran to explore the possible development of another multibillion-dollar LNG project.

Oil company executives and consultants said any reluctance to invest in Iran ultimately has more to do with the stingy terms Iran offers than with arm-twisting by the U.S. government. Generally, Iranian contracts let foreign companies recoup costs and give them enough oil for them to make a small profit before control of the fields is turned over to National Iranian Oil.

"In effect, the Iranians have made our sanctions work better than we have," said Gary G. Sick, an expert on Iran at Columbia University.

One international executive said Iranians usually offer single-digit rates of return for investments in the oil sector, far less than what companies can make elsewhere.

"The Iranians always argue that there is no need for them to offer more because of the very low geological risk in Iran, because they know it's a country with substantial reserves," he said. "But you have to factor in political risk and all sorts of other things."

The struggle over oil investment is part of the Bush administration's campaign to isolate Iran and curtail its funds because of its pursuit of nuclear technology that might help it build nuclear weapons.

U.S. companies are barred from doing business with Iran. In 1995, an executive order stopped them from even bringing Iranian oil to Europe. In 1996, Congress passed the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, enabling the U.S. government to sanction foreign firms doing business with Iran. Though the United States has issued waivers to European companies involved in Iran's oil sector, one European executive said the Bush administration might change that stance.

On Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said of Shell's Iranian negotiations: For investments over a certain level, "policymakers take a look at it and see if there's any further steps that we, as a government, take."

A Shell spokesman said yesterday that "nothing has been decided" and that a decision on the project was "a year or so away."

EU Resisting US Calls To Up Financial Pressure On Iran (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, February 1, 2007

US demands to toughen financial sanctions against Iran are opening fault lines in the US-European stand to punish Tehran for defying calls to rein its suspect nuclear program.

Although European countries have agreed with the United States to impose sanctions on Iran in line with a UN resolution adopted in December, they are resisting US calls to go even further and force global financial institutions to sever all ties with the Islamic Republic.

US Under Secretary in charge of fighting terrorist funding, Stuart Levey, has made several whirlwind trips to Europe over the past months to try to persuade European multinationals and banks to stop investing in Iran.

But so far he has run into a brick wall, with European countries maintaining they are not ready to cut off banking links with Iranian companies, arguing that such a move goes beyond the spirit of the UN resolution.

"We are going to do the utmost to apply the content of the resolution. We are not going to go beyond what is in the resolution as states," a senior European official told AFP.

The stand is beginning to frustrate the US administration of President George W. Bush which has accused Tehran of making a covert grab for nuclear weapons under the guise of its civilian atomic energy program.

Iran has scoffed at the suggestions saying its program is merely for peaceful purposes, and has refused to stop its controversial uranium enrichment process despite the UN sanctions.

Iranian officials are even promising to unveil a major advance in its nuclear drive this week as part of the celebrations to mark the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

US officials this week gave vent to their mounting frustration, which comes as Bush has accused Iranian leaders of helping to foment the mounting sectarian violence in Iraq, fuelling fears that the US could be preparing some kind of military response against Tehran.

"The European response on the economic side has been pretty weak," one unnamed senior US official said quoted in The New York Times in an article headlined "Europe Resists US Push to Curb Iran Ties."

"We are telling the Europeans that they need to go way beyond what they've done to maximize pressure on Iran," he added.

However, this position does not seem to completely reflect the view of the US administration.

"I think that the concerns that European governments are expressing have to do with their legal requirements. They have a set of legal requirements that they have to abide by," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"And I'm not sure I would call that resistance to discussing or cooperating on these various measures."

European Union foreign ministers last week agreed to implement the full raft of UN sanctions against Tehran and deplored "Iran's failure to take the steps repeatedly required by the IAEA board of governors and the United Nations Security Council."

A new EU meeting is planned in mid-February to put in place European regulations on the Iran sanctions which suspend all exports of material and technology to the Islamic Republic.

The UN resolution also freezes Iranian assets abroad and restricts foreign travel by Iranians deemed to be involved in the suspect programs.

Earlier this month the US Treasury Department blacklisted Iran's fifth largest state-owned bank, Bank Sepah, alleging it had helped finance weapons proliferation.

That measure came after another of Iran's largest banks was blacklisted in September because of its "support for terrorism."

"Bank Saderat facilitates Iran's transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations each year," Levey said then.

However, neither of the two banks figure on the lists of organizations and people targeted by UN resolution 1737, and Bush had to use a presidential decree to prohibit their financial activities in the US.

Sanctions Rattle Iran, Spur Talk Of Shake-up (WT)

By Iason Athanasiadis

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

TEHRAN -- The unanimous passage of U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran in December has shaken the nation's public and ruling elite, prompting talk of a shake-up of top officials and fears of a U.S. attack.

Even before the sanctions were approved, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had been weakened by his inability to fulfill campaign promises to stem rising inflation and by doubts over the wisdom of his statements questioning the Holocaust and threatening Israel.

Now, suggestions are being raised that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, is to change several key officials, including Ali Larijani, the head of the National Security Council; Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki; and Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif.

"There is a deep concern and uncertainty on behalf of the Iranian leaders about the consequences of the nuclear program of Ahmadinejad's administration," said Hossein Bastani, the former general secretary of the Association of Iranian Journalists.

"In short ... the passage of such a resolution against the Islamic republic caught them by surprise."

Western officials have also noted rising domestic criticism of Mr. Ahmadinejad since the U.N. Security Council approved the relatively mild sanctions, which had been watered down to win the approval of Russia and China.

"You're starting to see voices in Iran that are concerned about the isolation that Iran's president and Iran's program are bringing," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a German television interview last week.

And French Ambassador to Washington Jean-David Levitte said in an interview with The Washington Times on Monday: "We have noted in the Iranian media the beginning of a debate about the situation that Iran is in now -- more isolation and confrontation."

A senior diplomat from the region, speaking to The Washington Times last week, said after a visit to Tehran that Iranians were troubled less by the specific economic sanctions than by the lineup of countries that had supported them, including Russia and China.

An alliance of reformists and conservative "realists" has emerged to say the president's actions are leading the country to the brink of war.

In recent days, there has been speculation that Ayatollah Khamenei is refusing even to see the president as a signal of his disquiet at Iran's growing isolation.

Reports also say the ayatollah is upset at Mr. Mottaki's inability to win allies among Iran's Arab neighbors at a time when the United States is encouraging moderate Arab states to line up against Iran.

Officials also are concerned that Mr. Larijani, the chief nuclear negotiator, has unnecessarily angered the European Union's foreign-policy chief, Javier Solana, with his inconsistent approach to the talks.

"What Larijani may not have understood is that he cannot treat Solana in that way and expect not to be burned by the European Union," a European diplomat in Tehran said on the condition of anonymity.

Iranians also are giving greater weight to the threat of a U.S. military attack after a former chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards said on the state television monopoly, Sedaosima, last week that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran.

"When we saw [Mohsen] Rezai openly say on Sedaosima that the Americans will try to strike and that he's willing to become a martyr, we were shocked," said Sahand, a young Iranian filmmaker who, like some others interviewed asked not to be fully identified. "It was the first time that it was being stated on national television."

The interview rang alarm bells for well-informed Iranian analysts, who point out that official Iranian news outlets tend not to report much bad news.

"On the night that sanctions were imposed last month, a commentator was telling people that they mean nothing and that Iranians have been through tougher times during the Iraq war," said Leila, a producer for Sedaosima. "I'm scared that Rezai's appearance is ... preparing people for a military strike on Iran."

Public anxiety has been further fed by the build-up of U.S. forces in Iraq and the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier, the USS John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf.

The Iranian military has responded with a three-day military drill testing its Zalzal and Fajr-5 missiles in the desert southeast of Tehran.

Last week, Russia completed delivery of 29 advanced TOR-M1 surface-to-air missile-defense systems, which will be deployed around Iran's nuclear facilities in central Iran, said European diplomatic sources in Tehran.

Latest Violence Claims At Least 24 Iraqis (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD — At least 24 Iraqis were killed and dozens injured today in bomb blasts, gunfire and other violence. The heaviest toll was inflicted in Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two soldiers and one Marine in combat in Al Anbar province on Tuesday. At least 3,084 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the website icasualties.org.

In the day's worst attack, a car bomb exploded in a downtown street where a crowd was waiting to catch minibus taxis to areas of Shiite Muslim-dominated east Baghdad. At least five people were killed and 12 injured, police said.

Naim Zamel, a 38-year-old father of three, was delivering goods to a shop across the street when the blast happened.

"The sound and the pressure were hard. Shrapnel was flying all over the place," he said from his bed at the Medical City Hospital, where he was treated for injuries to his neck, ear and leg. "I saw three cars on fire, people injured and shops destroyed."

Onlookers rushed to help the wounded, loading Zamel into the back of a pickup truck and rushing him to hospital before ambulances arrived at the scene.

Another car bomb exploded this morning in the mostly Shiite east Baghdad neighborhood of Amin, killing at least two people and injuring 10, police said.

The bullet-riddled bodies of four missing scholars, all Sunni Arabs, were found in the mostly Shiite neighborhood where they were kidnapped Monday as they left the Naharain University College of Law, university officials said.

Officials at Yarmuk Hospital said they received 10 more unidentified bodies from two mostly Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads.

North of the capital, a car bomb targeting an Iraqi police convoy exploded on a main road in the city Mosul, killing at least one officer and injuring four people, including a civilian, police and hospital officials said.

Iraqi soldiers confronted a suicide attacker they said was trying to drive an explosives-rigged fuel tanker into a small base in Muqdadiyah. The tanker exploded outside the base, injuring nine soldiers and causing a large fire, the military said.

South of Baghdad, police responding to reports of a car bomb in a mostly Sunni village near Suwayrah were targeted by a roadside bomb, officials said. Three policemen were injured and four suspects detained, they said.

Iraq's army and police are frequent targets of Sunni insurgents, who view them as collaborators with the United States.

A U.S. helicopter fired on four men planting a bomb in the shoulder of a road south of Baghdad, killing two of them, the military said in a statement.

Iraq Prepares For New Security Crackdown (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0125299

BAGHDAD — Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown aimed at crushing violence in the capital and surrounding regions, a member of the parliament and an airport official said Wednesday.

The airport official told the Associated Press that flights to and from Syria will be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted Tuesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to reveal the information.

Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's Defense and Security Committee, said the move "was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume."

President Bush recently warned Iran and Syria not to interfere in Iraq's affairs as U.S. and Iraqi forces prepare for the major crackdown on armed groups in the capital.

Across Iraq on Wednesday, at least 47 people were reported killed.

The United States has accused Syria of harboring former Baath Party officials who support the Sunni insurgency and allowing foreign fighters to slip across its border with Iraq. Bush has also complained that Iran smuggles weapons to Shiite extremists who have killed Americans and provides Shiite militias with training and support. Iran denies doing so.

Meanwhile, Iraq's prime minister pleaded Wednesday with Iran and the United States not to use his country as a place to fight each other.

"We have told the Iranians and the Americans: 'We know that you have a problem with each other, but we are asking you, please solve your problems outside Iraq,' " Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told CNN.

Bush has authorized U.S. troops to take action against Iranian agents allegedly operating in Iraq.

"We will not accept Iran to use Iraq to attack the American forces," al-Maliki said. However, "we don't want the American forces to take Iraq as a field to attack Iran or Syria," he said.

Iraq Restricts Air, Land Passages To Syria, Iran (WP)

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 -- Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown, a parliament member and an airport official said Wednesday, the Associated Press reported.

The airport official said that flights to and from Syria would be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted on Tuesday, the AP said.

Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's defense and security committee, told the AP that the move "was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume."

Also on Wednesday, the U.S. military said two soldiers and a Marine died Tuesday in Anbar province from "wounds sustained due to enemy action." A soldier from Task Force Lightning was killed in combat Wednesday in Salahuddin province, the military said in a statement. The service members' names will be released after relatives are notified.

In Baghdad on Wednesday, scholars and students at al-Nahrain University were protesting the kidnapping earlier this week of three law professors when they learned that their bodies had been found in a morgue. "They are innocent professors, good instructors," said Adnan al-Janabi, the director of the university, noting that one was over 70. One of the professor's sons, a student at the university, was also killed, he said.

Also Wednesday, a car bomb exploded southeast of Baghdad, killing four people and injuring nine, according to Col. Hasson Salman, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

Elsewhere in the country at least nine people were killed in shootings and mortar attacks, Salman said.

General: Shiite Militia Leaders Leaving Baghdad Strongholds (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Shiite militia leaders already appear to be leaving their strongholds in Baghdad in anticipation of the U.S. and Iraqi plan to increase the troop presence in the Iraqi capital, according to the top U.S. commander in the country.

"We have seen numerous indications Shia militia leaders will leave, or already have left, Sadr City to avoid capture by Iraqi and coalition security forces," Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said in a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee as part of his confirmation hearing today to be Army chief of staff.

Casey, who has been the senior U.S. military officer in Iraq since summer 2004, also stated that as part of the campaign to improve security in Baghdad, he expects that U.S. troops will be stationed in Sadr City with Iraqi army and national police units. U.S. plans call for five combat brigades, or about 17,500 troops, to move into Baghdad over the next four months and help occupy about 35 outposts across the city.

Sadr City is the huge slum on the east side of Baghdad that has about 2.5 million inhabitants and also is the home of the Mahdi Army, the most powerful militia in Iraq. The Mahdi Army is largely controlled by Moqtada al-Sadr, a radical cleric who is sharply anti-American.

If Sadr's militia does indeed attempt to wait out the security crackdown, Casey said, that "would clearly present a challenge" to the Iraqi government, which he said underscores the need to have Iraqi forces capable of bringing security to the country. Developing effective Iraqi forces has been a U.S. goal for more than three years. Casey noted earlier in his 46-page statement, which was filed yesterday with the committee, that one of the most significant mistakes that U.S. officials made in Iraq was overestimating the speed with which Iraqi forces could be developed.

While the Shiite militias appear intent on waiting out the Iraqi-American security offensive by moving out of the city and lying low, Sunni insurgents will take a different course, Casey predicted. Sunni leaders are likely to relocate to areas northwest and south of Baghdad, he said, while Sunni fighters "will attempt to go to ground" in the parts of the city where they live.

He said he considers it "unlikely" that violence would spread much beyond greater Baghdad because the battle for the city is "the central struggle" for control of Iraq.

As with other recent nominees appearing before the Armed Services panel, Casey listed a series of mistakes that he believes have been made in Iraq. While some Bush administration officials still cite Iraq's elections as a great success, for example, he said that he thinks they "seem to have promoted increased sectarian divisions within the country."

Lie Low, Fighters Are Told (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londo?o

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 -- The instructions delivered by emissaries of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr at a recent meeting in Baghdad were clear to militiaman Massan Abdul Hussein.

"They informed us to hide the weapons," Abdul Hussein recalled of the Jan. 21 meeting in the Shula neighborhood. "They said: 'We will not allow anyone to carry any arms, even if it's a pistol under their shirt. This is not acceptable.' "

Abdul Hussein, 30, considers himself a minor figure in the Mahdi Army, the powerful yet amorphous band of thousands of Sadr followers that the Pentagon said in November had "the greatest negative effect on the security situation in Iraq." But Abdul Hussein said the militia's foot soldiers had received a clear message from Sadr's headquarters in southern Iraq as Iraqi and U.S. troops prepared an intensified security crackdown in the capital.

"We should try at all costs to avoid any confrontation with the American forces, and even if they raid our offices or our houses, we should try to avoid a confrontation," he said. "We do not want this to lead to a larger outbreak of violence."

Sadr's followers waged fierce battles against the U.S. military in 2004, but militiamen and Iraqi politicians close to Sadr say this time he wants to avoid violent clashes and maintain a lower profile.

In recent weeks, Mahdi Army leaders have left Baghdad to avoid being targeted, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office has received reports that some Mahdi Army leaders are moving to Iran and Syria, according to an aide to Maliki who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The U.S. military has stepped up operations against Shiite militias and said recently that 600 Mahdi Army members, including 16 high-level figures, are in detention. The arrest of senior Sadr spokesman Abdul Hadi al-Daraji on Jan. 19 by U.S. and Iraqi forces has concerned Sadr followers, said Nassir al-Saedi, one of 30 parliament members in Sadr's bloc.

"We asked the leadership to leave their houses, because we do not trust the Americans," he said.

Sadr's followers say publicly that they embrace the new Baghdad security plan and are willing to support the Iraqi government's efforts to impose the rule of law in this chaotic city. But some Iraqi and U.S. officials said they are concerned that the stance is a pose and that Shiite militias intend to lie low only until U.S. forces withdraw.

"There's absolutely no reason to believe that these groups have changed their tune in any significant way" since the 2004 battles, said a U.S. official in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. "You could make an argument that there's just a level of exhaustion that's set in, but I find that not believable."

A more likely scenario is that the militia leaders believe they can "win the whole thing" if they are not too damaged by the time the United States withdraws, the official said.

Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaee, who oversees security affairs, said he is skeptical of statements by Mahdi Army leaders indicating a passive posture. "The Mahdi Army should hand over its weapons to the government, not put down their weapons or hide them," Zobaee said in an interview Wednesday. "This should go for every armed group. I don't think I can say I see that in the horizon."

Maliki is aware of concerns that the militias may be biding their time rather than sincerely taking peaceful steps, his aide said.

"This is a classic insurgency tactic, to hide when the troops are around and then reappear when the troops are gone," the aide said. "This is very much understood by the government and by the prime minister, and measures are being taken to make it a failure."

A Mahdi Army neighborhood leader from the Dakhil area of Baghdad's Sadr City slum, Ahmed Khawam, said the militias are not making major preparations for the security plan because they do not know what it will entail.

"As for targeting our city, by God's will, this will not happen, because the Imam Mahdi's army is in control of the whole area," he said. "But in case anything happens, we will get ready. We will not let any arrests take place."

For now, he said, the Mahdi Army is primarily concerned with providing services -- food, cooking gas, religion lessons -- to the impoverished people of Sadr City.

Another Mahdi Army member in Sadr City, Laith Abu Baqir, said he is willing to give the Iraqi security forces a chance to impose order and protect his neighborhood. "If they provide security for me from the terrorists, why not?"

"The only threat we have is from the American army," Abu Baqir said. "As for the others, we are not concerned."

Special correspondents Naseer Mehdawi, Naseer Nouri and Saad Sarhan contributed to this report.

North Iraq City Could Be A New Front (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

KIRKUK, Iraq — American officials, regional leaders and local residents are increasingly worried that this oil-rich city in northern Iraq could develop into a third front in the country's civil war just as increased numbers of U.S. troops arrive in Baghdad and Al Anbar province as reinforcement for battles there.

Al-Qaida-linked fighters have recently surfaced here, launching a wave of lethal attacks, U.S. and Iraqi officials say. The attacks come amid a rise in communal tensions in the months before a referendum on the status of the city and the surrounding province.

Meanwhile, Kurdish bureaucrats are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs.

Elsewhere in Iraq, Sunni and Shiite Muslim Arabs are locked in a bitter civil war. Here, the two groups have common cause against the Kurds, a non-Arab minority group that dominates Iraq's far-northern provinces.

The Kurds, Arabs and members of a third minority group, the Turkmens, each want control of this city and its surrounding region. At stake are land, water and control of some of Iraq's richest oil reserves.

None of the groups want war, they say. Yet everyone here appears to be preparing for it.

"They are right when they call it a time bomb," said Sheik Abdel Rahman Obeidi, a prominent Sunni Arab leader in Kirkuk. "We will not leave, and we will not let anyone take Kirkuk. We are ready to fight. We hope we won't have to, but we're ready."

Kurdish leaders, in turn, warn that they will take the city by law or by force.

"People don't have any more patience," said Kurdish Councilman Rebwar Faiq Talabani, sitting inside Kirkuk's heavily fortified provincial council building. "They are telling the government, 'If you can't get our rights back, we'll do it by ourselves.' "

Neighboring countries, especially Turkey and Iran, fear that if the Kurds do gain control of Kirkuk, Iraq's Kurdish region, which is already semiautonomous, would have the confidence and economic power to move toward independence. That could embolden Kurdish militants in the surrounding countries and further destabilize the region. In recent weeks, Turkish officials have threatened to intervene if the Kurds take over Kirkuk and have warned against efforts to change the city's population balance.

"Turkey cannot stand idly by, watching the efforts to change the demographic structure of Kirkuk," Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said last month, according to the Cihan News Agency.

Against this backdrop of ethnic, political and regional tensions, Iraq's new constitution mandates that a referendum be held by the end of this year on control of Kirkuk. If the vote goes ahead as scheduled, most analysts expect the Kurds to win.

Last year, at least 325 people were killed and 1,390 wounded in this city of about 1 million. During the first three weeks of this year, bombings and assassinations left 23 dead and injured 102, local police say.

"We expect increased violence when we get closer to" the referendum, said Maj. Gen. Anwar Mohammed Amin, the top Iraqi commander in Kirkuk.

The emergence of fighters from two radical Islamic groups with ties to al-Qaida after years of lying low is especially troublesome, officials say. The groups, known as Ansar al Sunna and the Islamic Army in Iraq, have launched a bombing campaign targeting politicians and civilians. Their aim is to foment violence between ethnic and sectarian groups much as they have done in Baghdad and elsewhere, officials say.

Painting Iraq's Sunni Arab guerrillas as al-Qaida associates serves Kurds in their goal of taking control of Kirkuk and its environs by making the aims of their rivals seem less legitimate.

Assassinations, bombings and attacks on Kurdish parties' headquarters by Shiite militias and Sunni groups linked to al-Qaida "are now all part of Kirkuk's violent landscape," said a report last month from the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Turkmen and Arab politicians, too, have been targeted in apparent retaliation by Kurds.

"Kirkuk is as likely as Baghdad to produce a calamity that can fracture Iraq," the report's authors wrote, recommending a delay of the referendum. The International Crisis Group, a nonprofit think tank based in Belgium, and the U.S. government's bipartisan Iraq Study Group have also recommended postponement.

But for Kurds, this year presents a historic opportunity they won't part with willingly.

Once a distant dream carried in the heart of Kurdish peshmerga fighters as they battled onetime Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's army in the mountains, full independence is now tantalizingly within reach.

If the timetable leading to the referendum is not followed, Kirkuk will be thrust into chaos, said Talabani, the provincial councilman. "It will be a civil war," he said. "Worse than Baghdad, because it will be a battle of ethnicities."

For nationalist Arabs and minority Turkmen, meanwhile, Kurdish appropriation of Kirkuk would signify the first step toward Iraq's disintegration. Turkmen do not want to become part of an independent Kurdistan, but they don't want to be controlled by Baghdad either. Most Arabs want to remain part of a unified Iraq.

As both sides maneuver for the coming referendum, the issue of who has the right to vote is emerging as a major flashpoint.

In 1957, the year of Kirkuk's last reliable census, Turkmen made up 40 percent of the population, while Kurds made up 35 percent, Arabs 24 percent and Christians 1 percent. In the surrounding province, Kurds constituted a majority with 55 percent of the inhabitants.

During the 1970s, however, Saddam forcibly removed 250,000 Kurds from Kirkuk, giving their property to Arabs in an effort to "Arabize" the city and its oil. Many of the new residents were Shiites moved here from villages in the south of Iraq.

Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, the demographics have shifted again. Thousands of Arabs and Turkmen have left because of political pressure and violence. And as many as 350,000 Kurds have come to Kirkuk, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. In dilapidated camps throughout the city, thousands of Kurds now wait for property claims to be resolved while Kurdish officials complain that the government in Baghdad is slowing the process.

The Kurds want Arabs who moved here under Saddam to return to the south, and are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs before the referendum.

Kurdish officials have recently proposed a cash incentive to Arabs, compensation of about $19,000 to each family who will give up their property and voting rights in the city. The tens of thousands of Arabs affected would be allowed to stay but would not be able to vote on Kirkuk's future, Kurdish officials said.

"I don't believe they have the right to vote in the referendum," said Adnan Mufti, the powerful speaker of Kurdistan's regional parliament. Even Arabs born in Kirkuk to parents who came from the south will be ineligible, he said. "It's the mistake of their fathers."

Arabs and Turkmen accuse Kurdish politicians of gerrymandering and administrative jiu-jitsu.

"Many of the Kurds who returned to Kirkuk are not the original residents of the city," said Abass Ahmed, a 60-year-old Turkman. "They are actually Kurds from other Kurdish regions."

Because of the demographic shifts and the Sunni Arab boycott of the 2005 election, Arabs already have little representation in the city. Kurds control 26 of the 41 provincial council seats as well as the army, police and intelligence services in the city.

"We are all arming ourselves," a politician from Kirkuk recently told the International Crisis Group. "We are afraid. There is talk of civil war. Anything could start it."

U.S. Tries To Put Its Best Foot Forward In Kirkuk Province (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

A U.S. Army colonel danced the debka at a garden party in this rural village last month, hand in hand with half a dozen former Kurdish guerrillas.

They were a study in contrasts: Col. Patrick Stackpole with crisp fatigues and a blond buzz cut, pistol strapped to his thigh, stomping along with swarthy peshmerga fighters with thick black mustaches, baggy shirwal pants and Muslim prayer beads.

Stackpole's soldiers, based in nearby Kirkuk, joined in or sat cradling automatic rifles as a military interpreter explained the dual purpose of the dance.

"They do it for a wedding or a ceremony, something like that," he said. "Or when they want to go to war."

Resource-rich Kirkuk and its surrounding province are prized by Iraq's various ethnic groups and could soon become another full-blown battleground in the widening civil war. The rolling hills produce 40% of the country's oil and 70% of its natural gas.

This year, Kirkuk residents face landmark votes that military experts say could spark sectarian violence: on how to draw provincial borders, and whether to conduct a census and join the semiautonomous Kurdish regional government.

The party Stackpole attended was held on land that had been seized from a Kurdish family and settled by Shiite Muslims. The property recently was returned to the original owners. Nearby, dozens of other Kurdish refugees are camped out in some of Saddam Hussein's former forts.

Goal of stabilizing area

Stackpole and his troops are attempting to forestall violence with a hearts-and-minds campaign that includes reaching out to both Kurds and Arabs, doling out reconstruction money and reinforcing political parties. And dancing.

"Never in my life did I think I would see a brigade commander from an infantry unit doing this," said Army Maj. Frank Strong, a burly reservist from McLean, Va., before joining the dance party.

The fete in this town, population 20,000, was orchestrated by a politician who has been one of the most receptive to U.S. overtures — provincial council Chairman Rizgar Ali Hamajan.

The Americans are counting on Hamajan, a Kurd and former peshmerga, to hold Kirkuk's provincial council together. Arab and Turkmen politicians are boycotting the council, citing a list of grievances.

Hamajan meets with them privately to sign off on legislation and the local budget. This month, Hamajan is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, President Jalal Talabani, who is Kurdish, and the country's two vice presidents to discuss the upcoming votes, mandated by Iraq's new constitution.

During the party, Hamajan explained to Stackpole why he needed more reconstruction money. Sunni Arab insurgents are scaring off workers and investors, he said.

"We need to have opportunities for young people other than doing bad things, so they have someplace to go; not just the imam from Mosul coming to teach them bad things," Hamajan said as the electricity flickered off and on. "We may have lost the older generation, but we need to work with the younger generation."

Discussion over dumplings

As they sat down to lunch at two long tables laden with freshly grilled lamb kebabs, grilled bass, kifta meat dumplings, bulgur wheat and rice sprinkled with paprika, Hamajan said he was not optimistic that violence could be controlled in Kirkuk. After Hussein's execution in December, he said, attacks by Sunni insurgents started to increase.

"Now, it is chaos in Iraq," Hamajan said. He began eating with his hands; Stackpole followed suit.

After lunch, as the military guests piled back into their Humvees for the convoy back to their base, they pronounced the party an exceptional occasion, a rare chance to speak freely with politicians and learn something about local culture.

Stackpole, who would be taunted mercilessly back at the base about his prowess on the dance floor, declared it "a history lesson of sorts."

Sunnis, Shiites Plan To Form 2 Legislative Blocs (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim lawmakers announced plans Wednesday to form two new blocs in Iraq's parliament they hope will break away from the ethnic and religious mold of current alliances and ease sectarian strife.

But while both blocs said they hope eventually to draw in members of all ethnic and religious groups, one initially will be made up entirely of Shiite politicians and the other of Sunnis.

Moderate politicians across the sectarian divide have voiced mounting frustration at parliament's seeming impotence in the face of escalating violence that killed at least 32 Iraqis and injured dozens Wednesday. The U.S. military announced the deaths of three soldiers and one U.S. Marine in fighting north and west of the capital.

A group of mostly independent legislators in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite faction, said that within days they will launch a new "Solidarity bloc" intended to be a voice of moderation within parliament's largest political formation.

Members hope to appeal "to Iraqis' patriotism and not their sect or ethnicity," said Shatha Moussawi, one of Solidarity's founding members.

Organizers claimed the support of at least 10 of the UIA's 128 legislators, but said others had expressed interest in joining them. For now, the group plans to remain within the alliance. But members said they would reach out to representatives of other ethnic and religious blocs and could unite with them in the future.

On the Sunni side, a number of independent lawmakers said they had already broken away from the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament with 44 members. The new "Gathering of Independent Iraqis" is lead by Abid Mutlaq Jabouri, a former major general in Saddam Hussein's army, said Abdullah Eskandar, another founding member.

"We were hoping that the major blocs like the Accordance, the UIA and Kurdish alliance would get us out of this crisis we are facing, but these groups have also turned to sectarianism," Eskandar said. "We are trying to break out of these alliances in order to serve the interests of Iraqis."

He claimed the support of more than 10 Sunni lawmakers, but said the group hopes to become a major opposition party drawing in representatives of other communities.

Disputes both within and between the main blocs have paralyzed parliament for months, blocking final legislation governing key issues such as the division of responsibilities between Iraq's central government and provinces, the re-integration of former members of Saddam's regime into the government and security forces, and the distribution of the country's massive oil wealth.

U.S. officials had urged Iraqi politicians to look beyond their traditional formations in hopes of isolating more extreme leaders such as anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls one of the two largest groups in the leading Shiite alliance and is backed by a powerful militia often blamed in the sectarian violence.

But members of both new blocs insisted U.S. officials had nothing to do with their ventures.

"I really hate that question," said Qassim Daoud, a member of the coming Solidarity bloc. "Our allegiance is to Iraq and the Iraqi people."

Meanwhile, Iraqi officials released new details about an obscure messianic sect they said had been poised to attack Shiite clergy and religious sites in Najaf when it was decimated Sunday in an offensive by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Brig. Gen. Qais Mamoory, chief of the Babil provincial police force, told reporters that members of the Heaven's Army cult led by Dhyaa Abdul-Zahra, a charismatic man in his 30s, had infiltrated Iraq's security forces and were able to bring advanced weapons into their compound.

"It seemed that they prepared themselves well, and it seemed that they received training outside Iraq," Mamoory said.

The sect's gunmen were organized into snipers and attackers, who fought under the slogan "Victory or Martyrdom," he said.

"They surprised our forces in Najaf and they captured some of our troops and vehicles," he said.

But members of the elite Scorpion force freed 20 of them and retrieved five bodies, he said.

Most of the cult's 1,000 to 1,500 followers came from Kut, Diwanyia and Hillah, he said. They apparently hoped to establish an emirate under another cult leader, Ahmed Alagh, identified by police as an advocate of their Wahhabi of Sunni Islam practiced by al-Qaida. But literature viewed by a journalist inside the compound dismissed both Sunni and Shiite teachings. Abdul-Zahra and Alagh were believed to be killed in the fighting.

At least 2,067 Iraqis were killed in insurgent and sectarian violence in January, according to figures compiled by the ministries of health, defense and health.

The heaviest toll in Wednesday's violence was inflicted in Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep.

A car bomb exploded in a downtown street where a crowd was waiting to catch minibus taxis to areas of Shiite Muslim-dominated east Baghdad. At least five people were killed and 12 injured, police said.

A car bomb in a mostly Shiite neighborhood of the capital and mortar attacks on a mostly Sunni area killed at least eight people and injured 28 more.

One U.S. soldier was killed and another injured in combat Wednesday in Salahuddin province, U.S. command said. Two more soldiers and a Marine were reported killed the previous day in al-Anbar province.

At least 3,084 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Times special correspondents in Baghdad, Baqouba, Mosul, Najaf and Hillah contributed to this report.

U.S. Agency Finds New Waste And Fraud In Iraqi Rebuilding Projects (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 — A federal oversight agency reported Wednesday that despite nearly $108 billion that had been budgeted for the reconstruction of Iraq since the 2003 invasion, the country's electrical output and oil production were still below prewar levels and stocks of gasoline and kerosene had plummeted to their lowest levels in at least two years.

The United States alone has accounted for nearly $38 billion of the rebuilding money, according to the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

Even as the flow of reconstruction money from the United States is coming to an end, the litany of major American contractors that are suspected of having wasted large amounts of the money has lengthened, new investigations by the inspector general have found.

One of the reports released on Wednesday found that an American company, DynCorp, appeared to act almost independently of its contracting officers at the Department of State at times, billing the United States for millions of dollars of work that was never authorized and starting other jobs before they were requested.

The findings of misconduct against the company, on a $188 million job order to build living quarters and purchase weapons and equipment for the Iraqi police as part of a training program, were serious enough that the inspector general's office began a fraud inquiry.

"As a result of that audit, matters meriting investigation were uncovered," Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who is in charge of the office, said on Wednesday.

Mr. Bowen declined to give further details but said that he was also initiating a countrywide review of DynCorp's work in Iraq. The company has also received major contracts to train police in Afghanistan.

Gregory Lagana, a DynCorp spokesman, said the company would investigate the report's findings. "We are looking into the issues raised by the inspector general with the goal of providing as full an accounting as possible," Mr. Lagana said. "We believe we acted responsibly and with all due concern for the expenditure of public funds."

One major investigation begun by Mr. Bowen's office came to an end on Monday when Robert J. Stein Jr., a former Pentagon contractor who confessed to stealing millions of dollars in a bribery and fraud scheme in the southern Iraqi city of Hilla in 2004, was sentenced to nine years in federal prison.

But Mr. Bowen said Wednesday that his office had 80 active investigations of potential criminal activity in Iraq. Some 23 cases have been handed over to the Justice Department, "and they are making progress on those," he said.

The latest reports by Mr. Bowen's office appear to show that it is not for lack of money that the performance of Iraq's basic infrastructure has fallen to disastrous levels in some cases; if anything, the rebuilding program seems to have been given more money than it has been able to use to any effect.

In a sweeping breakout of financing sources, one analysis, in a quarterly report released Wednesday, shows that Congress has now passed eight bills that have provided $38.2 billion for the rebuilding effort, while Iraq itself has dedicated $50.5 billion to the effort. International donors have pledged $15.2 billion, although only a small portion of that has so far materialized.

One example of the problems Iraq has faced in using those enormous amounts of money can be seen in connection with the $24.8 billion in Iraqi money that the Iraqi government has appropriated for the capital budget of its ministries from 2004 to 2007 — in essence, a homegrown reconstruction budget.

Despite the threadbare state of the oil, electricity, water, transportation and communications infrastructure here, the ministries managed to spend as little as 15 percent of those appropriated funds because of problems finding companies to do the work in dangerous places, a lack of skilled contracting officers and American-sponsored anticorruption programs that have intimidated Iraqi bureaucrats.

Iraq faces those problems as the American money begins to run out. But even though American officials have managed to spend most of this money, its lasting impact on the quality of life in Iraq is highly debatable.

Despite the allocation of more than $4 billion in American taxpayer money to electricity projects in Iraq, the nationwide electricity output recently dipped below the prewar level of about 4,200 megawatts after a brief period above it. The performance is so embarrassing to the United States that late last year, with no formal notice, the State Department eliminated the line indicating prewar output from its weekly report on electricity production in Iraq.

After a rally in the middle of 2006, the inspector general's quarterly report shows, Iraq's crude oil production has also been steadily slipping, a serious concern because oil is the basis of the Iraqi economy.

Al Qaeda 2006: Fighting In Iraq, Regrouping In Afghanistan, Enlisting In Europe (CSM)

By Carol Huang

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

In 2006, agents of Al Qaeda, as well as those inspired by its ideology, continued their attacks. Violence in Iraq intensified, and Afghanistan saw its most violent year since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0125307

Despite worsening chaos on those fronts, counterterrorist forces arrested and killed high-profile terrorists and kept the West free from attack. But these actions don't appear to have weakened the appeal of Al Qaeda's agenda. "Home-grown" militants around the world joined its jihad, as regional fighting heightened perceptions of a global war on Islam.

Here's an assessment of some of the most significant gains and losses for Al Qaeda last year:

Afghanistan

Terrorism experts say that militant jihadists shifted focus to the original Al Qaeda base to utilize experience and tactics gained in Iraq – as reflected in the increase in suicide bombings from 27 in 2005 to 139 in 2006, according to US estimates. Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the border region between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Algeria

Algeria's Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat declared an alliance with Al Qaeda in September.

Britain

In August, authorities foiled a terrorist plot with all the hallmarks of an Al Qaeda attack. British security arrested dozens of suspects whom they allege were participating in a plan to bomb up to 10 passenger flights from England to the US.

But Europe's major problem in 2006, experts say, was "home-grown terrorism." Britain's spy chief, Eliza Manningham-Buller, warned in November that the security service MI5 was "working to contend with some 200 groupings or networks, totaling over 1,600 identified individuals."

Europe is a primary recruiting base for Al Qaeda as Muslim communities there have access to wealth and freedom of movement, says Rohan Gunaratna, author of "Inside Al Qaeda: Global Network of Terror."

Islamic militants are "busy recruiting from the Muslim diaspora," adds Paul Wilkinson, chairman of the advisory board of the Centre for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland. "It's very clear that the organization is still very much in business.... And that recruitment has been going on quite rapidly."

Egypt

An April 24 attack in a Sinai resort town was not claimed by Mr. bin Laden, but the hotel bombings had many similarities to an Al Qaeda strike. The attacks were a sign that the group's tactics have gained a foothold among other radical groups.

Indonesia

Hundreds of members of Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), a major terrorist group linked to Al Qaeda, were arrested, while more radical members split from the group in early 2006 to form Tanzim Qaedat al-Jihad. The biggest blow to counterterrorism efforts was the release of Abu Bakar Bashir from jail in June 2006 after he spent 26 months in prison. The radical Islamic cleric, who is said to lead JI, was cleared of conspiracy charges in December for his role in the 2002 Bali hotel bombings. "Indonesian counterterrorism law is gravely weak," says Mr. Gunaratna. "Abu Bakar Bashir is the leader of the most dangerous group in Southeast Asia. His group has killed more than 250 people."

Iraq

The most violent offshoot of bin Laden's global organization, Al Qaeda in Iraq, seemed to suffer a major blow in 2006 with the killing of former chief Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June.

But the loss of his leadership may have actually strengthened the group, says Gunaratna. "Zarqawi was a very able and ruthless man," he says, but "not a politician." His successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, "is following exactly the instructions of bin Laden and al-Zawahiri."

Al Qaeda in Iraq is small but vicious, says Gunaratna. It was linked to the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra – the impact of which ratcheted up sectarian killings in 2006.

In January, the UN said that more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians were killed last year, most in Sunni-Shiite violence that Al Qaeda is bent on fomenting.

Pakistan

In September 2006, President Pervez Musharraf arranged his most recent peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in Pakistan's remote Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the Afghan border. Mr. Musharraf's peace-brokering, critics warn, has allowed the Taliban to move freely between Afghanistan and Pakistan. John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence who is expected to be confirmed as deputy secretary of state, said that the deal is allowing Al Qaeda operatives to reorganize in the area and to cultivate "stronger operational connections and relationships that radiate outward from their leaders' secure hideout in Pakistan to affiliates throughout the Middle East, North Africa, and Europe."

Palestinian territories

In March, Israel for the first time charged two Palestinians for being members of a group possibly connected to Al Qaeda. Journalist kidnappings raised concerns that the group was infiltrating the territory or inspiring copycats.

Philippines

The Philippine military killed two top members of the Al Qaeda-linked militant group Abu Sayyaf. Military officials say that the killing of the group's leader, Khadaffy Janjalani, in September 2006, and his deputy Abu Sulaiman, who was killed in January 2007, have rendered the group ineffective. Still, US-trained Philippine soldiers continue to regularly engage Abu Sayyaf militants.

Saudi Arabia

In February, Saudi Arabia thwarted a bombing on an oil-processing plant. Raids and gun battles throughout the country netted more than 100 suspected Al Qaeda militants, but US officials have said that the kingdom could do more to curb terrorism, including stopping the flow of militants and funds across its borders.

Somalia

In June, Islamists suspected of harboring key Al Qaeda operatives overran Mogadishu and took over most of the country except Baidoa, the seat of a weak transitional government. US-backed warlords could not stop the Union of Islamic Courts, which denies charges of ties with Al Qaeda. The country saw its first suicide bombing – which Somali officials blamed on Al Qaeda – on Sept. 19, a failed attempt to kill the interim president. The Islamists fled in the wake of an Ethiopian and Somali offensive that began Dec. 26.

USA

North America saw no Al Qaeda attacks. American security forces working around the world have seen "an awful lot of victories," says Arnaud de Borchgrave, director of the Transnational Threats Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "The CIA has carte blanche to track terrorists around the world," he says. Critics say that this has led to the use of secret prisons used to interrogate Al Qaeda suspects.

On the domestic front, officials say that they thwarted attacks on Chicago's Sears Tower and New York's transit system over the summer and arrested several people in the process – although it was unclear how serious such plans were.

Yemen

Yemen prevented bomb attacks at two oil facilities on Sept. 15 that were, according to intelligence consulting firm Stratfor, probably commissioned by Al Qaeda. Twenty-three suspected Al Qaeda fighters escaped from prison in February. The government killed or captured many of them, but officials say that those remaining may help Al Qaeda in Yemen to regroup.

The Iraq Syndrome, R.I.P. (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

After Vietnam, Americans turned inward. Having lost faith in their leadership class, many Americans grew suspicious of power politics and hesitant about projecting American might around the world.

The Vietnam syndrome was real. It lasted all of five years — the time between the fall of Saigon and the election of Ronald Reagan.

Today, Americans are disillusioned with the war in Iraq, and many around the world predict that an exhausted America will turn inward again. Some see a nation in permanent decline and an end to American hegemony. At Davos, some Europeans apparently envisioned a post-American world.

Forget about it. Americans are having a debate about how to proceed in Iraq, but we are not having a strategic debate about retracting American power and influence. What's most important about this debate is what doesn't need to be said. No major American leader doubts that America must remain, as Dean Acheson put it, the locomotive of the world.

Look at the leaders emerging amid this crisis. The two major Republican presidential contenders are John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, the most aggressive internationalists in a party that used to have an isolationist wing.

The Democrats, meanwhile, campaigned for Congress in 2006 by promising to increase the size of the military. The presidential front-runner, Hillary Clinton, is the leader of the party's hawkish wing and recently called for a surge of U.S. troops into Afghanistan. John Edwards, the most "leftward" major presidential contender, just delivered a bare-knuckled speech in which he castigated the Bush administration for not being tough enough with Iran. "To ensure that Iran never gets nuclear weapons, we need to keep all options on the table," Edwards warned.

This is not a country looking to avoid entangling alliances. This is not a country renouncing the threat of force. This is not a country looking to come home again. The Iraq syndrome is over before it even had a chance to begin.

The U.S. has no material need to reconsider its dominant role in the world. The U.S. military still has no serious rivals, even after the strains of Iraq. The economy is humming along nicely.

The U.S. has no cultural need to retrench. Vietnam sparked a broad cultural revolution, a shift in values and a loss of confidence. Iraq has not had the same effect. Many Americans have lost faith in the Bush administration and in this particular venture, but there has been no generalized loss of faith in the American system or in American goodness.

There hasn't even been a broad political shift in favor of the doves. The most important war critics are military types like Jack Murtha, Chuck Hagel and Jim Webb, who hate this particular war but were superhawks in other circumstances.

Finally, there has been no change in America's essential nature. As Robert Kagan writes in his masterful book "Dangerous Nation," America has never really been an isolationist or aloof nation. The United States has always exercised as much power as it could. It has always coupled that power with efforts to spread freedom. And Americans have always fought over how best to fulfill their mission as the vanguard of progress.

What's happening today is just another chapter in that long expansionist story. Today's debate in the Senate flows seamlessly from the history Kagan describes. Most senators agree that the tactical question of sending 20,000 more troops is not the central issue. Their core concern, they say, is finding a new grand strategy to stabilize the region.

Most senators want a much more aggressive diplomatic effort to go along with the military one. (If President Bush said his surge was part of an effort to establish a regional diplomatic conference, he'd have majority support tomorrow.) But they don't question the need for America to play a leading role. They take it for granted that the U.S. is going to be in the Middle East for a long time to come.

When you look further into the future, you see that the next president's big efforts will not be about retrenchment, but about expansion. They'll be about expanding the U.S. military, expanding the diplomatic corps, asking for more shared sacrifice, creating new interagency bureaus that will give America more nation-building capacity.

In short, the U.S. has taken its share of blows over the past few years, but the isolationist dog is not barking. The hegemon will change. The hegemon will do more negotiating. But the hegemon will live.

Pentagon Restructuring May Threaten Special Ops Oversight (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

A major reorganization of the Pentagon's policy shop is raising concerns among defense authorizers, who say the move could dilute the efficacy of a congressionally mandated civilian office tasked with oversight and support of special operations.

A report addressing lawmakers' concerns about the overhaul of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy is due today to Congress, and a Pentagon spokeswoman said the report is ready and will be delivered by deadline. Several sources, however, have indicated that the report may be delayed because of a long approval process.

The reorganization is meant to bring the office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to transnational threats, manage international military coalitions and equip partner nations to fight terrorists. The report is expected to address congressional concerns that policy office leadership so far has been unable to alleviate despite several meetings on the Hill.

"We are less certain about the reorganization," a congressional source said. "Each briefing from [the Pentagon] makes us less comfortable." The source added that policy shop leadership may be casting doubt on its own plan by saying it will be implemented on a one-year trial basis and then re-evaluated.

As part of the overhaul, the restructuring of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict (SO/LIC) could face opposition from the armed services panels, which initially mandated the office's creation. The position was included as part of the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act, which also created the United States Special Operations Command.

The assistant secretary's office, which is run by civilians with extensive special-operations background, was created to ensure that the special-operations forces would receive the attention and resources from the Pentagon deemed necessary by Congress.

Because the Pentagon is keeping SO/LIC as an office rather than eliminating it, it is unclear what members could do legislatively to prevent the office's expanded portfolio.

So far, lawmakers are inclined to listen. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), chairman of the Armed Services Emerging Threats and Capabilities subcommittee, is planning to meet in the coming days with Ryan Henry, the principal deputy undersecretary of defense for policy and one of the architects of the reorganization.

"We created the position for SO/LIC and we want to go back and see whether these changes are justified," Reed told The Hill. "Certain aspects of the reorganization require some discussion and the whole point is to ask questions."

In the past, under the leadership of Thomas O'Connell, the SO/LIC office oversaw several functions, such as special operations/combating terrorism, counter-narcotics, information operations and so-called stability operations.

Part of the reorganization required congressional approval of a 10th assistant secretary of defense to oversee a new office of global security affairs.

The assistant secretary of defense for global security affairs is taking on the responsibility of overseeing counter-narcotics operations that previously had been under SO/LIC, as well as several other functions such as detainee affairs and security cooperation operations.

For SO/LIC, the overhaul means that the office now would be called SO/LIC Interdependent Capabilities and would oversee special operations, strategic capabilities (nuclear and missile issues), stability operations and forces transformation and resources.

While Congress approved the creation of a 10th assistant secretary of defense to facilitate the reorganization of the policy shop, defense authorizers had some critical questions about the role played by SO/LIC.

Defense authorizers are worried that strategic capabilities (i.e., nuclear and missile issues) require a different skill set and knowledge base and could result in an overall dilution of the statutory mission of the assistant secretary of defense for SO/LIC, which is to supervise special operations and low-intensity conflict activities.

Moreover, authorizers wrote in the report to the 2007 defense authorization bill that moving strategic capabilities away from the office responsible for chemical and biological weapons would affect coordination.

Also, yet another skill set would be needed to oversee transformation. "Placing such responsibilities under the ASD for SOLIC/IC would further divert focus from the statutory mission of this ASD," said the report.

The reorganization may also place the commander of SOCOM in a complicated position.

Although SOCOM by virtue of its covert nature does not welcome much oversight, the lack of a civilian advocate on the Hill and in the Pentagon could detract from Gen. Doug Brown's responsibility as SOCOM commander.

The Afghanistan Surge (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0125311

WHILE THE country debates the Bush administration's "surge" of American troops into Baghdad, a similar American buildup has begun in Afghanistan. As in Iraq, it comes in response to rapidly escalating violence, and in Afghanistan, too, one question is whether the reinforcements are too little or too late.

By extending the deployment of a brigade of the 10th Mountain Division even as the 82nd Airborne begins to arrive, the Pentagon will bring the U.S. troop level to 24,000. That's 50 percent more than at this time last year and about six times the number of American soldiers who were in Afghanistan at the time of the battle for Tora Bora, in early 2002. The administration, led by Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, stoutly resisted calls for expanding either U.S. or allied forces then. Let the record show: They were terribly wrong. Successful wars begin with a large troop deployment that tapers off as objectives are accomplished and security is restored. In Afghanistan U.S. troop levels started at rock bottom and have steadily risen over the past five years, even as security has worsened.

By most measures, there are still far fewer Afghan and foreign troops than are needed to secure the country. With the increase, the total number of U.S., NATO and other allied troops will be around 45,000, while there are about 40,000 soldiers in the new Afghan army. By contrast there are 146,000 coalition troops in Iraq in advance of the surge, and 134,000 Iraqi army troops. Yet Afghanistan is 50 percent larger than Iraq and has a larger population. What's more, many NATO troops in Afghanistan are constrained by their governments from fighting or even deploying in the areas where the Taliban insurgency is based. Only 80 percent of the troops requested by NATO commanders have been dispatched, and there are shortages of vital equipment such as helicopters.

The relative good news is that the administration is making a significant effort to correct a situation that, though deteriorating, remains far better than that in Iraq. In addition to the extra forces, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced last week that the White House would seek $10.6 billion in new funding for Afghanistan in the upcoming supplemental budget -- a huge addition to the $14 billion in aid that has been spent since 2001. Most of the new money would go toward a big expansion of the Afghan army and police, which would gain 150,000 new personnel, but $2 billion would be used for aid projects in a country where millions of people have yet to see any benefit from the government that replaced the Taliban.

The effort deserves support from Congress. But it's likely to fall short unless other NATO countries are willing to similarly increase their commitments. Though Britain, Canada and the Netherlands carried the burden of the war in southern Afghanistan last year, Germany, France, Italy and Spain are among the countries that have kept their soldiers away from the war zone and tied them down with restrictions. The European Union has pledged just $780 million in aid for Afghanistan over the next four years. Ms. Rice now leads a U.S. campaign to round up more allied commitments over the next several weeks. She can only hope the belated but essential American escalation will give her some leverage.

Top US Prosecutors 'forced Out' (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Democratic senators are fighting to halt what they say is a Bush administration campaign to remove forcibly top federal prosecutors, including the US attorneys responsible for key investigations of Congressional corruption and stock options back-dating.

Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will hold a hearing next week on whether the justice department is politicising the hiring and firing of top federal prosecutors.

Thirteen of the 93 US attorneys have left since the March 2006 passage of a little-noticed amendment to the Patriot Act that – in effect – allows President George W. Bush to install top prosecutors without Senate confirmation.

Departing attorneys include Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, who was leading the probes of stock options at Apple, and Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted Republican congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham and was investigating a politically connected defence contractor.

Democrats say those two as well as US attorneys in New Mexico, Arizona, Arkansas, Washington State and Nevada have been forced out. Mr Ryan has said he left as a result of a "mutually agreeable decision with Washington".

Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, denied that the Bush administration was trying to circumvent Senate confirmation. Justice department officials said on Wednesday they would seek Senate confirmation for all replacement attorneys.

Traditionally, the justice department sets policy but the US attorneys have significant discretion in deciding which cases to investigate and prosecute.

The president names US attorneys but permanent US attorneys must be confirmed by the Senate. Until last year, "interim" replacements could serve 120 days and then generally had to seek approval from a state's federal judges to stay on.

However, during 11th-hour negotiations over the re-authorisation of the Patriot Act, Republican Senator Arlen Specter added an amendment that allows the president to make interim appointments that can last indefinitely.

Recently, turnover among US attorneys has been unusual. Although US attorneys serve at the president's pleasure – and are routinely asked to submit resignations when an administration changes – it is unusual for so many to leave at the same time during midterm.

California Senator Dianne Feinstein has introduced a bill to return to the old system. Mr Leahy is a co-sponsor and the Judiciary Committee will consider it as early as next week.

Interim U.S. Attorney For Ariz. Named (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, February 1, 2007

The Department of Justice, dodging recommendations from Arizona's two U.S. senators, has named veteran federal prosecutor Daniel Knauss as interim U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona.

Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl had recommended Diane Humetewa, an assistant U.S. attorney and member of the Hopi tribe, for the position vacated by Paul Charlton.

In a news release, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had appointed Knauss, a chief assistant in charge of the U.S. attorney's satellite office in Tucson.

Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which must confirm permanent candidates, responded: "Daniel Knauss is a quality lawyer and will make an excellent interim U.S. Attorney. . . . It's our hope that eventually Diane Humetewa will be nominated by the president."

Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for Arizona, stressed that Knauss' appointment is a temporary measure. He said President Bush has yet to nominate a candidate for Senate approval, and Humetewa is not excluded from that process.

Candidates recommended by senators typically win such assignments, but the attorney general has authority to appoint interim administrators as he sees fit.

Knauss, a 34-year employee of the federal prosecutor's office in Arizona, also filled in as boss during 1993 after the resignation of Linda Akers. His temporary appointment at the time angered Sen. Dennis DeConcini, who had nominated Janet Napolitano for the job, though she was not then a federal prosecutor.

Napolitano later received President Clinton's permanent nomination and served as U.S. attorney before winning elections as Arizona's attorney general, and then governor.

Over the years, Knauss has held three of the most important posts at the U.S. Attorney's Office: first assistant, chief assistant and head of the Criminal Section.

"He will bring a consistency to the office that is critical to its mission and personnel during this transition," Hornbuckle said.

Knauss' assignment comes amid a controversy over the forced resignations of several U.S. attorneys around the nation. Some Democratic lawmakers, who say Gonzales has targeted chief prosecutors for political reasons, plan to conduct a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the issue Tuesday. They also complain that the Bush administration is abusing a provision in the USA Patriot Act that allows Gonzales to make interim appointments without congressional confirmation.

Charlton announced his resignation last month, saying he was shifting to private legal practice. He has not commented on speculation that he was directed to quit.

Although the nation's 63 U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the attorney general, resignations generally occur after four-year terms are completed.

Federal Judge Won't Seek U.S. Attorney Post In Los Angeles (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

Dickran Tevrizian, a leading candidate for the L.A. post, is said to have withdrawn his name.

Longtime federal judge Dickran M. Tevrizian has withdrawn his name from consideration as the next U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, it was learned Wednesday.

Though Tevrizian declined to comment, others in the legal community said the 66-year-old jurist had recently notified a search committee for the Justice Department that he no longer was a candidate for the job.

Only days ago, Tevrizian, a U.S. District Court judge, was viewed as one of the leading candidates for the position, which has jurisdiction over federal prosecutions in a seven-county area.

But Tuesday, the judge told attorneys in a case before him that he would not pursue the post, a lawyer said.

"Basically he said he wasn't that interested in the job and had put his name in consideration because others had asked him to," said attorney Dale Rubin.

Rubin is representing one of two men facing the death penalty in Tevrizian's court for a kidnapping and murder rampage.

One day before Tevrizian's disclosure, attorneys for the two defendants had asked him to recuse himself because of the possibility that he might soon be running the very office prosecuting the case, Rubin said.

"It is not that he is biased," Rubin said.

"It was just the appearance of impropriety we were trying to avoid," the attorney said.

Tevrizian referred the motion to another judge for a decision, Rubin said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Broadband Convictions Overturned (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

Judge Overturns Convictions of Enron Broadband Executive

HOUSTON (AP) -- Just days before he was set to be sentenced, a former Enron Corp. executive's fraud and conspiracy convictions related to the company's broadband unit were overturned Wednesday by a federal judge.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted in May on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records after a monthlong trial. Howard had been set to be sentenced Monday.

Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges in the same trial. Both men were accused of participating in a small piece of the fraud that brought down Enron in 2001.

On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore vacated the convictions on all five counts Howard had been found guilty of, saying in a 19-page ruling the convictions were tied to a flawed legal theory prosecutors used to explain the fraud and conspiracy charges.

Gilmore based her decision on a ruling in August in which the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's 1999 sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage to help the energy trader appear to have met earnings targets.

The appeals court found fault with the government's arguments of criminal liability and deprivation of honest services.

Gilmore said the decision in the Merrill Lynch case compelled her to vacate Howard's convictions.

"An important tenet of our criminal justice system is that a defendant is innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt," Gilmore wrote in her ruling. "When it is uncertain whether a defendant was convicted under an appropriate standard, the integrity of the judicial system is undermined."

Jack Zimmermann, one of Howard's attorneys, said his client was gratified with Gilmore's ruling.

"Kevin Howard has maintained faith in the system," he said.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury in 2005. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 as another growth engine during the dot-com boom.

Howard was accused of conspiring to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that never made a profit. Prosecutors alleged the deal, "Project Braveheart," was a sham because investors were promised to be bought out at a premium, making the sale a disguised loan.

Zimmermann, who defended Howard with attorney Jim Lavine, said prosecutors could still decide to retry him for a third time. A hearing in the case was set for Feb. 20.

"We would hope the government would carefully evaluate their options and decide a third trial is not in the best interests of the taxpayers and the government anymore than it is in the interests of Mr. Howard," Zimmermann said.

A representative from the Justice Department did not immediately return a telephone call Wednesday evening seeking comment.

Prosecutors had conceded the four fraud and conspiracy counts against Howard should have been vacated because of the flawed legal theory.

But they had contended the falsifying records count should remain because trial evidence had proved that through his participation in Project Braveheart, Howard had directly "caused the falsification of Enron's earnings and therefore of its books and records."

Gilmore said she didn't believe such evidence was presented at trial that would have compelled the jury to find Howard guilty of falsifying records without relying on the other flawed counts.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Judge Throws Out A Conviction In Enron Case (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

HOUSTON, Jan. 31 — A federal judge in Houston on Wednesday threw out the conviction of Kevin A. Howard, the former chief financial officer for Enron's Broadband unit, citing a ruling in a similar case in which the jury's verdict was vacated.

The decision was based on a ruling in August by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, that essentially exonerates employees who provide so-called honest services while keeping with corporate goals and do not rob their employers of any money.

"We are very pleased," Mr. Howard's lawyer, Jack Zimmerman, said.

The first trial against Mr. Howard lasted three months in 2005 and ended in a hung jury. He was tried along with five other Broadband employees. His conviction on five charges of conspiracy and fraud occurred during a retrial last year.

His only co-defendant in the second trial was Michael W. Krautz, Enron Broadband's former accountant, who was acquitted of all charges because the jury contended he was only following orders.

In a 19-page decision filed on Wednesday, Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court said her ruling matched the Fifth Circuit's in another Enron fraud case involving Merrill Lynch and Nigerian barges.

DOJ_NMG_0125315

In that case, the appeals court overturned several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage firm in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets.

The court said the government did not prove that defendants had deprived the company of "honest services."

Federal prosecutors had conceded that four of the five convictions against Mr. Howard should be dropped because of the Fifth Circuit's opinion but held that the fifth, for falsifying records, should stand. The judge disagreed because the jury could have relied on the convictions on the other counts to determine his guilt on the final charge.

"Kevin's a very happy man," Mr. Zimmerman said. "We've always told him to have faith in the legal system."

The government can now either accept the ruling, appeal or retry Mr. Howard a third time using a different argument.

"I've learned a long time ago not to anticipate what the government will do," Mr. Zimmerman said.

A spokesmen for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra said, "We are reviewing our options," but declined to comment further.

Two former Enron Broadband executives, Kenneth Rice and Kevin Hannon, pleaded guilty in 2004 and testified in both of Mr. Howard's trials. They are awaiting sentencing.

Mr. Howard's co-defendants in the first trial — Joseph Hirko, F. Scott Yeager and Rex Shelby — are awaiting retrial.

Mr. Shelby's lawyer, Edwin Tomko, said that while he was pleased with today's decision, "It doesn't really help us because our cases have nothing in common."

As in Mr. Yeager's and Mr. Hirko's cases, the charges against Mr. Shelby include securities fraud, which cannot be defined as "honest services."

New Blow To A Law Firm Under Inquiry (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

A few years before he faked the theft of two works of art from his home in Brentwood, Calif., Steven G. Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist, received a personal check from a partner of the law firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad for $175,000 as an "option payment" on one of those works, Picasso's "Nude Before a Mirror."

But court documents filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles yesterday said the check was a secret payment made to Mr. Cooperman for acting as a named plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit filed by Milberg Weiss.

The government's agreement with Mr. Cooperman, contained in the documents, in which he agreed to plea guilty to a conspiracy charge, is another blow to Milberg Weiss. The law firm was indicted along with two of its partners last year by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles on charges that it participated in a scheme to make secret payments to numerous plaintiffs.

Mr. Cooperman's plea deal is the latest move by federal prosecutors, who have spent seven years investigating the firm and its tactics. Last year, another former Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, pleaded guilty to making a false declaration to a court in connection with secret payments he received from the firm, court filings state.

Still, prosecutors have been unable to bring charges against their primary targets: Milberg's co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, and William S. Lerach, who started his own firm on the West Coast in 2004. People close to the investigation say the two men are identified as "Partner A" and "Partner B," respectively, in court documents.

Mr. Cooperman, however, is a challenging witness for prosecutors. Convicted of insurance fraud in the staged theft of the artworks, Mr. Cooperman cut a deal with prosecutors in 1999, agreeing to provide them information on Milberg Weiss.

While serving a 30-month prison sentence, Mr. Cooperman committed additional crimes, which breached his cooperation agreement, the plea agreement states.

In an e-mailed statement, a lawyer for Milberg Weiss, William W. Taylor III, said Mr. Cooperman's allegations were not new and "have never been credible."

"Rewarding any witness for 'cooperation' is inherently suspect," Mr. Taylor's statement said. "To do so twice, and in the face of crimes he committed blatantly from prison, demonstrates the lack of substance and inherent unfairness of the allegations against the firm."

According to court filings, Mr. Cooperman received $6.4 million in payments from 1988 to 1999 for serving as a named plaintiff in about 70 class-action and shareholder derivative lawsuits that netted Milberg Weiss more than $133 million in fees.

To conceal the illegal kickbacks, the firm and many of its partners, according to prosecutors, made false and misleading statements in various court documents and often made payments in cash through Mr. Cooperman's lawyers.

In one case, however, Mr. Cooperman's secret payment was disguised as a false "option payment" made by "Partner A," on the Picasso "Nude Before a Mirror," court filings say. In a series of transactions involving Mr. Cooperman's brother-in-law, much of the $175,000 payment was returned to Partner A, while other payments were made to Mr. Cooperman.

A lawyer for Mr. Weiss, Benjamin Brafman, rejected any allegations of wrongdoing by his client and declared the art option agreement "100 percent legitimate," noting that Mr. Weiss is an active collector of Picasso paintings.

"He changed his mind about the painting and it's that simple," Mr. Brafman said. "It has absolutely nothing to do with the allegations in the case."

Former Lead Plaintiff's Guilty Plea May Spell Trouble For Lawyer Lerach (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 1, 2007

Superstar plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach has remained outside the reach of investigators looking at a kickback scheme at his former firm, Milberg Weiss, but a guilty plea in the case on Wednesday might change that.

Steven Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist previously convicted of insurance fraud, admitted to taking payments for serving as lead plaintiff in class actions filed by Milberg Weiss over 12 years.

Court documents filed Wednesday detail Cooperman's role and also appear to put "Partner B," long believed to be Lerach, at the heart of the lucrative kickback scheme.

Though the charging documents don't identify Lerach by name, one source close to the investigation said Wednesday, "If you look at it, there's an awful lot of facts in there about Bill Lerach."

That Cooperman has helped prosecutors build their case against Milberg Weiss is nothing new. He has been cooperating since its beginning. In fact, he's the one who first told prosecutors about the kickbacks and fingered Lerach.

The problem for the U.S. Attorney's Office has been that Cooperman has a major credibility problem. He offered to cooperate in the Milberg investigation only after he was convicted and sent to prison for orchestrating an insurance scam by claiming some fine art in his Beverly Hills home had been stolen. Because of his past, anything Cooperman could say in trial about Lerach, or anyone else linked to Milberg Weiss, could look like an attempt to escape another stint in the slammer.

But on Wednesday, Cooperman's credibility may have become less of a problem. His plea -- to conspiring with Milberg Weiss and several of its senior partners to obstruct justice and make false statements in class actions -- shows that he's not cutting a deal to get off entirely scot-free.

With the plea, he faces up to five years in prison, with three years of supervised release, plus a fine of either $250,000 or twice the amount he gained in the Milberg scheme.

Generally, a plea deal by a witness with baggage can help the government, but only if prosecutors can independently corroborate the testimony, said Jeffrey Bornstein, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney.

"Why should a jury believe a witness who admits as part of his guilty plea that he lies under oath in other proceedings?" said Bornstein, a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Preston Gates Ellis.

While Cooperman's credibility may remain questionable, the detailed allegations introduced Wednesday in a 50-page charging document in U.S. v. Cooperman, CR 06-776(A), suggest prosecutors are closing in on Lerach.

Court documents filed in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California Wednesday are rife with details about the role "Partner B" played in the alleged kickback scheme at Milberg Weiss. Among other things, prosecutors claim that "Partner B" directly paid Cooperman in cash to conceal the scheme.

COOPERMAN COOPERATES

Cooperman first agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors in August 2000 after he was found guilty of 18 federal charges in the insurance fraud case. But, while serving time for the insurance fraud convictions, Cooperman committed unspecified "additional crimes" that breached his cooperation agreement with prosecutors, according to a release from the Central District U.S. Attorney's Office.

Cooperman's attorney, Russell Gioiella, of New York's Litman, Asche & Gioiella, confirmed Wednesday that his client was nailed by prosecutors for forging his doctors' signatures on health insurance forms while in prison for the fraud convictions.

"It was an error in judgment, but he didn't intend to or cause any financial harm to anyone," Gioiella said.

Though Cooperman's guilty plea has no explicit cooperation provision, Gioiella said his client will continue to cooperate if asked by prosecutors.

"He's been 100 percent truthful with the government as to Milberg Weiss," Gioiella said. "Nothing has changed in that respect."

Not everyone agrees that Cooperman's plea deal helps federal prosecutors in their case against Milberg.

Joseph Russoniello, who was a U.S. Attorney for eight years until 1990, said the deal might just cause more problems for the government.

"It's kind of a two-edged sword in many ways," said Cooley Godward Kronish's Russoniello. "The conviction puts the onus on a cooperating defendant to be very open, forthcoming and obviously honest, because any perjury or false statements can significantly jeopardize how the court would view [his] cooperation.

"What it does do," he continued, "is it may remove one incentive to give false testimony -- that is, to avoid prosecution -- and substitute a second motive or bias, which is to avoid a long jail term."

Cooperman isn't the first former lead plaintiff tied to Milberg Weiss to plead guilty in the conspiracy probe. Howard Vogel, a retired mortgage broker from Florida, entered a guilty plea last April, just one month before federal prosecutors in Los Angeles indicted the Milberg firm and partner David Bershad and former partner Steven Shulman.

SEC Aggressively Pursuing Options Cases, Chairman Says (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Securities and Exchange Commission's investigations of suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies are proceeding vigorously and the agency continues to work closely with federal prosecutors in pursuing cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said Wednesday.

He also said there is no disagreement among him and the four other SEC commissioners over how stringently to penalize companies found to have engaged in improper backdating of grants to executives. Cox was responding to questions about a news report that said the agency's enforcement efforts were stalled because of dissension among the commissioners over whether companies should be fined.

In addition, he said, the SEC is working ``very closely" with the Justice Department in pursuing stock options cases.

The federal prosecutors and the SEC have filed criminal and civil charges, respectively, against former officials of two technology companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc.

Some observers have criticized the pace of the enforcement effort.

SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors.

At issue in many of the investigations is a practice known as backdating: Stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price. This fattens profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can violate federal accounting and tax laws.

Dell Chief Is Replaced By Founder (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Michael S. Dell has taken back the leadership of the computer company he founded, replacing Kevin B. Rollins after more than a year of mounting problems at Dell.

The company announced yesterday that Mr. Rollins had resigned as chief executive and as a director. Mr. Dell, who is the chairman, immediately assumed Mr. Rollins's duties as well.

The company presented the change, which had been speculated about by Wall Street analysts and industry insiders for more than a year, as a decision by the board, which met earlier this week. Sam Nunn, the former Georgia senator who is the presiding director of Dell's board, was quoted in a company release as saying: "The board believes that Michael's vision and leadership are critical to building Dell's leadership in the technology industry for the long term."

The company also said that it expected fourth-quarter revenue and earnings to fall below the consensus predictions on Wall Street. That was also not an unexpected announcement after industry analysts said several weeks ago that other PC makers had strong sales in the fourth quarter, while Dell's sales lagged.

Mr. Rollins is not entitled to severance or a pension plan. Still, he will walk away with stock options worth about $30 million that he earned during his tenure, according to earlier company filings. According to Equilar, which analyzes executive pay, Mr. Rollins earned $42 million in total direct compensation as the chief executive. A Dell spokeswoman said Mr. Rollins's departure agreement had not yet been completed.

Mr. Dell and Mr. Rollins had a close relationship, sharing an office at company headquarters in Round Rock, Tex., even after Mr. Dell turned over the chief executive job to Mr. Rollins in 2004. Mr. Rollins joined the company 10 years ago as Mr. Dell's top lieutenant and had served as a consultant to Mr. Dell for three years before that.

The question of how long Mr. Rollins would remain in the top job was asked frequently after Dell began disclosing problems, beginning in late 2005. They included slowing revenue growth and, last year, accounting problems that have spurred investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

Mr. Rollins's departure "is an expression of dissatisfaction with the current status of the company and its rate of change," said A. M. Sacconaghi, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. Wall Street seemed to applaud the news, pushing the company's shares up 3.88 percent, to $25.16, in after-hours trading.

Mr. Dell, who founded the company in 1984, had stood steadfastly by Mr. Rollins. During a company technology conference in New York City in September, he said, "Kevin and I run the business together, so if you want to blame somebody you can blame me, too. But, more importantly, we believe we have a very strong team in our company. Kevin is obviously a key part of that, as am I." He added that speculation about changes at the top of the company was useless, "but feel free to speculate, because everyone else does, but it's not going to happen."

In a brief interview yesterday after the news was announced, Mr. Dell refused to comment on what had changed, and he declined to reflect on the long relationship he had had with Mr. Rollins.

Mr. Dell said he was excited about coming back to run the company. "It feels like 1984 and I am starting over again," he said. "Only this time I have a little more capital."

Mr. Dell said that he intended to push the company to do more in the business of providing consulting services to its larger corporate customers. Services are a high-margin business, but the sector is currently dominated by I.B.M. and business consultants like Electronic Data Systems. Hewlett-Packard, Dell's biggest rival in the computer business, has recently revamped its services business because it sees it as an important way to sell more hardware and software. Dell recently hired Stephen F. Schuckenbrock, an E.D.S. executive, to head its services business.

According to IDC, a market analysis firm, Hewlett-Packard's worldwide share of the PC market increased to 18.1 percent in the fourth quarter, from 15.9 percent a year ago, while Dell's share slipped to 14.7 percent, from 17.5 percent.

“Consulting and outsourcing would be a departure for Dell,” Mr. Sacconaghi said. But he added that it could make sense “to grow the part of the company that has twice the profit margins of the rest of the business.”

Mr. Dell did not rule out the possibility that the company would be willing to re-examine its direct-sales business model, which he developed to build the company. “It is an interesting question,” he said. “That’s where you’ll see new ideas and some experiments.”

The company recently opened two mall storefronts where Dell products are displayed. The stores do not carry inventory; products are ordered there or online for delivery later.

While the consumer market makes up only about 15 percent of Dell’s overall global business, consumer sales, particularly notebook sales in the United States, have been the strongest segment of the PC industry, growing well over 50 percent in 2006. Dell has not been particularly strong in that segment, hurting its profits.

Samir Bhavnani, research director at the electronics industry analysis firm Current Analysis, blamed Mr. Rollins for missing the industry shift to more distinctive industrial design and for cutting back customer service. The company has made a concerted effort in the last year to fix both problems.

The company “is well positioned to right the ship,” Mr. Bhavnani said.

Dell's Founder Replaces Rollins As Chief Executive (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, February 1, 2007

Jan. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Dell Inc. Chairman and founder Michael Dell reclaimed the position of chief executive officer, ousting Kevin Rollins after he lost the lead in personal computers and failed to revive earnings growth.

The shares rose 4.3 percent after the Round Rock, Texas- based company said Rollins, 54, resigned effective immediately. The decision to replace him was made earlier this week, said spokesman Bob Pearson, declining to be more specific.

The PC maker said results will miss analysts' estimates for the third time in the past four quarters. Dell already replaced his finance chief and takes over as the company struggles to regain its position as the world's largest PC maker from Hewlett-Packard Co. and faces a government probe into its accounting.

``It's a pretty big surprise," said Robert Lutts, president of Cabot Money Management in Salem, Massachusetts. ``They are going through some growing pains. Him coming back in might reinvigorate the company."

Shares of Dell rose $1.04 to $25.26 in extended Nasdaq Stock Market trading. They slipped 7 cents to $24.22 at 4 p.m. today and have declined 17 percent in the past year.

`Outstanding Executive'

Dell, 41, handed the CEO title to Rollins in 2004 after building the company from his college dorm room with $1,000. He defended Rollins's leadership in recent months as the company's woes mounted, saying in September that the two ran Dell together. He described Rollins as an ``outstanding executive" then.

``We've always been a company able to respond to challenges and opportunities," Dell said in prepared video remarks from the company's headquarters today. ``I'm very excited to be CEO again. I feel the same kind of energy and drive I did when we started the company in 1984."

The company said in August that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission had been reviewing its revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. That review was elevated into a formal investigation in November. The U.S. Justice Department is also probing the company's accounting.

Last year, Dell missed profit forecasts for two straight quarters, reported its slowest sales growth in four years, announced the recall of 4.1 million notebook batteries and said it planned to invest $150 million to improve customer service.

Dell 2.0

In September, Rollins and Dell, after canceling an annual meeting for financial analysts, announced Dell 2.0, their plan to examine all aspects of the business and make whatever changes necessary to boost sales and profit.

``Dell 2.0 is a chance for our company to reinvent itself," Dell said. ``We have enormous assets in this company. Some of them have been hidden fairly recently -- our challenge is to bring them out."

Dell didn't provide any figures for fourth-quarter profit or sales. Analysts on average anticipated a profit of 33 cents a share on sales of $15.5 billion, according to estimates in a Bloomberg survey.

Rollins joined Dell in April 1996 after working with the company as a consultant with Bain & Co. He helped extend the direct strategy Dell pioneered in 1984, based on selling lower- priced PCs to consumers by bypassing retailers and distributors.

Dell and Rollins, who shared an office suite at the company's headquarters, streamlined production and manufacturing to be able to undercut rivals on price.

Eroding Advantages

That price advantage has eroded in the past two years as Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard adopted some of the same cost-cutting measures used by Dell to lower prices.

In the third and fourth quarter, Hewlett-Packard claimed the top spot in the PC market by tapping its retail partners to help sell low-priced notebooks to U.S. consumers.

``What changes to the strategy Michael makes is more important than him being completely in charge," said Nirav Parikh, an analyst with Los Angeles-based TCW Group Inc., which has been reducing its holdings in Dell share since last year. ``The first thing to address is profitable growth."

Rollins's departure caps a series of management changes and follows the December departure of Chief Financial Officer James Schneider, a 10-year Dell veteran. In December, the company hired a head of global services to expand one of its fastest-growing businesses and added a new chief of online sales to boost Internet orders.

This month, Dell promoted two executives to run its U.S. corporate and public sales groups after Joseph Mareng announced his retirement after a decade with the company.

``The company kind of continues to muddle along and there hasn't been a clear plan outlined," said Christopher Meeker, analyst and portfolio manager at Farr Miller & Washington LLC in Washington, which owns 350,000 Dell shares. ``We don't think it can return to the growth rates it used to have."

Sonsini Advised On Apple Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 1, 2007

When Apple Inc. tried to hammer out a new compensation agreement for iconic CEO Steve Jobs in 2001 -- an agreement now being probed by federal prosecutors -- the company called on Larry Sonsini, the lead partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

People with knowledge of the federal probe say the lawyer -- an expert on corporate governance -- was consulted by Apple's board and legal department on a 7.5 million-share grant that's become the core of the criminal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission and San Francisco U.S. attorney's office.

Investigators have focused on the grant because a set of falsified meeting minutes was drawn up to make it appear as though the options were granted at an earlier date -- and a more favorable price -- than when the deal was actually finalized. The minutes were fabricated by a low-ranking in-house Apple lawyer, though prosecutors also have been looking over her head -- at ex-GC Nancy Heinen and Apple's former CFO, Fred Anderson.

According to people with knowledge of the investigation, Heinen discussed the options award with Sonsini between its approval by the company's board of directors and her department's completion of the paperwork.

Through a spokesperson, Sonsini declined to comment Wednesday, and people familiar with the probe wouldn't discuss what he told the lawyers at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation.

It's unclear how much Sonsini knew about the grant, including how it was accounted for.

But for the second time in less than a year, a high-profile Silicon Valley scandal may turn on questions about the advice Sonsini did -- or didn't -- give. Just as in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom spying scandal, company officials may point to Sonsini's counsel to explain or defend their actions.

Heinen, for example, is in a position to argue that her department's role in the problematic award came on orders from the board of directors -- and perhaps Sonsini.

Such a defense would be a logical one for someone in Heinen's position, said Peter Henning, professor at Wayne State University Law School and an expert on white-collar crime. Blaming input from Sonsini and Apple's board could dissipate blame that might otherwise fall on Heinen's shoulders.

She could argue, Henning speculated, that "'I didn't intend to defraud or intend to violate any of the accounting rules because I was told this by the outside lawyer.'"

STEVE NEEDED TO GET PAID

Jobs' compensation was a prickly issue for Apple in 2000. Since he rejoined the floundering company as a director and interim CEO in 1997, Jobs had received only his $1 a year salary. The rest of the company's directors received option grants, but Jobs, a company employee, was ineligible.

After Jobs decided at the end of 1999 to remain as chief executive, the board formed a special CEO compensation committee to award him a big chunk of options. In January 2000, that award was finalized as a 10,000,000-share grant, but a year later, Apple's sinking share price had killed the value of those options. Jobs and the board discussed ways to work out a new, lucrative package.

Relatively new accounting rules made the most logical option -- repricing the 2000 grant -- unattractive to Apple's balance sheet. So Jobs and the board negotiated the size and price of a new options grant, and Sonsini was called to facilitate.

While Sonsini was representing the board as it negotiated with Jobs, the relationships involved were, like so many in Silicon Valley, rather tangled.

Sonsini was close with Jobs, and Apple's board increasingly turned to the lawyer for advice after Jobs returned to the company in 1997, according to a person with knowledge of Apple's situation at the time.

Sonsini's firm also had well-established business relationships with the companies run by at least three of Apple's five independent board members.

SEC filings show that Wilson Sonsini did work for Intuit, where director William Campbell was CEO, and Genentech, where board member Arthur Levinson was CEO and chairman. And according to the firm's Web site, Wilson Sonsini also provided legal services for The Gap, where director Millard Drexler was CEO.

After months of negotiations, the Apple board and Jobs finally agreed in December of 2001 on a grant of 7.5 million option shares, priced at $18.30.

LARRY HAS THE ANSWERS

That Sonsini would be consulted on a big CEO compensation issue is of little surprise to Valley insiders. He was counsel of choice for the boards of several large tech firms and was frequently called upon to resolve tense situations.

Sonsini was a central figure in the HP boardroom conflagration last fall. He'd been consulted when director Thomas Perkins quit to protest tactics used to investigate board leaks to the media.

Sonsini spent five hours in front of Congress last year, and was asked repeatedly why he hadn't advised the company that its use of "pretexting" may have violated the law. Instead, he told Perkins that the investigation appeared to be "well done and within legal limits."

Sonsini explained that his statement was based on legal advice from an outside lawyer representing the company that did the pretexting, and from HP's in-house lawyers.

Though he caught lots of flak for not spotting what turned out to be the key legal issue, he wasn't accused of violating the law.

The Apple case seems to be shaping up in a similar fashion: No one is accusing Sonsini of acting illegally, but people with knowledge of the investigation said that firm billing records and interviews reviewed through Apple's own probe of its options problems make it clear that he was called upon to deal with the sensitive matter of issuing options to the CEO.

KNOWN QUANTITIES

While there may be gaping questions about Sonsini's knowledge of the Apple grant, what's clear is that even in 2001, his firm was aware of the perils of misdating options -- and also of some companies' desire to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0125322

In early 2001, another company, KLA-Tencor, was discussing a large award for a top executive. Questions arose about how the grant would be dated, and that company's general counsel contacted the firm's outside lawyers.

According to several people familiar with KLA's situation, when Wilson partners Bret DiMarco and Roger Stern were asked about the prospect of backdating grants, they sent a very clear message: Don't.

The lawyers told KLA in writing that misdating grants without properly expensing them could lead to major complications, including financial restatements.

Like Apple's, the KLA grants are the subject of an ongoing federal criminal investigation.

Reached Wednesday, DiMarco, who has since left the firm to join the tech firm Coherent, said he couldn't talk about the KLA situation.

Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman Courtney Dorman said she couldn't discuss KLA. As for Apple, she said Wilson continues to have a business relationship with the company.

Over the past few weeks, the federal investigation has slowed somewhat because the lead prosecutor, Christopher Steskal, is preparing to leave the U.S. Attorney's Office for Fenwick & West. And there's further uncertainty because U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan is on his way out of the office, and the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- Ryan's second-in-command, Eumi Choi -- has been sending her resume to law firms.

The case was recently reassigned to Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Crudo, and people involved in the case said they expect an uptick in activity over the next few weeks.

Nacchio Settles Pension Lawsuit For $1.5 Million (RMN)

By Jeff Smith, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, February 1, 2007

Former Qwest Chief Executive Joe Nacchio has agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a fraud lawsuit filed by one of the country's largest pension funds.

Nacchio's deal - part of a $46.5 million settlement paid to the California State Teachers' Retirement System - is believed to be the largest he's agreed to make with regard to his alleged misdeeds at the Denver telco.

Qwest, several investment banks and former auditor Arthur Andersen will collectively pay about $45 million to settle the suit, filed in December 2002 by CalSTRS.

The settlement was finalized in early January, but terms of the deal weren't disclosed until Wednesday. The case was filed in San Francisco Superior Court.

Nacchio's attorney Herbert Stern couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

In 2003, Nacchio paid $400,000 to two law schools to settle charges by New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that Nacchio improperly made more than $1 million from lucrative initial public offerings provided by Citigroup's Salomon Smith Barney brokerage.

Nacchio still faces securities fraud allegations in a federal class-action case, civil fraud charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 42 insider trading counts filed by the Justice Department. He is scheduled to go on trial in Denver on the insider trading charges March 19. He has denied wrongdoing.

Jack Ehnes, CEO of CalSTRS, said the settlement gave members an estimated 30 times more than they would have received if the group had participated in the federal $400 million class-action securities fraud settlement with Qwest.

Ehnes said CalSTRS, which alleged Qwest misled investors, decided to pursue its case separately not only to recover more of its estimated $150 million in losses but "to reinforce our commitment to good corporate governance."

Qwest spokesman Bob Toevs said the company is "pleased to have the matter behind us."

2 Senators Renew Attacks On S.E.C. Hedge Fund Investigation (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

DOJ_NMG_0125323

Two prominent Republican senators renewed their criticism yesterday of the way the Securities and Exchange Commission carried out its investigation into a major hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

In separate speeches on the Senate floor, the senators, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, said the S.E.C. — which filed no charges against Pequot — had failed to aggressively follow up on investigative leads developed by the lawyer who led the inquiry, Gary J. Aguirre.

Both senators said their statements reflected the findings of an interim report, which is expected to be released today, on their investigation of the S.E.C.'s conduct in the case.

The hedge fund came under regulatory scrutiny in late 2004 when Mr. Aguirre began investigating several profitable trades made by Pequot in advance of mergers or other market-moving news. The Pequot trades were flagged by stock exchange surveillance teams and forwarded to the commission.

The S.E.C. fired Mr. Aguirre in September 2005 after he complained that his investigation had been derailed by outside political influence.

"The S.E.C. should have taken Mr. Aguirre's allegations seriously," Mr. Grassley said. "Instead, it circled the wagons and shot the whistle-blower — an all-too-familiar practice in Washington."

Mr. Specter called on the S.E.C. to reopen its investigation of Pequot, citing what he called "conclusive proof" that political considerations had figured in the agency's decision to delay taking the testimony of an influential Wall Street executive, John J. Mack. The commission did eventually interview Mr. Mack, but only after Mr. Aguirre criticized it in letters to Congress.

"The overwhelming evidence in the matter showed that the testimony should have been taken at a much earlier stage," Mr. Specter said.

The S.E.C. closed its investigation without filing any charges against Mr. Mack or anyone else connected with the Pequot matter.

An S.E.C. spokesman, John Nester, said he had not yet had the chance to read the interim report, but he said the commission would "carefully consider the report's findings and recommendations." Mr. Nester said the commission had cooperated fully with Congressional investigations, a statement echoed by Mr. Grassley.

The S.E.C.'s investigation "was plagued with problems from its beginning to its abrupt conclusion," Mr. Grassley said. "The termination of Mr. Aguirre by the S.E.C. was highly suspect given the timing and circumstances."

Both senators had particularly harsh words for the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik. Mr. Specter said that in all his years in the Senate he could not recall "an I.G. who said less, did less and was thoroughly inadequate in the investigation."

He mocked what he said was the inspector general's defense — that it was not his responsibility to second-guess certain S.E.C. decisions. "Well, that's the purpose of having an I.G.," Senator Specter said.

Mr. Stachnik declined to comment last night.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jurors May Hear Libby Grand Jury Testimony (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald appears to be saving NBC newsman Tim Russert as his last witness in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

In the meantime, Fitzgerald may let Libby himself do the talking.

Fitzgerald has said he plans to play excerpts from Libby's grand jury testimony at trial, and the government's next witness, FBI agent Deborah Bond, appears to be Fitzgerald's opportunity. That would give jurors the chance to hear for themselves the testimony that Fitzgerald says is a lie and that Libby says is a product of faulty memory.

The perjury and obstruction trial hinges on whether Libby lied about his conversations with reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Fitzgerald spent the first week of the trial presenting witnesses who said they talked to Libby about Plame, the wife of prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson. Some witnesses, such as officials from the CIA and State Department, said they told Libby about Plame.

Others, such as former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer and journalists Judith Miller and Matthew Cooper, said Libby talked about Plame to them.

Those witnesses undercut Libby's claim that he didn't remember learning about Plame through official channels and was surprised to hear about her during a much later conversation with Russert. Any conversations he had about Plame, Libby said, were just recollections of what he heard from Russert.

Fitzgerald contends Libby concocted that story to avoid embarrassment, prosecution and possibly losing his job.

Libby, ex-chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is on trial on charges he lied to the FBI and a grand jury about his conversations with reporters about Plame and obstructed the investigation into how her identity leaked to the public in 2003. No one has been charged with the actual leak.

Fitzgerald believes jurors should hear and see Libby's words for themselves. He successfully fought to allow into evidence Libby's full grand jury testimony -- the sworn statements he gave prosecutors during the investigation -- and the prosecutor played a brief clip during his opening statement.

Fitzgerald says he expects to call Russert to testify on Monday or Tuesday, a plan that would make the well-known journalist the last witness jurors hear before the government rests its case. Russert says he did not discuss Plame with Libby, a recollection that is directly at odds with the former aide's testimony.

Defense attorneys say Libby will be his own star witness and will explain to the jury that he was preoccupied with national security issues and simply forgot about his conversations regarding Plame. Attorneys also have indicated they'll call Cheney to testify.

Libby Lawyers Seize On Miller Hesitation (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged Wednesday that she had conversations with other government officials and could not be "absolutely, absolutely certain" that she first heard about an outed CIA official from I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Libby's attorneys seized on the hesitation and tried to portray Miller as someone who selectively remembers some conversations and not others.

Miller is a crucial witness against Libby in his perjury and obstruction trial. She says she had two conversations about CIA operative Valerie Plame in mid-2003 with Libby, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff. Those conversations are at the heart of the trial because they allegedly occurred well before Libby says he learned Plame's identity from another reporter.

Libby's defense strategy revolves around showing jurors that he didn't lie about his conversations with Miller and others, but simply forgot them. If defense attorneys can cast doubt on Miller's memory and her story, it would bolster Libby's case.

During a sometimes heated cross-examination Wednesday, defense attorneys pressed Miller to acknowledge that she might have heard about Plame elsewhere. In mid-2003, Miller was investigating allegations by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that the Bush administration ignored certain prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Attorney William Jeffress asked Miller to recall the other government officials she spoke to and explain how Wilson's name and phone number got into her notebook prior to the conversation with Libby.

"I don't remember their names. I don't know what you want me to say beyond that," Miller said, adding moments later, "I know I had several conversations but there is no reference to them in my notebook and I have no independent recollection."

Jeffress persisted, showing Miller excerpts from her grand jury testimony in which she said her conversation with Libby was "among the first times" she heard about Plame but couldn't be certain it was the first.

"You're not absolutely certain you first heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the CIA from Mr. Libby?" Jeffress asked.

"I can't be absolutely, absolutely certain, but I have no recollection of an earlier conversation with anyone else," Miller replied.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's case began as an investigation into who leaked Plame's name to reporters at a time when her husband was criticizing the administration. Three years later, nobody has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of obstructing the case and lying to investigators.

Libby's attorneys said Wednesday that they want to know more about another Fitzgerald case involving Miller. Fitzgerald has sought to get Miller's phone records in an investigation into who leaked the details about an investigation into an Islamic charity.

Theodore Wells, another of Libby's attorneys, said he wants to know more about conversations between Miller and Fitzgerald in that case. If Miller feared prosecution in that case, Wells said, it could motivate her to cooperate in Libby's case and thus cast doubt on her testimony.

Journalism organizations have decried this trial, which could see 10 reporters become witnesses. Fitzgerald intends to call Matthew Cooper of Time and NBC's Tim Russert. Jeffress has said that up to seven reporters are on his witness list.

Former Times Reporter Testimony Is Challenged (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — A former reporter for The New York Times jousted for nearly two hours on Wednesday with a lawyer for I. Lewis Libby Jr. over her credibility and memory.

They argued over the significantly damaging testimony that the reporter, Judith Miller, had given about three conversations she had with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, who is facing perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

Ms. Miller testified on Tuesday that Mr. Libby had told her in those conversations details about the identity of Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative, days before Mr. Libby said he learned about Ms. Wilson from reporters.

William H. Jeffress Jr., the lawyer for Mr. Libby, asked Ms. Miller what other officials she had spoken with about Ms. Wilson.

"I remember having conversations, sir," she said, casting quick glances at the jury and at her lawyers sitting in the back of the courtroom. But she said she could not remember talking to anybody else about Ms. Wilson, who is also known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame.

Mr. Jeffress then showed a video clip of a television interview with Ms. Miller from Jan. 8, 2006. In the clip, she said she had discussions with "senior government officials and some not-so-senior government officials" about Ms. Wilson and her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who wrote an op-ed article, published July 6, 2003, in The New York Times, accusing the Bush administration of distorting intelligence about Iraq's efforts to buy uranium in Africa to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Jeffress also cited an affidavit making a similar assertion that Ms. Miller filed with the court before she went to jail for 85 days after initially refusing to testify before a grand jury.

"Who were these senior government officials?" Mr. Jeffress asked.

Ms. Miller replied, "I was not talking about Joe Wilson," adding, "I was using Joe Wilson as a shorthand" for questions about whether Iraq had tried to buy uranium in Africa.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak of Ms. Wilson's name to reporters.

Pressed by Mr. Jeffress about the conflict between her testimony on Wednesday and the interview and the affidavit, Ms. Miller, who was combative and testy at times, replied: "I don't know what you want me to say beyond what I've said. I don't remember the people I talked to" about the Wilsons.

"That's all I can tell you, sir," she added.

Asked again about such conversations, she said with exasperation: "I just don't remember," then added in a loud voice, "I don't remember."

After Mr. Jeffress concluded his questioning, Ms. Miller regained her composure as she answered more questions, which came from the jury because Judge Reggie M. Walton had allowed jurors to submit written questions.

One juror wanted to know why Ms. Miller had chosen to go to jail. She said it was because of her deeply held principles that journalists should be allowed to protect their sources in order to report on issues government officials hoped to conceal.

She was followed to the witness stand by Matthew Cooper, a former Time magazine reporter who, unlike Ms. Miller, avoided going to jail by agreeing earlier to testify to the grand jury.

Mr. Cooper testified Wednesday that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson during a telephone interview on July 12. He also recounted how he first learned about Ms. Wilson on July 11 from Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist.

He said that Mr. Rove told him to be wary of Mr. Wilson's criticisms in The Times. "Don't go too far out on Wilson," Mr. Cooper recalled Mr. Rove saying, warning him that Ms. Wilson worked at "the agency."

Mr. Cooper testified that when he spoke to Libby, he had heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A. He said that Mr. Libby responded, "I heard that too."

The trial hinges largely on whether the jury believes the prosecution account that Mr. Libby lied when he contended he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters and not from fellow administration officials.

The first six witnesses, present or former government officials, have testified that they had informed Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson. The two reporters, Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper, testified that Mr. Libby discussed the information with them.

Mr. Libby's defense is that many of the witnesses do not correctly remember what occurred. In addition, his lawyers are trying to make the case that if Mr. Libby gave inaccurate information to the grand jury and to investigators, it was merely a case of faulty memory.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said Wednesday he wanted to introduce evidence to explore one of the case's most intriguing mysteries: a note from Mr. Libby to Ms. Miller giving her permission to testify.

In the September 2005 note, Mr. Libby told Ms. Miller, who was in jail at the time, that she was no longer bound by her pledge of confidentiality and that she should testify before the grand jury. He added, cryptically, that the aspen trees in Colorado change color at the same time because they are bound at the roots.

Mr. Fitzgerald said Wednesday, while conferring with the judge while the jury was out of the room, that the note was an effort to persuade Ms. Miller to lie to the grand jury and back up Mr. Libby's story, saying it demonstrated Mr. Libby's "consciousness of guilt."

Judge Walton pointed out that Ms. Miller's testimony had not helped Mr. Libby, however, and had contributed to the indictment against him.

"We don't think that the letter worked," Mr. Fitzgerald said. "He told her what he wanted her to say."

Judge Walton deferred a decision on whether and when Mr. Fitzgerald could introduce the note to the jury.

Mr. Fitzgerald said he hoped to complete the prosecution's case by early next week, perhaps on Monday.

Two jurors from the original panel of 16 have had to be excused, meaning that if another 3 jurors leave, it would raise the likelihood of a mistrial. Judge Walton asked the jurors on Wednesday to please remain in good health.

Defense lawyers said Wednesday they had subpoenaed Jill Abramson, the managing editor of The Times, to appear as a witness. Ms. Miller testified Tuesday that she had a conversation with Ms. Abramson in July 2003 in which she suggested assigning someone to report on the issue of Mr. Wilson's report and what role, if any, Ms. Wilson played in sending him on the assignment to Africa.

Ms. Abramson has denied that account in an article published in The Times. The article examined Ms. Miller's behavior in the Libby story as well as her pre-war reporting that intelligence officials believed Iraq had amassed a stockpile of weapons of mass destruction.

Ex-Time Reporter Testifies In Libby Trial (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

A former Time magazine reporter said in court yesterday that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby confided that the wife of an Iraq war critic worked at the CIA, becoming the second journalist to testify that the vice president's then-chief of staff disclosed the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Matthew Cooper, the magazine's White House reporter in the summer of 2003, told jurors in Libby's perjury trial that President Bush's top political aide, Karl Rove, was the first administration official to privately tell him that former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV was married to a CIA officer. The next day, Cooper said, he asked Libby whether Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

According to Cooper, Libby said "words to the effect, 'Yeah, I've heard that, too,' " though Libby did not name her.

When Libby learned Plame's identity and what he did with that information are pivotal issues in the trial. During a federal investigation into the CIA leak, Libby told FBI agents and a grand jury that he found out about the CIA officer, whose husband was lashing out at the administration's use of Iraq intelligence, during a conversation on July 10, 2003, with NBC's Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert. Libby is charged with lying to investigators, committing perjury and obstructing the investigation.

Cooper is the third prosecution witness to say that Libby was actively spreading information about Wilson and his wife soon after he sought to learn who they were. It follows testimony yesterday and on Tuesday from former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who said Libby told her about Wilson's wife twice in the days and weeks before Vice President Cheney's right-hand man at the time contends he ever heard of Plame.

The pair's turn on the witness stand also provided an unflattering portrayal of how some of Washington's most prominent journalists work. If the testimony of half a dozen government officials earlier in the trial exposed infighting at the highest levels of the Bush administration, the testimony of Cooper and Miller exposed jurors -- and the public -- to the sloppy and incomplete note-taking of reporters, their inability to remember crucial interviews and, in Miller's case, important interview notes stuffed into a shopping bag under her desk.

Libby is the only person charged in the federal investigation into how Plame's name was disclosed to journalists, including Robert D. Novak, who revealed Plame's role and name in a syndicated column on July 14, 2003. Novak's column appeared eight days after Wilson published a stinging rebuke that accused the administration of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it tried to justify invading Iraq.

Libby is not charged with the leak itself. He has pleaded not guilty to five felony counts, contending that he innocently misremembered conversations with reporters because they were insignificant amid his work on critical national security matters.

Under questioning by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and cross-examination by defense attorney William Jeffress Jr., Cooper portrayed the revelations to him by Rove and Wilson as part of a strategy to disparage Wilson. In 2002, the former ambassador had been sent by the CIA to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium there for use in its nuclear weapons program. Wilson brought home his conclusion that those reports were unfounded.

Cooper testified that Rove cautioned him on July 11, 2003, not to "lionize" Wilson, because he actually had been sent on the mission by his wife.

The next day, a Saturday, Cooper was waiting for a call from Libby while he raced to finish reporting a story for that Monday's issue of Time. Cooper said he spent the morning at the Chevy Chase Club, where cellphones and BlackBerrys are not allowed, and repeatedly ran to the parking lot to see whether Libby had called. It was in the afternoon while Cooper was sprawled on his bed at home, he said, when Libby called his cellphone twice.

In the first call, he said, Libby read him a statement that Cooper said tried to distance Cheney's office from Wilson's trip and his conclusions. In the second, shorter, call a few minutes later, Cooper said, he slipped in the question about Wilson's wife. Cooper said he asked the question off the record, but nevertheless considered Libby's reply as confirmation. He said Libby also criticized the methods Wilson had used to investigate the uranium reports.

Responding to a question from Jeffress, Cooper acknowledged that he did not ask Libby any follow-up questions about how Libby had learned about Wilson's wife. He said that Libby did not identify her by name or say she worked in an undercover capacity. He said that he did not pursue the issue more deeply because Libby was rushing to end their conversation.

Jeffress sought to suggest that Cooper's memory -- as well as his note-taking -- was faulty and that he could have learned about Plame from his own colleague, former Time magazine reporter John Dickerson. Dickerson was covering a trip Bush took to Africa when White House press secretary Ari Fleischer shared information about Wilson's wife with him and another reporter, Fleischer testified earlier this week.

Also yesterday, Miller -- the former New York Times reporter who was jailed for 85 days after initially refusing to testify about her sources -- told jurors that she heard about Plame from other government officials, in addition to Libby. She said she could not remember who those officials were.

Miller told the jury she believes Libby was, in the summer of 2003, the first person to tell her that Plame worked at the CIA and was married to a critic of the Bush administration's Iraq policies. But she acknowledged: "I can't be absolutely, absolutely certain."

Reporter: Rove First To Leak CIA Info (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — White House adviser Karl Rove told a reporter that an administration critic's wife worked at the CIA, days before her name was made public, the reporter testified Wednesday.

Vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby then confirmed Valerie Plame's CIA status a day later during an "off-the-record" conversation, former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper said.

Cooper was the first prosecution witness in the 6-day-old trial to support a specific charge against Libby: that he lied when he told grand jurors he did not confirm Plame's identity when he talked to Cooper.

Libby is being tried for perjury and obstruction of justice during the investigation into who leaked the identity of Plame, a covert CIA operative. Revealing the identity of a classified government agent can be a federal crime.

Libby told investigators he first learned of Plame's identity on July 10, 2003, during a talk with NBC reporter Tim Russert. Seven previous prosecution witnesses have testified that they discussed Plame's CIA status with Libby days or weeks earlier.

In a July 11, 2003, telephone interview, Rove said "(former ambassador Joseph) Wilson's wife" worked in weapons of mass destruction at "the agency," Cooper testified.

Speaking to Libby a day later, Cooper asked whether he had heard rumors that "Wilson's wife" sent him to Africa to pursue a report that Iraq was seeking uranium there.

"Mr. Libby said words to the effect of 'yeah, I heard that too,' " Cooper testified. He said he "took that as confirmation" that Plame was a CIA officer. Time reported that, but only after syndicated columnist Robert Novak had published her name on July 14.

Wilson, a former State Department official, had charged the White House had wrongly claimed that Iraq sought uranium in Africa.

Libby's attorneys attacked Cooper's credibility during cross-examination. Cooper acknowledged that his notes of the Libby interview and a subsequent e-mail to his editors made no reference to Plame's CIA job.

Cooper also said he had not asked how Libby knew where Plame worked.

"I should have," said Cooper, now Washington editor of Portfolio, a magazine that makes its debut in April.

Asked by defense attorney William Jeffress, Cooper could not say why he left Libby's comment about Plame out of his notes.

"Isn't this consistent with the fact that (Libby's offhand comment) wasn't confirmation of anything?" Jeffress asked.

"It is my memory; it is what it is," Cooper answered. "I took it as confirmation."

Cooper said he at first declined to cooperate with prosecutors, relenting after Libby released him from a promise of confidentiality. Another witness, former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, spent 85 days in jail for refusing to testify.

Libby Trial Shows An Insular, Backbiting Washington (LAT)

By Greg Miller

WASHINGTON — With the Bush administration taking a pounding over erroneous prewar claims about Iraq in the summer of 2003, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff consulted his office's top communications advisor on how to strike back.

As they talked by phone, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby scribbled down a series of Machiavellian suggestions from Cheney's then-communications guru, Mary Matalin: What to do about MSNBC talk show host Chris Matthews and his steady barrage of Iraq war criticism? "Call Tim," Libby wrote, referring to Tim Russert of NBC News. "He hates Chris."

What to make of former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had emerged that summer to challenge the veracity of one of the administration's most alarming claims about Saddam Hussein's regime? "Wilson is a snake," Libby transcribed.

And how best to use the power of the White House to beat back the attacks? The president "should wave his wand," Matalin advised, and quickly declassify portions of intelligence reports that backed up the White House case for war.

Libby is the defendant in the case that brought this page of notes to light Wednesday — a case that centers on whether he lied to federal investigators looking into the leak of an undercover CIA operative's name.

But in many respects, it is the ugly mutual exploitation that goes on every day in Washington between powerful government officials and influential members of the media that is on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington.

Five days in, the trial has been dominated by testimony from two of the Bush administration's top media handlers — former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer and former Cheney communications director Catherine J. Martin — as well as two prominent Washington journalists.

Martin, in particular, offered in her testimony last week an unusually detailed description of how the White House seeks to manipulate the news media.

She described plans to leak stories to certain reporters, including the New York Times' David E. Sanger and the Washington Post's Walter Pincus; freeze out others, such as New York Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof; book administration officials on talk shows such as Russert's "Meet the Press"; and release bad news on weekends, when it was more likely to be ignored.

Neither side has fared well, with prosecutors accusing the administration of carrying out a smear campaign against Wilson, and defense attorneys scrutinizing everything from the sloppy note-taking practices to the murky ethical terrain of members of the media.

Even jurors seem somewhat appalled by the display. At one point, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton read aloud a question submitted by one member of the panel after former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified that she remembered details of a crucial meeting with Libby only after discovering a shopping bag full of notebooks under her desk.

"Is this the standard method you used for archiving?" the juror asked.

The trial has cast such a harsh light on the interplay between public officials and the press in part because federal prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald was unusually aggressive in challenging notions that members of the media should be able to protect their sources from public exposure. Miller agreed to testify only after she had spent 85 days in jail for refusing to divulge information on her sources.

The case has also provided a penetrating look into the strategies that top government officials employ to manipulate the media.

In his testimony, former Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper acknowledged that he had only recently started covering the White House when the CIA leak scandal erupted. Even so, he was quickly granted access to one of the most powerful figures in the Bush White House, political advisor Karl Rove, mainly because the administration was eager to discredit Wilson.

Recounting their conversation, Cooper said Rove cautioned him, "Don't get too far out on Wilson," meaning the credibility of Wilson's criticism, because "a number of things are going to be coming out" on him.

Pressed by Cooper, Rove added that Wilson had not been sent to Africa by Cheney to investigate whether Iraq was seeking to acquire uranium there. Instead, Cheney said it was Wilson's wife who had sent him and that "she worked on WMD at the agency."

"I took that to mean the CIA," Cooper quipped, "not the Environmental Protection Agency."

Some of the most revealing information has come during conferences when jurors are asked to leave the room. The notes that Libby scribbled during his conversation with Matalin, for example, were on a page that Judge Walton declined to be allowed as evidence because Libby hadn't called Wilson a "snake," he had only written down someone else's comments.

To show that to the jury, Walton said, would be "marginally probative but highly prejudicial."

Libby wrote the notes after a senior staff meeting at the White House during which Rove complained that the administration had been too slow in mobilizing a response to Wilson. The former envoy had written in a New York Times opinion piece that his trip to Africa had shown that Iraq wasn't seeking uranium there long before Bush included that claim in a State of the Union speech.

Perhaps on Matalin's advice, Libby went on to have a conversation with Russert, who is expected to testify in the coming days.

The trial has also reinforced stereotypes that reporters in Washington and the officials they cover are part of an elite crowd that has little in common with average readers.

Cooper said he followed up his conversation with Rove by arranging an interview with Libby, Cheney's chief of staff at the time. The logistics were complicated, Cooper said, because the day they were to talk he was swimming at a country club that doesn't permit cellphones. He said he "had to keep running out to the parking lot" to check his cellphone and electronic message device "to see when I was going to speak with Mr. Libby."

The trial has also offered jurors a primer on reporting tradecraft, with a great deal of testimony devoted to the various degrees of anonymity reporters grant sources in order to coax information from them. While discussing the differences between such terms as "background" and "off the record," Miller was asked how common it was for government officials to refuse to have their comments attributed to them by name.

Very common, she said, "particularly in this administration."

Jurors' Queries Yield Insights -- And Laughs (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller was on the witness stand yesterday and a juror wanted to know why she had decided to go to jail for 85 days before agreeing to testify about her conversations with I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Another juror had a different kind of question for Miller about a her notes from a conversation with Libby: Was storing notebooks in a large shopping bag under her desk her standard method for saving her notes?

So the jurors asked.

It is very unusual for jurors to be able to ask questions during court proceedings, but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is allowing it as Libby stands trial for allegedly lying to investigators who were trying to determine who leaked the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, criticized President Bush's war plans. The 12 jurors and three alternates get to write questions down and pass them to Walton, who reviews them with the attorneys and decides which ones he will ask on their behalf.

Some of the questions have been dead on, showing that the highly educated jurors -- who include an art curator, a retired math teacher and an international health policy adviser -- seem to home in on key evidence or testimony. Other questions have elicited new insights into witnesses' thinking, and still others have evoked a few laughs.

The whole practice has been controversial among attorneys on both sides -- worried about losing control of the points they hope to score with each witness's testimony -- who argue quietly with Walton at the bench over what can be asked.

In answer to yesterday's questions, Miller testified that she went to jail because she had given Libby a promise of confidentiality and that she had stored the notebook in a bag because she was planning to take it and other material home from her office.

Other witnesses have prompted other questions. Last week, several jurors were fixated on CIA briefer Craig Schmall's testimony about notes he had written on the margins of his June 14, 2003, briefing book, which included a reference to Wilson's wife working at the CIA when he briefed Libby on national security issues at Libby's home that Saturday morning.

"The handwritten information -- who would have written that?" Walton asked, reading from one juror's question card.

Schmall said he had written the notes.

"Were those your thoughts or someone else's?" another juror queried.

Schmall explained that he jotted down notes based on questions asked and comments made by the person he was briefing. In other words, the reason he had those notes was that Libby had said something about Wilson's wife -- testimony that supports prosecutors' arguments that Libby had known about Wilson's wife and was talking about her with government officials and reporters weeks before he said he believed he first learned her identity.

Sometimes the jurors' questions have produced as revealing look into a witness's concerns as any interrogation by the veteran lawyers in the courtroom.

For example, how did Vice President Cheney's press aide Cathie Martin deal with her concerns that Cheney had recommended that she cite what she believed was a top-secret document in her rebuttal of Wilson's criticisms?

"If you had concerns, why didn't you take any action?" one juror asked.

"Because the vice president of the United States had told me to say it," Martin responded. "I didn't know where I was going to go with that."

DOJ_NMG_0125332

Another juror asked Martin: "Have there been other opportunities that you thought reporters had not gotten all the facts right?"

"Yes!" Martin said, her eyes rolling. "Reporters often get things incorrect."

While the lawyers may prefer to control the questioning, Walton has told them that it is important for the jurors to be able to probe the things they want answered. He has allowed jurors in his courtroom to ask questions for several years, a rare practice that is slowly becoming more common among some judges.

About 15 percent of state courts and 8 percent of federal courts permit jury questions, and three states require that questions from jurors be allowed: Arizona, Colorado and Indiana.

Though he doesn't use the practice, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth sees some benefits: It can take more time, but jurors do not have to struggle needlessly about an unanswered question once they begin their deliberations.

"It can tell both sides that something is bothering a juror," Lamberth said, "and you don't want something to bother a juror."

Feds Prepare To Charge Ex-CIA Official, Contractor (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

Federal prosecutors are preparing to seek indictments against a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor at the center of the bribery scandal that sent former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

Two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press on Wednesday that prosecutors plan to ask a San Diego grand jury to return charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy against Kyle "Dusty" Foggo and his close friend, Brent Wilkes, whose lawyers have said he is one of four unidentified co-conspirators described in the 2005 plea agreement for Cunningham, a San Diego Republican.

Honest services fraud is a combination of mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals.

The officials said a second indictment is being prepared that would charge Wilkes and two of the other Cunningham co-conspirators - New York businessman Thomas Kontogiannis and his nephew, John T. Michael - with bribery and several conspiracy counts.

The officials spoke only on condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret and the charges have not been finalized. Indictments could be returned as early as Thursday, though it's more likely to occur within the next several weeks.

The fourth co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February 2006 to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002. Wade is former president of MZM Inc.

Foggo's attorney, Mark MacDougall, said he had not been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office regarding possible indictments and could not comment.

Mark Geragos, an attorney for Wilkes, said he had not been apprised of any imminent criminal charges. "I've reviewed this case and I don't see anything that merits an indictment," he said.

Messages left for Kontogiannis and Michaels were not immediately returned.

Prosecutors in San Diego would not comment about an ongoing investigation.

The grand jury began hearing evidence in 2005 against Cunningham, at the time an eight-term congressman who served on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee and the Intelligence Committee. Cunningham's subcommittee assignment made him a key figure in the awarding of defense contracts.

Cunningham agreed to a plea bargain and was sentenced in March 2006 to more than eight years in prison for taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors - including payments for a mansion, a used Rolls-Royce and a yacht he named "Duke-stir" - in return for funneling contracts to certain companies.

Prosecutors allege one of the beneficiaries was Wilkes, whose companies won nearly $100 million in federal contracts over the last decade. Prosecutors claim Wilkes paid Cunningham more than $626,000 in bribes between 2000 and 2004.

Wilkes, who heads Poway-based Wilkes Corp., grew up with Foggo in the San Diego suburb of Chula Vista. They remained very close into adulthood, naming their sons after each other.

Foggo was the No. 3 official at the CIA, responsible for the agency's day-to-day operations, until resigning in May after his home and office were raided by FBI agents in connection with the Cunningham probe headed by the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego.

Federal law enforcement agencies and intelligence officials have been investigating whether Foggo improperly awarded contracts to Wilkes' companies, including a multimillion-dollar contract to supply bottled water for CIA operations in Iraq.

A House Intelligence Committee report on Cunningham's activities released last November said he steered $70 million in contracts to Wade and Wilkes. The report also said more investigation is needed into Foggo's dealings with the intelligence panel, given his close relationship with former committee aide Brant Bassett.

The House Intelligence, Appropriations and Armed Services committees were subpoenaed in December by prosecutors for documents relating to the Cunningham investigation. A House aide said Wednesday that House lawyers have asked for more time and are working to negotiate a response that satisfies prosecutors so they can withdraw the subpoenas.

Wilkes' business fortunes have suffered since the investigation opened. Wilkes Corp. defaulted in mid-January on $12.1 million owed on its corporate headquarters.

Wilkes has been linked to several other ongoing corruption probes. He has said in interviews that his first mentor in Washington was Bill Lowery, a former U.S. congressman from San Diego whose lobbying firm is being investigated in connection with contracts approved by U.S. Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-San Bernardino, who chaired the Appropriations Committee until Democrats took power last month.

Investigators also have contacted two Washington, D.C.-based escort services in an effort to determine whether Wilkes supplied Cunningham and potentially other lawmakers with prostitutes at poker parties he hosted at the Watergate hotel.

Former R.I. Lawmaker Gets 2 1/2 Years (NSDY/AP)

By Eric Tucker, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 1, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- A once-powerful lawmaker at the center of a corruption scandal was sentenced Wednesday to 2 1/2 years in federal prison for taking payoffs, and prosecutors said their investigation now includes 14 politicians and companies.

A former hospital executive also was sentenced.

John Celona admitted he abused his position as chairman of a key legislative committee to benefit the drugstore chain CVS Corp., Roger Williams Medical Center and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

Prosecutors said the former state senator was paid nearly $320,000 for the favorable treatment.

The sentencing caps a precipitous fall for Celona, a one-time lawnmower salesman who arrived at the Statehouse in 1995. He gave up his Senate seat in 2004 amid questions about his relationship with CVS.

Celona, 53, pleaded guilty in 2005 to three counts of federal mail fraud and cooperated with investigators. He testified as the star witness last fall in a trial that produced convictions of two former hospital executives.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard Sullivan told the judge that Celona's extensive cooperation has led the investigation to seven politicians and seven corporations. Sullivan did not identify anyone being investigated but said FBI agents from other cities have been transferred to Rhode Island to help with the probe.

Before he was sentenced, a teary-eyed Celona apologized inside court to his family, friends, and the citizens of Rhode Island.

"I hope that others who may be tempted learn from my mistakes and make Rhode Island a better place," he said.

Robert Urciuoli, former president and chief executive of Roger Williams, was sentenced Wednesday to three years for his conviction on one count of conspiracy and 35 counts of fraud for paying Celona to advance the hospital's interests in the Legislature. Urciuoli maintained his innocence and said he planned to appeal.

Frances Driscoll, 67, a former hospital vice president, sobbed after she was sentenced to eight months in prison followed by eight months of home confinement for her conviction on a single fraud count.

Two former executives at CVS Corp. pleaded not guilty Tuesday to federal charges they paid Celona to kill legislation the chain opposed or sponsor bills that favored the company.

Celona has also been indicted on related state corruption charges and faces a separate trial on those counts next month. Last year, the state ethics commission punished him with a record $130,000 civil fine for ethics violations.

Trio Sentenced To Jail (PROJO)

By Mike Stanton, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, February 1, 2007

In sentencing John A. Celona, Robert A. Urciuoli and Frances P. Driscoll to prison yesterday, Senior U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres said that he wanted to send a message to others who might be tempted to follow in their footsteps down the long, gray line of Rhode Island's corrupt past.

And judging from the words of a federal prosecutor, the potential audience is growing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard B. Sullivan revealed that a federal task force has been assembled that is pursuing 14 "active investigations" of seven politicians and seven corporations for corruption schemes similar to the crimes that ensnared Celona , a former state senator, and Urciuoli and Driscoll, onetime executives at Roger Williams Medical Center.

The investigations have their genesis in the cooperation of Celona, who pleaded guilty to selling his office to Roger Williams, the CVS drugstore chain and Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

Celona, 53, was sentenced to 2½ years in prison. Urciuoli, 59,received 3 years. And in an emotional conclusion to the day's proceedings, Driscoll, 67, who has health concerns, was sentenced to 8 months in prison plus 8 months home confinement.

Celona must report to prison by noon Friday, March 2. Torres gave Urciuoli and Driscoll 60 days, until April 2, to give them time to appeal.

If not for Celona's acceptance of responsibility and ongoing cooperation, Torres said that he would have sentenced him to 42 months.

"Perhaps your assistance will allow the authorities to dig deeper into this culture of corruption that seems to exist in some quarters," Torres told Celona.

A teary Celona told the judge that he was relieved.

"I'm glad that all of this happened," he said, "because I've become a better husband and a better father and in some respects just a regular person, living in the real world …I lived in a superficial world at the State House, with all the trappings of power … .

"Family and honor are the most important things in life — not politics or glory or power."

Sullivan told Torres that Celona's assistance has provided tips and leads for a growing number of agents. FBI agents have been brought to Providence from New York and Baltimore to work with two Providence agents and the Rhode Island State Police. In addition, agents from the Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Department of Labor have joined the task force.

Sullivan has relinquished his position as chief of the criminal division in the Providence U.S. Attorney's office to oversee the task force. In an office with 20 prosecutors and 5 legal assistants, Sullivan said, with all the drugs, weapons and other cases they have to handle, one-fifth of the staff has been dedicated to the task force — "a significant response based on the cooperation of Mr. Celona."

Celona pledged to Torres that he would continue to cooperate.

"I wholeheartedly want to clean up our government," said Celona. "I hope that others who might be tempted will learn from my mistakes. I want to make Rhode Island a better place."

Torres noted that Celona is just the latest in a long line of public officials "who have been sentenced in this courthouse and this courtroom," but that for whatever reason — elitism, greed, arrogance — "the message has yet to sink in."

"Your expression of remorse seems genuine," the judge said. "You seem committed to cleaning up what needs to be cleaned up in this state."

Still, Celona's crimes are serious enough that Torres rejected his request for 18 months in prison.

"What you've done here is not only deprive the public of the right to your honest services," said Torres. "You have tarnished the reputation of other public officials, the vast majority of whom are honest, devoted and do the best they can. Every time one of these cases comes up, one of the worst consequences is the cloud that it casts over honest, hard-working public officials."

Such a cloud, noted Torres, also "deters good people" from becoming involved in politics.

U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente echoed that theme on the courthouse steps.

"One would hope that after a parade of these sentences, people would get the message and stop doing it," said Corrente. "But we haven't hit the bottom of the barrel yet."

Corrente declined to identify any of the parties under investigation, but said that at least some "are known to you."

"If they ever get indicted, you'll know them," he vowed.

Following Celona's sentencing, his family and friends filed out of the small, packed courtroom to be replaced by Urciuoli's family and friends. Urciuoli, the former president of Roger Williams Medical Center, took Celona's place at the defense table, and Torres turned to the other side of the corruption equation.

"Public corruption is a very serious offense and it takes at least two parties," said Torres. "It takes a corrupt office holder and a person who induces that person."

Urciuoli's lawyer, Richard M. Egbert, argued that it was unfair for the government to request a sentence for Celona based on the money he received from Roger Williams, CVS and Blue Cross — about $319,000 — and then seek a much larger prison term for Urciuoli, based on the fact that Celona's efforts helped the hospital gain $5.6 million in disputed reimbursements from Blue Cross.

Based on the $5.6 million, Urciuoli was facing a potential prison term in the range of seven years following his conviction at trial last fall on 1 count of conspiracy and 35 counts of honest-services mail fraud.

"It seems almost to shock the conscience of justice," said Egbert.

Torres agreed. But he rejected Egbert's request to further lower that figure because Celona had also done "legitimate" work promoting the hospital's affiliated assisted-living center.

"Those [legitimate] services were negligible," said Torres. "Senator Celona was hired to use his office to benefit Roger Williams."

Urciuoli now faced a prison term of 41 to 51 months. Prosecutors asked for 46. But Torres had discretion to lower that based on other factors, including a history of community service documented in numerous letters to the court.

Egbert, citing Urciuoli's "extraordinary" service in 35 years at Roger Williams and the fact that the legislation involved in the case did not personally profit Urciuoli, but rather benefited the hospital, requested a prison term of one year and one day.

Urciuoli also pleaded for leniency.

"I'm not perfect. I make mistakes," said Urciuoli. "But if you look back on my life, I'm much more of a giver than a taker. … I have a deep, unbridled love for Roger Williams. I never did anything to enrich myself personally.

"This has been a very painful, humiliating experience for me and my family. …I've lost my job, my reputation, been devastated financially."

Torres said that he was impressed by Urciuoli's appearance as "a law-abiding citizen who has done many good things for the community." And while the crime was serious, Torres said, he was also struck by the fact that "for the most part, what you did was not motivated by personal gain. …but to benefit Roger Williams."

Torres sentenced Urciuoli to three years in prison, followed by two years of supervised release during which he will have to perform eight hours a week of community service. He also fined him $20,000. The judge denied Urciuoli's request to remain free while he appeals, which could take one year.

The last defendant to be sentenced was Driscoll. A former vice president at Roger Williams, she was convicted at trial with Urciuoli of one count of honest-services mail fraud and faced a prison term of 27 to 33 months. Her lawyer, Kevin J. Bristow, argued for a lesser sentence, based on her relatively minor role in the crime, including her initial objections to Urciuoli's desire to hire Celona.

"She has lost what she worked for her whole life — her reputation," said Bristow. "She has difficulty trying to explain to a grandchild what's going on with grandma."

Torres said that she deserved some consideration, but that she should to go prison for her participation in a crime documented in numerous faxes between her and Celona.

"I never, ever in my worst nightmare thought I would be convicted of a crime, standing before you here today," she told Torres. "But as I look at those faxes, I don't know how I could have allowed that sort of communication to occur. … Reading the black and white of those documents did truly frighten me. I never took time to reconcile the friendly John Celona who wanted to truly help the hospital any way he could with the man who was a paid consultant. For that, I'm truly sorry."

She and Bristow pleaded with Torres to spare her prison and sentence her to home confinement, based on her age and health concerns of herself and her husband of 42 years, Don, for whom she is the primary caretaker. They also cited her numerous good works, documented in dozens of letters to the judge on behalf of the poor, the elderly and students.

"I don't want [my husband] to live out his life in a care center," she said, choking back sobs.

Mobster's Son May Try To Help Convict Ex-FBI Official (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, February 1, 2007

Brooklyn prosecutors are seeking to line up a star witness for their sensational upcoming trial of a former FBI supervisor, R. Lindley DeVecchio, who is charged with helping legendary mob capo Gregory Scarpa commit four murders.

The prospective witness is none other than Gregory Scarpa Jr., the imprisoned son of the late Colombo crime big, who after his death in 1994 was revealed to have been a much-prized government informant (and whose handler was Mr. DeVecchio). Unfortunately, the would-be witness comes with heavy baggage: He's already been called a perjurer by a federal judge and other authorities.

So far, the matter is still in the talking stages. Gang Land has learned that Scarpa has told prosecutors he wants to testify at the trial. The Brooklyn district attorney's office, which filed the blockbuster charges against Mr. DeVecchio, has been talking to him with a view toward granting his wish.

If so, he would undoubtedly have a lot to say.

Scarpa could give a detailed, shot-by-shot account of the slaying of Mary Bari, a onetime paramour of a top Colombo gangster who was killed in 1984, as well as the 1987 murder of mobster Joseph "Joe Brewster" DeDomenico. According to court records, Scarpa fired the fatal shots at DeDomenico and held down Bari as his father shot her at a mob social club. Mr. DeVecchio is alleged to have alerted Scarpa Sr. that both were potential informants.

Soon after the Joe Brewster slaying, Scarpa became a fugitive, allegedly after Mr. DeVecchio tipped his father that he was going to be arrested on drug charges. Captured later, Scarpa was convicted in 1988 and was in prison when two other murders that Mr. DeVecchio is alleged to have aided — that of Patrick Porco in 1990 and Larry Lampesi in 1992 — took place. If he professes any insight about those killings, it would have to have been acquired secondhand.

Prosecutors have been secretly discussing those events with Scarpa Jr. since December 6 in a secure wing of the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

On that day, according to Bureau of Prison officials, Scarpa Jr., who is serving 40 years for racketeering charges and is slated for release in 2035, was moved to the MCC. Since 1999, he had been at a super-strict Colorado facility that, at latest count, is home to the 465 "most violent" inmates of the 193,643 incarcerated around the country.

The Executive Assistant Warden, Scott Sussman, confirmed that Scarpa, 55, is at the MCC, which primarily houses transient inmates with court proceedings or other official sessions scheduled in the New York area, but declined to provide any reasons for his transfer.

A spokesman for the district attorney's office declined to comment about the matter.

Sources who are familiar with the situation but not involved in the case have told Gang Land that Scarpa and the Brooklyn district attorney's office began weighing the possibility of him serving as a prosecution witness even before he was relocated to the MCC in December.

It would obviously be a risky move, as the imprisoned mobster, who testified at his own trial and at a hearing for convicted acting Colombo boss Victor "Little Vic" Orena, has been publicly called a liar by federal authorities.

If he were to take the stand against DeVecchio, there is little, if anything, that the state prosecutors could do for Scarpa, who received nothing from the feds for information he provided about terrorists Ramzi Yousef and Terry Nichols.

Sources say that the jailed gangster is willing to testify without any guarantees, and that the DA's office is seriously considering the option.

"He's got nothing to lose," a law enforcement official said. "He's 55 and he'll be in his 80s before he can get out. Things can't get worse; only better. And until his work is done, he's close to home, and can get visits from loved ones, if he has any."

Scarpa wouldn't be the first incarcerated gangster to cooperate with the feds on a wing and a prayer.

Leroy "Nicky" Barnes, the legendary Harlem heroin merchant who was serving life without parole in 1981, got out 17 years later after he turned and helped convict 44 drug dealers and murderers, including a few mob associates, of various crimes. Barnes, by the way, has co-authored a book about his life, "Mr. Untouchable," due out next month.

Speaking of books, Scarpa is writing one with Sandra Harmon, who has given an affidavit to the DA's office containing allegations of wrongdoing by Mr. DeVecchio that she claims to have obtained from the elder Scarpa's former partner, Linda Schiro, while the two women were collaborating on a book project that failed to materialize.

Ms. Harmon told Gang Land she had loyalties to Scarpa and the DA's office and refused to discuss where Scarpa is or whether he and Brooklyn prosecutors have spoken to each other.

"But I know why someone would want to leave Ad Max" she said, using the BOP's shorthand term for the Administrative Maximum facility in Florence, Colo. "It's a hell hole, all about shackles and a 23-hour-a-day lockdown. And he does have children, a brother, and other relatives he loves."

News of Scarpa's willingness to be a prosecution witness came as the judge in the case rejected a prosecution motion to postpone the trial until after Labor Day to enable lead prosecutor Michael Vecchione to try two corruption cases, those of Judge Gerald Garson and Clarence Norman, for the fourth time.

This week, a Supreme Court justice, Gustin Reichbach, told assistant district attorneys Noel Downey and Bryan Wallace that the quadruple homicide case — in which a co-defendant has been held without bail for 11 months — was more pressing. Assuming he rejects voluminous defense motions to dismiss the case, the trial would begin in mid-May, the judge said.

In court papers, defense lawyers Douglas Grover and Mark Bederow charged that the grand jury investigation was tainted by numerous prosecution leaks to Gang Land and others, and by prosecutors' use of evidence that Mr. DeVecchio provided on two occasions when he had been granted immunity.

Reached by Gang Land, Mr. Bederow said he was reluctant to "speculate" about witnesses prosecutors think may be "helpful to their case. But certainly, if they intend on using Gregory Scarpa Jr., we would welcome the opportunity to cross examine him."

Three decades ago, mob associate Ernest Malizia knew exactly what to do after an undercover operative named Boom Boom busted him in a drug sting and he was sentenced to heavy time and stuck in the old federal detention center on West Street.

On September 22, 1974, with the help of a priest and a $50,000 bribe to a corrupt prison guard, he walked out the front gate and flew to Miami. He lived large for three years until his pursuers collared him and he was sent off to more secure accommodations.

Today, at 74, Malizia suffers a host of debilitating medical problems, is broke, and his last resort against dying in prison the same way his brother did three years ago lies with a Manhattan federal judge, Deborah Batts, his devoted wife, Brenda, says.

"He's had quadruple bypass surgery, needs a defibrillator, has no spleen to help him fight infection and has been rushed to hospitals several times in recent months with infections and heart complications," Malizia's wife, who has joined her husband in filing letters seeking mercy from Judge Batts, says.

After getting paroled from prison in 1994, Ernie was clean for a while. But truth be told, he got popped again for drug dealing, pleaded guilty, was sentenced to eight years, which he completed last year.

Before he could be released, however, he was hit with parole violations stemming from the same charges for which he had been sentenced, and ordered to serve an additional 12 years. This seems a bit unfair to Brenda Malizia, and Gang Land, too.

Drug-testing Firm Faces Audit After Accusations (CHIT)

By David Kidwell And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, February 1, 2007

Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office has ordered an audit of no-bid state contracts dating to 1990 with a Chicago drug-testing firm under criminal investigation for alleged billing fraud.

The administration outlined its actions involving K.K. Bio-Science Inc. on Wednesday, a day after Cook County investigators and the FBI searched the company's offices for evidence of fraud, money laundering and a continuing criminal enterprise, according to the search warrant.

The company came under scrutiny last fall when the Tribune disclosed that the governor's wife, Patricia, had earned more than $113,000 as a real estate agent for the company's owner. There is no indication that the fraud investigation has any connection to the real estate deals.

The company's owner, Anita Mahajan, hired prominent Chicago defense attorney Terry Gillespie to represent her in the investigation. Gillespie said he is new to the case and declined to comment Wednesday.

Mahajan and company representatives also have declined to comment on the case, which centers on Mahajan's long-standing annual contracts to conduct urinalysis screenings on clients of the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services.

No criminal charges had been filed as of Wednesday, and law-enforcement officials also remained silent.

A three-page search warrant served at the company's headquarters in downtown Chicago on Tuesday sought "any items or documents which have been used in the commission of, or which constitute evidence of the offenses," including forgery, theft, money laundering, mail fraud, wire fraud and a continuing financial crimes enterprise, according to the warrant.

The company, founded in 1985 by Mahajan's father, abruptly closed down Jan. 19 with no warning to employees. It officially terminated its $739,000 state contract on Jan. 9 amid an inquiry by the child welfare agency's office of inspector general.

The inspector general's office recently turned over its findings to the Cook County state's attorney office, which is leading the investigation. FBI agents also were on hand during Tuesday's search of the company's abandoned headquarters at 220 S. State St.

According to other workers in the building, K.K. Bio-Science representatives spent much of last week tossing computers and files into Dumpsters in the hallway.

The inquiries began after an Oct. 27 Tribune report raised questions about four 2006 real estate deals involving Mahajan and her banker husband, Amrish, in which Patricia Blagojevich earned more than $113,000 in real estate commissions.

The four commissions on the commercial real estate deals accounted for the only ones the first lady earned in the first 10 months of 2006.

The governor's office confirmed Wednesday that it has ordered a comprehensive review of the company's contracts.

"When an [inspector general] uncovers abuses or discovers abuses of taxpayer dollars, we need to look into that as far as we can and as much as we can to understand as much as we can," said Blagojevich spokeswoman Rebecca Rausch. "In this case, the IG discovered some issue with this contract, and we want a full review of this contract and we've directed DCFS to do that."

The governor has portrayed the Tribune's questions about whether it was a potential conflict for his wife to accept commissions from a state contractor as "sexist" and "Neanderthal." And his administration last year denied Tribune requests for records that would document the company's performance, citing an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

But following the Tribune report on the real estate deals, the agency's inspector general quietly opened the contract investigation that allegedly found some problematic billings.

"Our intention is to do a full review of this contract to seek full restitution of any overpayments made," DCFS spokesman Kendall Marlowe said Wednesday.

Execution, If It Occurs, Is Years Away For Killer (NYT)

By Michael Brick
The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Ronell Wilson sits alone in a prison cell near Gowanus Bay in Brooklyn. He has been on suicide watch since his return late Tuesday evening from federal court in Brooklyn, where a jury called for his execution.

"He's holding up well," said one of his lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, "under the circumstances."

On federal death row, he will join 46 other inmates, their cases in varying stages of appeal. If the sentence is carried out one day, Mr. Wilson, 24, will probably die by lethal injection at the federal death chamber in Terre Haute, Ind., where Timothy J. McVeigh, who bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, and two Texans have preceded him. But Mr. Wilson's lawyers said he will appeal his sentence, an unpredictable and complicated process that could take years.

No other federal trial in New York has produced a death sentence in half a century. Three men have been put to death in federal cases since 1988, when a moratorium on federal capital punishment was lifted. Of these, the two Texans — Juan Raul Garza, convicted of three drug-related murders, and Louis Jones Jr., convicted of rape and murder — were each on death row for about eight years. Mr. McVeigh, who abandoned his appeals after being denied a stay of execution, was executed four years after his sentencing for the bombing.

Mr. Wilson was convicted of 10 crimes in December, chief among them the murder of two undercover detectives during a gun transaction on Staten Island in March 2003. Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, who was not in his chambers yesterday, must set a formal sentencing date, according to his staff.

On five counts, the judge is bound by the jury's verdict to impose death sentences. But for the other charges, including robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and use of a firearm, the judge must determine prison terms. Some of the crimes are relatively minor, on the scale of regular business for a federal court in New York City.

Mr. Wilson, for example, was found guilty of planning to rob a clothing store called Oz, near the Stapleton Houses on Staten Island, where his gang was based. The plan, to get a U-Haul truck and cart off the merchandise in broad daylight, was abandoned in the talking phase.

The law calls for a presentence investigation, in which probation officers will interview Mr. Wilson to ascertain his background and present demeanor. They will compile a report for the judge, though it would seem he has already heard every imaginable aspect of Mr. Wilson's biography recounted in the courtroom during the penalty phase of the trial.

"It's a charade at this point," Mr. Savitt said.

Department of Justice officials said that after sentencing, Mr. Wilson will be assigned to a prison.

The choice would seem to be foregone. All federal condemned prisoners are assigned to the United States Penitentiary in Terre Haute, said Felicia Ponce, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, a private group that tracks capital cases, that institution was modified in 1995 to include an execution chamber and was converted to a death row center in 1999.

Declining to address Mr. Wilson's case in particular, Ms. Ponce said that all inmates, including those bound for death row, are evaluated according to a point system to determine their assignment. So prison officials will study the seriousness of his offense, his criminal record, his projected length of imprisonment and earlier prison sentences. According to bureau policy statements, this process will involve two managers and a counselor, and perhaps an education adviser and a psychology services representative.

Federal marshals will take Mr. Wilson to his assigned facility. He may join other inmates on an airplane, or he may be assigned to a private flight, said Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service in the Eastern District of New York.

"It's very new," Mr. Rosado said. "I'm not sure."

Mr. Wilson's lawyers must also confront the grim novelty of the circumstances.

"The lawyers went out to an Irish pub," Mr. Savitt said, adding that he had trouble sleeping nonetheless. With the realm of possible motions in this trial exhausted, he said, the next forum for the case is appellate court.

Upon formal sentencing, a convict has 10 days to file a notice of appeal, said Erik Ablin, a spokesman for the Department of Justice. From there, a briefing schedule would be established. After avenues of appeal have been exhausted, meaning the case has been declined by the United States Supreme Court, a prisoner could apply for relief from the court that imposed the sentence.

Mr. Savitt said that grounds for appeal could include the judge's rejection of defense lawyers' efforts to eliminate certain members of the jury, including the foreman. He said the foreman had muttered and rolled his eyes during the closing defense argument.

Other grounds could include the judge's decision to bar testimony on the nature of rap lyrics. Prosecutors had submitted handwritten lyrics they portrayed as a confession, and defense lawyers had hoped to call an expert to depict the lyrics as fantasies.

Should all the appeals fail, Justice Department officials said, the Bureau of Prisons would set an execution date. An example of how that works is available from the case of Bruce Carneil Webster, another Texan, who was convicted of kidnapping resulting in death.

Mr. Webster, who was sentenced to death in 1996, was notified in writing on Dec. 5, 2006, that he would be executed by lethal injection at 7 a.m. on April 16, 2007.

Mr. Wilson's lawyers said they would ask court and prison officials to keep him in the cell in Brooklyn during the next stage of the process.

"We have to consult with him on the appeal," Mr. Savitt said. "This is his life."

Geography And Emotion Helped Sway Jurors' Vote (NYT)

By James Barron

They were police detectives, shot at close range, in the backs of their heads. Fellow officers and relatives filled the courtroom, day after day, during the trial of the man accused of pulling the trigger, who mostly kept his emotions to himself.

Add to that where the jurors came from — Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island, but not Manhattan. And that the detectives knew, and were known in, the neighborhood, which gave the case a strong local connection — unlike, say, a case involving terrorist acts overseas.

Taken together, all those elements were so powerful, death-penalty specialists said yesterday, that the jury's verdict seemed almost inevitable. The seven women and five men decided that the defendant, Ronell Wilson, should die.

That made him the first person to face death in a federal case in New York since the 1950s, a fate that other defendants have managed to avoid, even though some of them have been accused of killing far more people. "There was a confluence of factors," said Deborah W. Denno, a professor at Fordham University School of Law. "I think it's highly unlikely there will be another case with all these particular elements anytime soon."

For that reason, she and other lawyers interviewed yesterday said they doubted that the Wilson verdict signaled a shift in public attitudes about the death penalty. Michael Greenberger, a law professor at the University of Maryland, noted that advances in DNA testing have uncovered faulty convictions and made juries nationally more hesitant to impose the death sentence. But he said there were no such doubts in the Wilson case.

"This case is one that shocks the conscience," he said. "The brutal nature of it, I think, aligned the stars for this kind of verdict."

Still, some attitudes may have changed. Several years ago, when Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered United States attorneys to seek the death penalty, he ran into resistance in New York, where some prosecutors feared such a possibility could cause jurors to acquit.

DOJ_NMG_0125341

Counting Mr. Wilson, there are now 47 federal prisoners on death row. But prosecutors in New York have failed to obtain death sentences in recent years, even in closely watched terrorism trials involving embassy bombings in Africa in 1998.

Some death-penalty opponents said that the Wilson case proved the exception because the victims were police officers.

Ronald J. Tabak, a special counsel at the Manhattan law firm of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom and the president of New York Lawyers Against the Death Penalty, said that when New York changed its law on capital punishment in the 1960s "in what was considered a virtual abolition of the death penalty," the murder of a police officer remained a death-penalty offense.

The last federal inmate to be executed in New York State, Gerhard Puff, in 1954, had been found guilty of killing an F.B.I. agent during a bank robbery. At the state level, no trials involved the killings of police officers between when the death penalty was reinstated in New York in 1995 and when it was invalidated in 2004, according to Kevin Doyle, the New York State criminal defender. Nor did any of the federal cases tried in New York since 2001.

But in the Wilson case, death-penalty lawyers said, the jury could not have missed the large turnout of police officers and relatives.

"It's hard to resist that kind of pressure," said David A. Ruhnke, a lawyer who is representing a convicted drug trafficker in another federal death-penalty case in Brooklyn, that one involving racketeering and murder.

Last week, the judge in that case told the prosecutors that the Justice Department should drop its push for the execution of the defendant, Kenneth McGriff. The judge, Frederic Block, said that pressing on to the penalty phase of the trial would be "absurd" and "a total misappropriation" of taxpayer dollars.

In analyzing the Wilson verdict, some death-penalty lawyers said they had figured that sooner or later, a jury in New York would vote to send a defendant to die. Mr. Tabak said that of the seven state cases that ended in death-penalty verdicts between 1995 and 2004, all but two originated in the area that makes up the federal Eastern District: Brooklyn, Queens and Staten Island, and Nassau and Suffolk Counties on Long Island.

Lawyers consider prospective jurors in those areas more likely to support the death penalty than those in Manhattan. Still, some lawyers said the importance of geography was minimal when compared to the particular circumstances of the Wilson case.

"It was the kind of case that no matter where it tried and no matter where it was brought, the likelihood of a death verdict was high," Mr. Ruhnke said. "Sometimes the facts of a case simply blot out everything else."

Other death-penalty lawyers said the Wilson trial differed from those involving drug dealers accused of killing other drug dealers, or those involving terrorists. Twice in 2001, a federal jury in Manhattan deadlocked over whether to impose the death penalty on three terrorists in the 1998 bombings of the American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed more than 200 people, including 12 Americans. In the federal courts, a deadlock means the defendant is automatically sentenced to life in prison.

Richard Burr, who was one of Timothy J. McVeigh's lawyers in the Oklahoma City bombing trial, said that a case involving a terrorist attack overseas "is not the sort of immediate, frightening incident that the killing of police officers in your own town is."

"It's not immediate, it's not here, it's not that visceral response," he said.

The Wilson case, which centered on the murders of Detectives James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews on a Staten Island street in 2003, had an emotional component that the lawyers said had been lacking in other death-penalty trials in New York. This was partly because such violence seemed out of place on Staten Island, and partly because the detectives were the first two officers killed by gunfire on a single day in 15 years.

"The ingredient that this case had that the others have not had was the powerful emotions on the part of the victims' survivors, both their individual families and the police community," said Kevin McNally, a Kentucky lawyer who is director of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, which provides information to defense lawyers in capital cases. "You simply don't see that kind of a packed courtroom in these other trials, and jurors are affected by that."

Nor had juries taken up a case in which the victims were police officers. David Bruck, who runs the Virginia Capital Case Clearinghouse at the Washington and Lee School of Law, said that juries "impose the death penalty to avenge the murders of people with whom they identify."

"People identify with brave, hard-working, young police officers who lost their lives and had families and people who loved them," he said.

In addition, Professor Denno said the way Mr. Wilson had handled himself during the trial — even sticking out his tongue as the victims' families rejoiced after the verdict — "stands out" among death-penalty defendants in this country.

"I think people expect this from terrorists who are instigated by an ideology that of course we can't fully understand," she said. "But the American public has particular difficulty with a defendant like Ronell Wilson, who showed so little remorse, no remorse."

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (AP) _ A fired Eastman Kodak Co. employee involved in a kickback scheme to defraud the photography company was placed on probation for three years Tuesday and ordered to pay almost $190,000 in restitution.

Roger Benton, 49, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in June for helping to steer inflated contracts to a molding services company, Pro-Mold Ltd., between 1997 and 2000. At sentencing in federal court, he was fined $3,000 and paid $63,058 of the $189,174 he was ordered to return to Kodak.

If convicted, Benton could have drawn up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Another former Kodak employee implicated in the scheme was sentenced last week to six months of home confinement and ordered to pay back a portion of the stolen money. Roy Mosely, a mechanic, and Pro-Mold conspired to inflate contract bids, then kept a portion of the payments, prosecutors said.

Man Pleads Guilty To Child-porn Charge (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 1, 2007

He faces minimum 10-year sentence for creating illegal images

A Grainger County man with a decade-long history of collecting child pornography admitted Wednesday he has been creating his own illegal images.

As part of his plea, Ratkewicz admitted not only downloading sadistic shots of young children being sexually victimized but also "photographing underage boys in sexually explicit positions and storing the images on his computer," Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley said.

That fact, coupled with a prior conviction in Florida for possession of child pornography, will put Ratkewicz on a higher rung on the sentencing ladder, Atchley said.

"He is facing enhanced penalties," Atchley said at Wednesday's hearing.

Ratkewicz faces a minimum mandatory prison term of 10 years when he again stands before Jordan in May to learn his sentencing fate.

According to documents filed in the case, the Knoxville Police Department Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, with help from the Grainger County Sheriff's Department, hit Ratkewicz with a search warrant in August 2004.

Although court records do not make clear why Ratkewicz became a target of the task force, officers such as KPD Officer Melvin Pierce typically go undercover on the Internet, taking on the guise of a child victim or a fellow child pornography aficionado.

Atchley said Ratkewicz agreed to be interviewed by Pierce and other task force officers, including FBI agents.

"He stated that he had collected child pornography for over 10 years," Atchley said.

An examination of Ratkewicz's computer revealed some 50,000 images of child pornography, Atchley said.

Defense attorney Rebecca McCoy asked Jordan to allow Ratkewicz to remain free on bond pending sentencing.

"He is not a flight risk," she said. "He has voluntarily returned here to address these issues."

Atchley balked.

"I think the statute is quite clear," Atchley said. "Mr. Ratkewicz has pleaded guilty to what is a crime of violence. This is not Mr. Ratkewicz's first time in court for an offense like this."

Jordan sided with Atchley and ordered deputy U.S. Marshals to take the Grainger County man into custody.

Study: Novel Sentencing Program Really Works (AP)

By Wilson Ring, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

MONTPELIER, Vt. --A woman who stole from a patient in a nursing home where she works was sentenced to making potpourri-filled vases for a senior center.

A man convicted of driving with a suspended license agrees to carve a cane for an elderly person.

An artist convicted of driving under the influence had to paint a painting for an organization whose lawn she drove over.

Those are some of the examples of the unusual sentences crafted by Vermont's ground-breaking Reparative Probation system, under which criminals meet with community volunteers -- and in some cases victims -- to craft their sentences instead of taking them from a judge.

The system works, according to a new survey.

The survey by three college professors that was paid for with a grant from the Justice Department, found that in 9,078 cases handled between 1998 and 2005, offenders were 23 percent less likely to commit another crime while on probation than those sentenced to traditional probation.

And they were 12 percent less likely to commit another crime after probation ended.

"This is a bit of a vindication for Vermont's reparative boards," said Gale Burford, a professor of social work at the University of Vermont and one of the authors of the yet-to-be published survey. He said that in some circles, Vermont was perceived as being soft on crime.

"The people who go to these boards don't regard them as soft, because they are emotional and they are getting faced by people in their community," Burford said. "It is not a soft option."

The people who work with the system every day say its successes go beyond just reducing recidivism.

"Those numbers are important, but I can tell you it works on so many other levels, in terms of the relationships built and the conversations that are had and the new perspectives that people have about their own lives and other peoples' lives," said Cara Gleason, the Community Justice Coordinator for the City of Burlington.

The Corrections Department set up the pioneering program in 1995, when the state was looking for alternatives to traditional corrections.

Reparative probation was part of a package of sentencing alternatives -- such as requiring offenders to complete intensive substance-abuse programs or closely supervised furlough in the community -- made available to Vermont judges.

A number of communities across the country now use some form of reparative justice.

What makes Vermont unusual is that the system was conceived by the Department of Corrections, said Kay Pranis, of St. Paul, Minn., who has worked with restorative justice programs across the country.

"Out of a state agency came an effort that has become a community-based effort and really belongs to the community," said Pranis. "That is a huge accomplishment."

In the reparative probation system, the offender meets with community members and they try to craft a sentence that builds on the interests of the offender and the needs of the victim and the community.

In some cases the victims participate, in some cases they don't.

"I think across the board, almost everyone says that's when it's most transformational is when the person who has been the most affected gets to meet with the person who caused them harm," said Rain Banberg, of the Greater Barre Community Justice Center.

Now, there are 12 community justice centers across the state and many more volunteer boards that meet with the offenders. The volunteer boards are chosen from interested members of the community.

By design, the hearings lack the structured formality of a court appearance.

And that's how a single mother working in a nursing home comes to see how stealing a ring from a patient affects the victim. So the board builds on the offender's interest in crafts and has her make vases for the senior center.

Or why the man who was driving with a suspended license could agree to use his passion for carving to create a carved cane for a senior citizen. Or the artist convicted a second time for driving under the influence could create a painting for the lawn of, coincidentally, the substance abuse center she drove over, said Lori Baker, the executive director of the Barre Justice Center.

The solutions, by design, are as varied as the crimes.

"It shows that we can involve community volunteers, lay people, in processing a large percentage of our low-level crimes rather than dealing with them more formally either in government supervised probation or the even more expensive option in court," said Burford.

Bush Urged To Pardon Border Patrol Agents Who Shot Immigrant (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Are they mistreated heroes or rogue lawmen?

That question is at the heart of a nationwide uproar over Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are beginning decade-long sentences in federal prison for the non-fatal shooting of a suspected drug smuggler, who was given immunity to testify against them.

Scores of Republican lawmakers, and thousands of grassroots petitioners, have besieged President Bush with demands that the agents be granted an immediate pardon. But to federal prosecutor Johnny Sutton and his defenders, the two Texas-based agents abridged the public trust by attempting to cover up an unauthorized shooting and must face the consequences.

"Prosecutors take cases as they come. We don't get to choose the facts and we don't get to choose the witnesses," the San Antonio-based U.S. attorney said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "We hate the thought of having to prosecute law enforcement because those are the people we work with every day. But nobody is above the law."

In an interview on the Fox television network Wednesday, Bush again said he is bound by strict federal guidelines on pardons and cannot immediately grant a pardon to the two agents.

Bush explained that "there is a series of steps that are analyzed in order for the Justice Department to make a recommendation as to whether or not a president grants a pardon."

And, Bush added, "we're not at that stage yet."

Bush's position is likely to further agitate a growing circle of mostly Republican lawmakers, who have repeatedly pressed the White House to step into the case. Many also blame the Bush administration for the agents' imprisonment, pointing out that it was Bush who appointed Sutton as federal prosecutor in 2001.

"There are so many questions," said Rep. Walter Jones Jr., R-N.C., who has written four letters to Bush requesting a pardon. "The White House should intervene and the president should pardon these men immediately."

Other leading House members in the campaign include Republicans Ted Poe, Michael McCaul and Sam Johnson, all of Texas, and Dana Rohrabacher and Duncan Hunter, of California.

"On the face of it, the administration is taking the side of the bad guys," Rohrabacher said.

The union that represents most non-supervisory Border Patrol agents is also waging a vigorous campaign to obtain a pardon for the two imprisoned agents.

"The front-line agents, the ones who actually do the work, are extremely upset," said T. J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council. "They're very concerned that the same thing could happen to them."

The fate of the two agents has inflamed the wider debate over border security and illegal immigration. And while the outcry on behalf of Ramos and Compean has buzzed across the Internet and conservative talk shows, a less vocal circle believes justice may have been done.

"If we take all the political patina from it, the pure issue is what do we want here on the border as far as accountability (in the use) of deadly force," said Kathleen Walker of El Paso, Texas, the incoming president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "We've had a clear violation of procedure and that's not something we want to promote as the status quo."

Ramos and Compean were convicted by a federal court jury in El Paso for a Feb. 17, 2005, shooting involving Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who was trying to flee back into Mexico after abandoning a van containing 743 pounds of marijuana near Fabens, Texas.

U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone of El Paso sentenced the men in October - Ramos to 11 years in federal prison, Compean to 12. They began serving their sentences two weeks ago.

"He's taking it real hard," said Joe Loya, an El Paso insurance agent and Ramos' father-in-law. "These guys were scapegoats. He's not a criminal who belongs behind bars."

The two agents and their families have repeatedly asserted that their only real offense were procedural violations that would normally result in a suspension, at best. But Sutton and his prosecution team say the agents engaged in abusive behavior and overstepped their authority.

In an account of the case released by Sutton's office, neither of the agents knew the van contained marijuana. "The evidence was un-controverted that, at the time the victim was shot, neither agent knew the driver was illegally in the United States or whether a crime had been committed," the statement said. "The only information they had was that the driver had failed to pull over to be identified."

Aldrete-Davila leaped out of the vehicle and tried to run, but stopped and raised his hands to surrender after jumping into a ditch. According to testimony, Compean tried to hit the man with the butt of his shotgun but slipped and fell. Aldrete-Davila began running, and Compean fired 14 shots with his pistol. Ramos fired once, striking Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks.

The fugitive fled to Mexico and sought medical help. In a twist of irony, according to Sutton, Aldrete-Davila's mother mentioned the incident to a friend, whose son-in-law was a Border Patrolman. The agent passed the information to superiors, resulting in an investigation by the Homeland Security Department, the parent department of the border patrol.

The investigation, as presented by prosecutors, found that the agents tried to dispose of empty shell casings and filed a false report. They were convicted of 11 of the 12 charges in the indictment, including assault with a dangerous weapon, assault with serious bodily injury, discharge of a firearm during the commission of a crime of violence and willfully violating Aldrete-Davila's constitutional right to be free from illegal seizure.

Other violations included intentionally defacing the crime scene, lying about the incident and failing to report the truth.

The agents' defenders have attacked Sutton's account as a collection of distortions and said the two lawmen were lawfully performing their duty and believed Aldrete-Davila was armed. Several lawmakers have likened the agents to combatants in Iraq, saying they risked their lives daily to protect America's border.

Among the most explosive elements in the case is Sutton's decision to grant immunity to Aldrete-Davila to enable an apparent drug dealer to testify against two agents with respected records of service - Ramos, at one point, was nominated as agent of the year before the recommendation was withdrawn following the indictment.

The agents' supporters also complain that the trial transcript has not been completed and made public, compounding their efforts to review the case.

Sutton described Aldrete-Davila as "a typical dirt-bag dope dealer" but said prosecutors had no useable evidence to link him to smuggling. Futher, he said, the agents' "bad behavior" at the scene destroyed any chance of making a drug case. After the unreported shooting came to light, he said, prosecutors had no choice but to proceed with a case, using Aldrete-Davila as a key witness.

Defense, Government Give Closing Arguments In Coke Secrets Case (SDUT/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 1, 2007

ATLANTA – A former Coca-Cola secretary was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she conspired to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi, a prosecutor said Wednesday during closing arguments in the woman's trial.

But Joya Williams' lawyer asked jurors to use their common sense and ask themselves if the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

"They have absolutely, 100 percent failed to meet that burden," Janice Singer said during her closing argument.

Jurors deliberated Williams' fate for about 3½ hours Wednesday afternoon before being sent home for the day without reaching a verdict. Deliberations were to resume Thursday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said Wednesday that the case against Williams is about cash, ongoing access to documents, lies and acts in furtherance of the crime. He put the words on a screen for the jury, using the first letter of each of the four categories to spell "C-O-L-A."

"This case is about desperate times calling for desperate criminal measures," Pak said.

He added, "Ladies and gentlemen, she is a knowing and willing participant in the conspiracy."

The government has alleged that Williams, 41, stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light.

During two days on the stand earlier this week, Williams testified that she didn't steal anything from Coke, but rather took documents and product samples home to protect herself in case her boss questioned whether she was doing her job.

She also claimed that $4,000 in cash she deposited into her bank account in June 2006, just days after Dimson was given $30,000 in cash from an undercover FBI agent in exchange for Coke materials, came from a friend, not from Dimson.

But the friend, Clifton Carroll, testified Tuesday that Williams was lying; he said the most money he ever loaned her was $400, and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility will be an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

Williams' lawyer has suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from Williams without her knowledge and conspired to sell them to Pepsi behind her back. Williams testified she left a key under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps explaining how they could have gotten into her home.

But Pak said during his closing argument Wednesday that the key under the mat claim was another lie told by Williams.

"The fact of the matter was there was no key under the mat," Pak told jurors. "That did not happen. Mr. Dimson had an insider, and that was Ms. Williams."

Defense lawyer Singer told jurors the real liar in the case is Duhaney, when he claimed on the stand that the conspiracy was Williams' idea.

"I think it is clear Mr. Duhaney has no problem lying," Singer said.

She noted Duhaney, an ex-con who met Dimson in federal prison, testified as part of a plea agreement with the government. Dimson had served time on a bank fraud charge, while Duhaney had served time on a cocaine charge.

"It gives him a motive to lie," Singer said of Duhaney, referring to his plea deal in the Coke case. "But Mr. Duhaney doesn't really need a motive to lie. He has a pattern of lying."

Before heading home Wednesday, the jury asked U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester whether Williams is married. The jury didn't say why it wanted to know. Williams had testified she is single, though on a form she filled out listing personal information on the day she started working at Coke – March. 7, 2005 – she circled "married." Her attorney told reporters outside court that she doesn't know if Williams was married in the past.

Posing As A Family, Sex Offenders Stun A Town (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

EL MIRAGE, Ariz., Jan. 31 — To neighbors, Casey Price was a seventh grader with acne and a baseball cap who lived an unremarkable life among a bevy of male relatives.

He built the occasional skateboard ramp and did wheelies on his bicycle down the streets of this subdivision of stucco homes north of Phoenix.

In nearby Surprise, where Casey was enrolled as a 12-year-old in a public school for four months, he was regarded as a shy, average student with chronic attendance problems. A man identified as his uncle had registered him, attended curriculum night and e-mailed his teachers about homework assignments.

Now Casey is in jail, and his former neighbors and classmates have learned the unthinkable: Not only is Casey not Casey — his real name is Neil H. Rodreick II — but he is also a 29-year-old convicted sex offender who kept a youthful appearance with the aid of razors and makeup.

And the men known as his uncle, grandfather and cousin, who until recently shared a three-bedroom house with him here, were not family at all, but a web of convicted sex offenders and predators, law enforcement officials say, preying in part on one another.

A retracing of Mr. Rodreick's tracks over the past several years shows that he is under investigation in three states. The authorities in four jurisdictions say he repeatedly failed to register as a sex offender, housed a large cache of child pornography in his computer and, based on videos found by the police, had sex with at least one boy.

"Obviously there are a lot of emotions to work through," said Mindy Newlin, the mother of a kindergartener at Imagine Charter School, the school in Surprise where Mr. Rodreick posed as Casey. "We are just shocked."

Robin Kaiser's daughter Kaitlin shared a class with "Casey," but he failed to make an impression, Ms. Kaiser said. "She remembers him, that he was quiet and sat in the back of the classroom," she said. "She said he looked like he had been held back."

Janet R. Lincoln, the public defender for Yavapai County, who represents Mr. Rodreick and the other three men, did not return multiple phone calls. A receptionist in her office said Ms. Lincoln would have no comment. The men have been indicted on numerous counts and are scheduled to appear in court in late February; they have already pleaded not guilty to charges of fraud and failing to register as sex offenders.

Mr. Rodreick spent seven years in prison in Oklahoma for making lewd and indecent proposals to two 6-year-old boys. After being released in 2002, law enforcement officials said, he was able to convince Lonnie Stiffler, 61, and Robert J. Snow, 43, who had been trolling the Internet for boys, that he was a minor.

In 2005, he talked the two men into taking him from Oklahoma to live with them in Arizona, where Mr. Stiffler posed as Mr. Rodreick's grandfather and Mr. Snow as his uncle, and both men regularly had sex with him, the authorities said. Another man living in the house, Brian Nellis, 34, a sex offender Mr. Rodreick had met in prison, is believed to have aided Mr. Rodreick in the ruse, the authorities said.

Mr. Rodreick continued the charade as a minor for nearly two years, the authorities said, registering at four charter schools in Arizona, until this month, when school administrators in Chino Valley called the sheriff.

The police and school officials in each location where "Casey" enrolled said they knew of no children harmed, although the indictment against Mr. Rodreick includes an assault count. The authorities are trying to determine, with the help of videos confiscated from the men, if there were victims in the schools.

"With boys it is a really tough deal," said Lt. Van Gillock of the Police Department in El Reno, Okla., where Mr. Rodreick is believed to have posed as a 12-year-old to ingratiate himself with boys at church. "If they did it voluntarily, they have the stigma of homosexuality, and if it is forced, well, boys are supposed to be tough and the things the boys have on them gives them an embarrassment factor."

Though many parents have publicly praised the Surprise school's handling of the deception, Mr. Rodreick's enrollment has raised questions about admissions procedures, which officials at Imagine, one of the state's largest charter schools, said they were reviewing. Arizona, the nation's fastest-growing state, is a leader in charter school enrollment, with more than 450 schools that account for 8 percent of the state's total student body.

"He probably thought that a charter school was easier," said Candace Foth, another parent in Surprise. "It is not really difficult to enroll."

Mr. Rodreick's time in Arizona was the latest episode in a life speckled with disappointment, crimes and estrangement, according to relatives and law enforcement officials.

When he was growing up in Oklahoma, he was sexually abused by neighbors, said his mother's sister, Jan Bautista, with whom he lived briefly after his release from prison in 2002.

He was 18 in 1996 when the authorities in Chickasha, Okla., charged him with making lewd and indecent proposals to two 6-year-old boys. He was sentenced to 10 years in prison and released after serving 7.

From there, Ms. Bautista said, he made his way to San Bernardino County in California, where he stayed with her for about two months. Ms. Bautista said she asked Mr. Rodreick to leave after she found child pornography on her computer and suspected him of lewd acts toward a child. She said she turned her computer over to the sheriff.

"I really hate this man," she said. "I really do. I hope they keep him in prison the rest of his life, because I know he is never going to get well."

Mr. Rodreick next made his way to Kingfisher County in Oklahoma, where, according to the sheriff, Dennis Banther, he registered as a sex offender. Soon, he was joined in his mobile home in a secluded area by Mr. Nellis, who had served three years in prison after a conviction for lewd molestation, Sheriff Banther said. The two gravitated among fast-food restaurant jobs, the sheriff said, and were seen at a school playground, a library and parks.

The two left Kingfisher County in 2003 for El Reno, Okla., and trouble followed. In 2005, Lieutenant Gillock of the El Reno Police Department got a call from a computer rental store that had repossessed a computer Mr. Nellis had rented and found child pornography — more than 1,000 images and 150 videos.

While looking for Mr. Rodreick, Lieutenant Gillock stumbled upon his new life. He learned he had been posing as a 12-year-old named Casey and befriending families at a local church. He had spent the night with at least one boy, the lieutenant said, and traveled to the Grand Canyon, with Mr. Nellis in tow as his uncle, with another boy. And since at least late 2004, he said, Mr. Rodreick had been receiving Western Union money transfers from Mr. Stiffler.

Mr. Stiffler is the only one of the four who has not been convicted of a sexual offense, according to officials in Yavapai County. He spent most of his life in New Jersey, some of it married to a woman named Jill, who died in 1984, and with whom he had a daughter, according to Karen Svecz, his wife's sister.

Mr. Snow, who law enforcement officials say has been convicted of a sexual offense in California, lived mostly there until about 1985, when he moved to Arizona.

When Mr. Rodreick arrived in Arizona, he is believed to have first enrolled at the Shelby School in Peyson, where administrators say he attended under the name of Casy Rodreick for 21 days in 2005.

The next stop was Surprise, where the same "uncle" played the role of enroller again, presenting Mr. Rodreick as a 12-year-old. His concocted name, Casey Price, was that of a child in Oklahoma, the authorities there said.

"He absolutely looked age-appropriate," said Rhonda Cagle, a spokeswoman for Imagine Charter School, of Mr. Rodreick, who is listed on the Oklahoma Department of Corrections Web site as 5 feet 8 inches tall and 120 pounds. "We have several seventh-grade students who are taller and of a larger build than this individual."

Ms. Cagle said he was quiet and participated in no after school activities, eventually being expelled by school officials for poor attendance.

"He took all of the subjects our students take — math, social studies," she said. "By all accounts from the teachers, he was fairly quiet and withdrawn. He turned in homework, certainly didn't come off as brilliant or as someone needing extra help."

DOJ_NMG_0125349

After another effort to enroll in a school in Prescott Valley, the police say, Mr. Rodreick headed a bit north, to the Mingus Springs Charter School in Chino Valley, and this time, his "grandfather," Mr. Stiffler, took him to enroll on Jan. 16 toward the end of the day.

But administrators and staff members quickly grew suspicious, said Dawn Gonzales, the school director.

"The person posing as the child obviously looked older than 12," Ms. Gonzales said, although he was allowed to start class while they looked over his paperwork. Things were not right, there, either. Some records had Casey, others Casy. Different birth dates emerged.

The next day came, and so did Casey. "He did have the demeanor of a kid," Ms. Gonzales said. "He played that part very well. He appeared to be very shy. He kept his head down and spoke softly."

It wasn't working. "Every adult that encountered him said something here is not right," she said. "He just looked older. They kept saying, 'Are you sure he is 12?' "

When information on his enrollment forms turned out to be fiction, school officials, believing they had an abducted older child on their hands, called the Yavapai sheriff's office.

"In my wildest imagination I could not have dreamt up," what was discovered, Ms. Gonzales said.

The authorities said Mr. Stiffler and Mr. Snow were shocked, too, and angry about being duped by an adult posing as a minor.

Ms. Cagle said her school in Surprise learned about their "Casey" on the evening news. "Needless to say, our staff is devastated," she said. "This individual violated a sense of community that we all share. This is something that is bigger than our school. It affects the way we live and the way we look at each other."

US Audit Found More Problems At Crime Lab (BOS)

By Jonathan Saltzman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 1, 2007

A federal inspection of the State Police crime laboratory completed in September found problems with the handling of DNA evidence that go beyond those that prompted the agency to suspend a civilian administrator and led to two sweeping reviews of the lab.

Auditors from the US Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General concluded that the laboratory entered incomplete genetic profiles into its computerized database in 12 cases of a sample of 100 involving unidentified suspects who left DNA at crimes scenes, making the profiles inadequate.

The auditors also found instances in which laboratory officials entered the same genetic profile under two different ID numbers in the database and failed to follow FBI protocols for analyzing profiles and double-checking results, according to an executive summary of the inspection report.

In addition, the summary said, the laboratory waited nearly eight months to confirm a tentative match between DNA from a crime scene and DNA from a convicted felon whose genetic profile was entered into the database. Federal guidelines call for confirmation within 30 days.

The lab underwent a private inspection for work performed in 2005, but failed to pass the report on to the FBI for almost seven months, not immediately as required. In all, the federal audit cited seven categories of problems. It did not specifically mention the suspended administrator, but did appear to focus on duties he performed.

Apart from those deficiencies, the auditors said the lab "generally complied" with federal standards for labs that participate in the nationwide Combined DNA Index System, or CODIS. That database allows law enforcement officials, seeking to match suspects to crimes, to electronically compare more than 3.1 million DNA profiles.

The State Police had not disclosed the existence of the federal report since Jan. 12, when the agency announced the suspension of Robert E. Pino , the civilian administrator in charge of the state's DNA indexing system.

The State Police said Colonel Mark Delaney, superintendent of the force, launched an internal investigation in mid-November after discovering that Pino mishandled test results in 15 sexual assault cases. In 11 of those cases, the agency has said, Pino failed to report matches to police departments for months, making it impossible for prosecutors to pursue charges.

The State Police had said the internal investigation began after a Hampden County police officer complained to the lab about receiving late notification of a match.

Kelly A. Nantel , a spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Public Safety, which oversees the State Police, said yesterday the federal inspection played no role in Delaney starting the internal investigation in November.

However, she said, it confirms the need for the comprehensive analysis that the Patrick administration announced last week. It has asked for proposals for an independent management consultant who would be paid up to $250,000 to evaluate all operations at the crime laboratory.

Meanwhile, Delaney has brought in the FBI to review its DNA database. The FBI has downloaded more than 21,000 DNA profiles and is focusing on 622 matches that have been made since 2001, a State Police spokesman has said.

Nantel said the State Police did not mention the federal audit because it was a routine review and added that the agency has addressed the deficiencies cited by the auditors. A State Police spokeswoman said the department had no comment yesterday because it was too busy responding to the series of bomb scares across Boston.

Cynthia A. Schnedar , counselor to the Inspector General, declined to comment on the details of the audit or to characterize the seriousness of the lapses. But she released a document showing her agency performed 18 audits of US crime laboratories with DNA databases in fiscal 2004 and 2005 and found more than a dozen cases in which labs entered genetic profiles that violated federal standards.

DNA matching has become the gold standard for forensic identifications since the late 1980s, but it has not been without problems. Originally, the databases were designed to store genetic profiles of sexual offenders. But many states, including Massachusetts, have expanded them to include samples from all convicted felons, overwhelming laboratory employees and causing mammoth delays. In addition, the Justice Department fails to check to see whether police departments follow up on matches, making it impossible to assess how well the databases are being used.

Carll Ladd , the supervisor of the DNA unit at the Connecticut State Police crime laboratory, said auditors from the inspector general's office are sticklers and will invariably find problems. Nonetheless, he said, some of the lapses highlighted in the Massachusetts lab struck him as unacceptable, including the finding that 12 percent of the genetic profiles sampled by the auditors were incomplete. "I don't believe we have anything like 12 percent of our forensic unknown profiles that are incomplete," he said in a telephone interview yesterday. "I don't think we have any."

The Massachusetts State Police lab, which wrestled with a backlog in DNA analyses that reached 1,000 cases in 2005, has come under fire since the agency said Pino failed to forward DNA matches in 11 sexual assault cases dating to the 1980s to police departments before the 15-year statute of limitations on rape cases had run out.

In addition, Pino prepared reports saying DNA results in four cases matched the genetic material from old rape kits when they had not. No one was arrested in those cases, State Police said, because someone discovered the mistakes.

State lawmakers, who increased funding to the lab from $6.2 million in fiscal 2005 to $16.2 million in fiscal 2007, are demanding answers about the problems.

The lapses at the lab have also prompted defense lawyers and advocates for several well-known convicted felons to scrutinize DNA evidence in their cases. The felons include Edward S. O'Brien , convicted in 1997 for murdering his best friend's mother; Christopher M. McCowen , convicted last year of murdering Truro fashion writer Christa Worthington ; and Benjamin LaGuer , convicted in 1984 of raping a Leominster woman.

Pino, who has been suspended with pay, has denied wrongdoing but said little to reporters. On Monday, he told the Globe that he had hired a lawyer, Michael J. O'Reilly , and looked forward to the hiring of the outside consultant to review all operations at the forensic laboratory.

"When that thing is done, I know my name will be cleared," he said.

A Governor Stands Up (WP)

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

ABOLISHING Maryland's death penalty did not figure in Martin O'Malley's successful campaign for governor last year or in his announced agenda for this year's session of the state legislature. So the path of least resistance would have been for him to say nothing, or very little, in response to opponents of capital punishment, who are clamoring for its repeal. Instead, he has joined their fight. In doing so he has lent his fledgling administration a sense of purpose and moral clarity.

The governor, who has long opposed capital punishment, could probably have achieved his policy goals by doing nothing. In December, Maryland's Court of Appeals effectively halted executions by ruling that the state's procedures for lethal injections were adopted without adequate legislative oversight. In the absence of a legislative remedy to restart what are already infrequent executions, Mr. O'Malley could have sat back and enjoyed four years as governor without having a single death warrant land on his desk for signature.

Instead, he has joined growing calls around the country to do away with state-sponsored killings, which have been shown repeatedly to be error-prone with regard to guilt or innocence; wildly expensive to prosecute; racially tilted against killers whose victims are white; arbitrarily pursued depending on jurisdiction; and ineffective as a deterrent to the most vicious crimes. Across the country, Americans' queasiness with capital punishment has grown steadily, particularly as DNA evidence has pointed to mistaken convictions. The number of executions carried out last year (53) was the lowest in a decade. While most citizens still approve of capital punishment, the support has dwindled. Recent polls suggest a majority would prefer the option of imposing a life sentence in prison without the possibility of parole.

That is what a commission of law enforcement officials and victims' representatives has recently advocated in New Jersey, and that is what would be achieved in Maryland by a bill sponsored by state Sen. Lisa A. Gladden and Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrats. Mr. O'Malley is on record as saying that he favors the bill and will work for its passage.

Although his governorship is just a few weeks old, Mr. O'Malley showed himself as a candidate and a governor-elect to be cautious and reluctant to get out in front on issues. That's not necessarily a bad thing in a public official feeling his way in a new job. But by setting down his marker on the death penalty, on whose merits Marylanders remain divided, Mr. O'Malley has shown political courage and a glimpse of the gritty resolve that he claimed as his legacy as mayor of Baltimore.

CIVIL LAW:

WellPoint Pays $975,000 To Settle U.S. Allegations (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Duncan Moore

Bloomberg, February 1, 2007

Jan. 31 (Bloomberg) -- A unit of WellPoint Inc., the second- biggest U.S. health insurance provider, agreed to pay $975,000 to settle allegations of overcharging the government in Missouri, the U.S. Justice Department said.

The settlement resolves claims that the WellPoint medical insurance unit made false claims against the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, the government said today in a statement. The U.S. alleged that WellPoint's subsidiary paid higher rates to a network of physicians than the doctors received from other plans, passing the inflated costs to the government.

Ronald Ekstrand, a former WellPoint employee, initiated the case with a whistleblower suit under the Civil War-era False Claims Act. Total U.S. and state recoveries under the law since 1986 exceed $20 billion, with almost $1 billion announced in the first quarter of fiscal 2007, according to Taxpayers Against Fraud, a Washington-based group that tracks the litigation.

The settlement ``should send a signal to all health-care providers who receive federal funds that we are committed to protecting the health-care system from fraud or abuse," said Catherine Hanaway, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Missouri, in the statement.

Ekstrand, the whistleblower, will receive $165,750 of the payment under a provision in the False Claims Act intended to encourage private individuals to expose frauds against the government. The government reviews such cases and decides whether to take part.

WellPoint acquired the Missouri subsidiary, St. Louis-based RightChoice Managed Care Inc., in 2002. The unit was renamed Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield. WellPoint, based in Indianapolis, operates Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans in 14 states and ranks second in revenue behind Minnetonka, Minnesota- based UnitedHealth Group Inc.

``The company maintains that fees paid were reasonable and competitive with the fees paid by other health plans in the same market," said Deb Wiethop, spokeswoman for Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield in St. Louis, in a telephone interview. ``They also were in full compliance with federal regulations and Office of Personnel Management guidance."

The company settled ``to put the litigation behind us," she added. ``By settling this case, we don't believe it implies that any of our operational practices were improper."

RightCHOICE Settles With U.S. For $975,000 (SLBIZ)

St Louis Business Journal, February 1, 2007

RightChoice Managed Care Inc. agreed to pay $975,000 to resolve allegations that it overcharged the Federal Employees Health Benefits (FEHB) Program, U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway and the Justice Department said Wednesday.

The arrangement settles allegations that RightCHOICE violated the False Claims Act in connection with providing health-care benefits to federal employees and their dependents in the state of Missouri.

RightCHOICE does business from the downtown St. Louis offices of Blue Cross Blue Shield of Missouri, located at 1831 Chestnut St.

The government alleged that RightCHOICE, which participates in the FEHB Program as part of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Service Benefit Plan (SBP), passed on excessive costs to the FEHB Program in connection with compensating a preferred provider network of physicians known as "Alliance." The government contended that RightCHOICE paid higher fees to Alliance physicians for serving patients insured through the SBP than these same physicians were reimbursed for providing the same types of services to patients insured through various other health plans. The government also alleged the physicians passed on these higher rates to the Office of Personnel Management as purportedly "reasonable" costs to the FEHB.

The civil settlement resolves claims brought under the qui tam provisions of the False Claims Act by Ronald Ekstrand against Wellpoint Health Networks Inc., the entity into which RightCHOICE merged in January 2002.

Ekstrand will receive $165,750 of the total recovery as his statutory award for his suit filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri. Under the qui tam provisions of the False Claims Act, private individuals can bring whistleblower actions for fraud on behalf of the United States and collect a share of any proceeds recovered by the suit as well as attorney fees.

Indianapolis-based WellPoint (NYSE: WLP) is the parent company of health insurance providers Blue Cross Blue Shield of Missouri, HealthLink and UniCare.

Initial Settlement Proposal For Radio Payola: $10 Million (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, February 1, 2007

The nation's four largest radio broadcasters would make payments and other contributions valued at about $10 million under a proposed settlement of a year-long probe by the Federal Communications Commission into pay-for-play claims in the music industry, say FCC officials and others with direct knowledge of the matter.

While the FCC's three Republicans generally have backed less-punitive terms, Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps have been pushing for tougher concessions, FCC officials say. The officials requested anonymity because the proceeding is pending.

The investigation centers on claims that radio stations owned by Clear Channel Communications, CBS Radio, Entercom Communications and Citadel Broadcasting have accepted cash or gifts, known as payola, from major music labels in exchange for playing their releases.

Under settlement terms proposed several weeks ago, the broadcasters would devote $7 million of airtime to independently produced music. The radio giants also would pay $3 million to a fund for the National Association of Broadcasters to provide training to member stations to stop payola.

But some FCC officials are concerned that the agency doesn't have the authority to require such contributions. As a result, the original proposal was expected to be pulled Wednesday night. A new proposal is expected to require the broadcasters to pay a more traditional penalty of $10 million to $15 million to the U.S. Treasury, say people with direct knowledge of the matter. They would not be identified because the proposal is still subject to negotiation.

In addition, the companies would draft compliance plans detailing which practices are unacceptable. FCC Democrats worried the original proposal did not give the agency sufficient oversight.

The FCC probe grew out of an investigation by former New York attorney general Eliot Spitzer that has yielded settlements with four major music labels, as well as Entercom and CBS Radio, which agreed to pay $4.2 million and $2 million, respectively. Those payments just cover violations by radio stations in New York state.

"I would hope there would be significant penalties" and a long-term commitment to weave independent music into playlists in the FCC deal, says Michael Bracy, of the Future of Music Coalition, which supports independent artists.

Independent artists say payola squeezes them off the radio dial because they can't afford to fork over the goodies. The practice also deceives consumers into believing song selections on the radio are based on their appeal to listeners, Spitzer said last year.

Tobacco Giant Reasserts Itself As Calls For Va. Smoking Ban Grow (WP)

By Amy Gardner

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

RICHMOND -- Not too many years ago, all tobacco lobbyist Charlie Davis had to do to ensure swift defeat of anti-smoking legislation was to lean into the microphone at a committee hearing and say, "Philip Morris opposes this bill."

Times have changed for Philip Morris USA at the Virginia General Assembly. Lawmakers are voting this week on several bills to restrict smoking in restaurants and other public places, bills that are closer than ever to approval. And Philip Morris, the Richmond-based tobacco giant and emblem of the historic role that the golden leaf has played in Virginia's prosperity, suddenly has something to worry about.

"They're scared, and they should be scared," said Teresa Gregson, a lobbyist for the American Heart Association. "It's just a matter of time before this passes."

For two years, in part to improve a public image tarnished by the ill effects of smoking, Philip Morris announced no position on proposed smoking bans across the nation. But in Virginia this year, Davis and other company representatives are meeting with lawmakers -- in their offices or in the corridors -- to steer them away from the more restrictive proposals, lawmakers said.

"Charlie grabbed me in the hall and asked me where I was," said Del. Ward L. Armstrong (D-Henry), who represents a swath of Southside Virginia once dependent on tobacco. "I told him I think we need to move the ball forward this year, maybe with a restaurant ban."

Davis declined to comment, referring inquiries to Philip Morris. Company spokesman David Sutton confirmed that Philip Morris is "engaging" lawmakers this year to shape what he termed a "reasonable" regulation of smoking in public spaces.

A number of bills are making their way through the legislature. Sutton would not say which proposals are acceptable to the company. A bill banning smoking in most public spaces and workplaces failed in a House subcommittee Friday, and a bill that requires restaurants to display a sign if smoking is permitted was passed.

Another version of the broader bill emerged from the Senate on Wednesday and is headed to the House of Delegates.

In part because of general anti-regulatory views in the legislature, approval of the bans is not assured. But because tobacco-growing regions have less influence than in the past -- and because of growing pressure from such vote-rich suburban regions as Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- more and more lawmakers, Republican and Democratic, are seeking smoking bans in workplaces, bars, restaurants and other places.

"I'm a cancer survivor. My father has lung cancer," said John A. Cosgrove (R-Chesapeake), who is promoting the Virginia Indoor Clean Air Act, which would prohibit smoking in most restaurants that open after July 1, 2008. "I don't want to just say that the state's going to step in and make these sweeping changes in one fell swoop. But it's time to do something."

Philip Morris, the world's largest cigarette maker and perhaps the most powerful emblem of Virginia's tobacco heritage, has for years used its considerable resources to protect its interests in the political realm. Last year alone, Philip Morris's parent company, Altria, gave nearly $250,000 to Virginia candidates and committees, according to the nonprofit Virginia Public Access Project.

The company chose in 2005 and 2006 not to lobby against proposed smoking bans across the nation, said Sutton, the company spokesman. Davis, the lobbyist, stopped attending the committee meetings at which lawmakers took up smoking bans.

It was a dramatic departure, and proposed smoking bans began popping up in greater numbers in Virginia, where lawmakers have historically stood among Philip Morris's most staunch defenders.

Instead of fighting such measures, the company began issuing statements such as this one:

"Philip Morris USA believes people should be able to avoid secondhand smoke, particularly in places where they must go, such as public buildings, public transit and many workplaces. They also should be guided by public health officials regarding the health effects of secondhand smoke."

Even House Majority Leader H. Morgan Griffith, an anti-regulation Republican and self-described libertarian, is sponsoring a bill, the one that would require restaurants that permit smoking to post clearly visible signs near their entrances. Advocates of a ban don't think Griffith's bill would do much. But Griffith said it is a compromise that would spare most employers from burdensome regulation while protecting patrons.

"The people in my district want more restaurants that are smoke-free, and they are somewhat frustrated that a majority of restaurants haven't gone that way without government action," Griffith said.

Bans have gained in popularity more quickly in other states as awareness has grown about the health risks of secondhand smoke. After New York City enacted its ban four years ago, many jurisdictions followed suit, including a number of Maryland counties and the District, which last month extended its smoking ban to bars.

The pressure is growing in Virginia. Doctors, cancer survivors, parents and others are pressuring state lawmakers to do something to protect them. And more and more lawmakers are listening.

"I know that Virginia was founded on tobacco," said Del. Vincent F. Callahan Jr., a Republican from McLean whose wife, a longtime smoker, died several years ago of lung disease. "They came over here looking for gold, and they found tobacco, and it was good for them. It wasn't good for Virginians, though. The time has come to put an end to smoking in restaurants."

With such sentiments more prevalent than ever, Philip Morris is working harder to shape anti-smoking legislation. But even in Richmond, where the crop was once known as King Tobacco and where lawmakers may smoke in their offices, it might not be enough. Change is coming, say even the most stalwart defenders of tobacco, and the most they can do is slow the pace of change.

"At some point, we're going to ban smoking in public places in this state," said Del. Watkins M. Abbitt Jr. (I-Appomattox), who on Friday sported a tie printed with dozens of golden tobacco leaves. "But I'd rather crawl before I walk or I run."

Few Fraud Cases Rush To Medicaid Unit (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Filed at 10:36 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- More than half the states are sending few Medicaid fraud cases to special units established to pursue the wrongdoing, averaging less than one referral a month, The Associated Press learned Wednesday.

"These states were rural, urban, small, large, from all regions of the country," the internal watchdog for the Health and Human Services Department found.

Medicaid is the medical insurance program for the poor and is financed by the states and the federal government.

When fraud is suspected, the state Medicaid agency does the initial investigation and is supposed to turn over cases to be pursued to Medicaid Fraud Control Units -- usually part of a state's attorney general's office.

On average, states spend about 18 percent of their own money on Medicaid. It is the second largest program in most state budgets, following elementary and secondary education.

The HHS inspector general, Daniel Levinson, studied the referrals for the three-year period from July 2002 through June 2005. He found:

--Twenty-six of the Medicaid fraud units reported accepting, on average, no more than one referral a month from their state Medicaid agencies. Acceptance means the fraud unit retains the case for further investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0125355

--Twenty-one fraud control units said that in the last year of the study, they received fewer than 12 referrals each from state Medicaid agencies, an average of less than one referral per month.

--In that last year, Arkansas and Connecticut had only two referrals, South Dakota had four, Virginia reported eight and Wyoming 11.

--Only three fraud units received more than 100 referrals in the last year of the study: Florida (215), Arizona (192) and Texas (180). California, with the largest Medicaid program based on enrollment, reported 79.

The report found that while the referrals from state Medicaid agencies increased from 1,161 in 2002-03 to 1,403 and 1,470 in the next two years, the numbers are deceiving. Most of the increase came from one state, Florida.

"In fact, more than half of (the fraud units) actually reported receiving fewer referrals from their respective state Medicaid agency in the last year of our review, compared to the average number of referrals in all three years," the inspector general said.

Jeff Nelligan, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said, "Fighting fraud in the Medicaid program is exceedingly important to CMS, both in terms of providing better service to our beneficiaries and in saving taxpayer dollars."

He said the federal agency is establishing standards that would allow evaluation of a state's performance in referring fraud cases.

Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee, was critical of the efforts of some states.

"You can't recover what doesn't get reported," Grassley said. "And if ... state agencies are reporting only part of the fraud, then whistle-blowers and others probably account for a good part of the rest of recoveries that would otherwise be lost to Medicaid fraud."

Grassley has pushed for legislation that would encourage states to reward whistle-blowers financially.

The study excluded seven states:

--Idaho and North Dakota were granted waivers from establishing fraud control units.

--Nebraska established its unit toward the end of the study period.

--Kentucky, New York, Oregon and Utah fraud units responded, but the information provided was not complete enough for analysis.

The report said the federal Medicare and Medicaid agency has not created performance standards for state Medicaid agencies and therefore could not determine how well the state Medicaid agencies performed.

The report attempted to rank the performance of state agencies and did not take into account state budgets, a state's Medicaid expenditures, claims volume or the number of providers and beneficiaries.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Agency Targets Human Trade (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday created a Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit and assigned it the task of developing strategies to combat modern-day slavery and expand the Justice Department's anti-trafficking enforcement programs.

"With the creation of the Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit, we will expand and enhance our ability to fight this crime by working together with federal, state and local investigators to tackle the enormous challenges posed by this evil," Mr. Gonzales said. "We will continue to develop new ways to help victims and to bring their captors to justice."

Human trafficking often involves the recruitment and smuggling of foreign nationals into the United States for forced labor and illicit sexual activity.

Mr. Gonzales said the unit will work to enhance the department's investigation and prosecution of significant human trafficking and slavery cases, such as multijurisdictional cases and those involving financial crimes.

It will be led, he said, by prosecutors who have brought cases against traffickers and "freed hundreds of foreign and domestic victims from sex trafficking in brothels and forced labor in fields, homes and factories."

The prosecutors include Robert Moossy, who will head up the unit, chief counsel Lou de Baca and special litigation counsels Hilary Axam and Andrew Kline, who the attorney general said bring "significant anti-slavery experience to this effort and have been leaders in developing the modern victim-centered approach to human trafficking investigations and prosecutions."

Mr. Gonzales has made combating human trafficking a top priority. In the past six years, the department has increased by sixfold the number of human trafficking cases filed, quadrupled the number of defendants charged and tripled the number of defendants convicted.

In fiscal 2006, the department began 168 investigations, charged 111 defendants in 32 cases and obtained 98 convictions. In fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1, the department has initiated 60 investigations, charged 26 defendants in eight cases and obtained 36 convictions.

The prosecutions have included:

•An April 2005 case involving Mexican nationals Josue Flores Carreto, Gerardo Flores Carreto and Daniel Perez Alonso, who pleaded guilty to 27 counts relating to a sex trafficking ring. According to an indictment, the men recruited young women from Mexico over a 13-year period, smuggled them into the United States and forced them into prostitution in New York City. The Carreto brothers were sentenced to 50 years in prison, and Alonso received 25 years.

•A November 2006 case involving Jefferson Calimlim Sr. and his wife, Elnora, both doctors in Milwaukee, who were each sentenced to four years in prison for forcing a woman to work as their domestic servant and illegally harboring her for 19 years in their residence. They were convicted of using threats of serious harm and physical restraint against their victim, whom they brought from the Philippines when she was a teenager.

U.S. Intensifies Fight Against Human Trafficking (CNN)

CNN, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The United States has launched hundreds of new investigations to combat human trafficking for prostitution and labor exploitation inside its borders, U.S. authorities have announced.

Calling human trafficking "the equivalent of modern day slavery," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales vowed on Wednesday to keep the issue a top priority for federal law enforcement agencies.

The Justice Department also has created a unit designed to pursue human trafficking cases, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Wan Kim.

Justice authorities said it would be the first time the Civil Rights Division would have a team of lawyers working exclusively on human trafficking cases.

The unit initially will have four attorneys experienced in prosecuting human trafficking cases, Kim said.

Justice Department and FBI officials said they are using more attorneys and investigators to find and prosecute international human trafficking rings, which lure primarily young women from Asian, Eastern European and Latin American countries to the United States with false promises of jobs and husbands.

"This is a perversion of the American dream. The American dream is used as a lure to attract victims," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim said.

Kim said the degree of coercion may vary, "But nobody signs up for involuntary servitude."

A senior U.S. Justice Department official estimated about 15,000 victims of human trafficking arrive in the United States annually, some as young as 9 years old, destined for jobs in brothels, as unpaid domestic servants, or in other jobs as virtual slaves.

The victims represent a source of continuing income for the rings that provide them, making human trafficking more attractive than drug smuggling to some criminal syndicates, authorities said.

The FBI said it currently has 212 ongoing human trafficking investigations, and the Justice Department said it had initiated 60 investigations in the past four months.

DOJ_NMG_0125357

Authorities cite a sixfold increase in the number of cases filed compared with the level of five years ago, and say that reflects both a growing problem and an increased federal law enforcement emphasis. Last year, federal prosecutors charged 222 defendants and won 98 convictions.

Kim disputed critics who have contended human trafficking has been pursued at the expense of traditional civil rights cases.

"Most of the victims are women and minorities. I'd quarrel with anyone who says this is not a core civil rights mission," Kim said. "And we've not fallen short on pursuing traditional civil rights cases."

CNN's Terry Frieden contributed to this report.

New Justice Agency Will Fight Human Trafficking

The Justice Department is creating a unit to pursue human-trafficking cases that often involve foreigners smuggled into the country for forced labor or prostitution, the attorney general said yesterday.

"Human trafficking remains a serious problem here in the United States. I think too many of our citizens believe that this is something only occurring on foreign shores," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said.

"It is a form of modern-day slavery," he told reporters in announcing the new unit within the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division.

Gonzales said it would be the first time that the division would have a team of lawyers working exclusively on human-trafficking cases, an acknowledgment that it has become a serious problem.

The unit initially will have four lawyers experienced in prosecuting such cases.Clones Cannot Be Organic, USDA Says

On the heels of the Food and Drug Administration's determination in December that milk and meat from cloned farm animals is safe to eat, the Agriculture Department weighed in on whether those clones may be deemed organic if they are raised organically.

The National Organic Program, which oversees organic certification for the USDA, announced on its Web site that animal cloning is a non-organic production method and that clones, by definition, cannot be considered organic.

Still unresolved is whether the conventionally conceived offspring of clones -- which are more likely to be milked and slaughtered because the clones themselves are so valuable -- can be deemed organic. USDA and its Organic Standards Board will propose a federal rule to deal with that question, the announcement said.Judge Delays Hearings Of 16 at Guantanamo

Sixteen lawsuits by Guantanamo Bay detainees were put on hold by a federal judge who said he may no longer have jurisdiction to hear their cases.

U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton in Washington said the Military Commissions Act, signed into law in October, has left him unable to consider whether the detainees can challenge being jailed at the Marine facility in Cuba.

An appeals court in Washington is considering whether civilian jurists can rule on those cases. Until that issue is resolved, Walton said, "it is this court's view that it lacks the authority to take any action in these cases."

Walton's six-page order denying the motions challenging detention of the 16 men left open the possibility of refiling the requests if the appeals court decides civilian courts can review detainee cases.

If the appeals panel "concludes that this court retains some degree of jurisdiction over any or all of the above-captioned cases, the matters will be automatically reopened as appropriate," he wrote.

There was no immediate response from the Justice Department.

The New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the detainees, said that Walton's decision will delay justice for an estimated 200 detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

Local Woman Guilty In Sex-trafficking Case (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125358

A key figure in a human-trafficking ring Monday admitted to luring underage girls to West Tennessee from Mexico and forcing them into prostitution.

Cristina Andres Perfecto pleaded guilty in federal court to two counts of commercial sex trafficking, charges that could result in a lifetime prison sentence.

Perfecto and her partner, Juan Mendez, were charged in November after a series of raids and the arrest of several men for running brothels in Memphis. They were using prostitutes they enticed from Latin America and elsewhere.

Mendez remains under indictment on two counts of child sex trafficking and a count of conspiracy to harbor an illegal alien. If convicted, he too faces a sentence of life in prison.

Perfecto admitted that she told two girls, who were 13 and 17, that they would be working at a restaurant in Nashville, all the while knowing that they would be forced into prostitution in Nashville and Memphis.

She said Mendez terrorized the victims and their families to make them engage in prostitution. Perfecto admitted she instructed the girls on the business of sex for money.

Nine other defendants pleaded guilty earlier this month to crimes including child sex trafficking, money laundering conspiracy, enticing an individual to travel interstate for prostitution, and failure to file factual statements about an illegal alien.

Man To Spend 13 Years In Prison

BOSTON -- A federal judge sentenced two Massachusetts residents who arranged for a child to work as a prostitute in five New England states.

Robert Williams will spend nearly 13 years in prison, while Brooke Denman will serve three years probation.

A third person, Dawn Young, has not yet been sentenced.

All three pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to use a minor for prostitution activities in Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire.

The offenses occurred between October 2000 and September 2002.

They allegedly took some or all of the girl's earnings and helped her obtain false identification documents.

The girl served as a prostitute between the ages of 13 and 15.

Body Identified As Fishing Boat's Captain (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 1, 2007

The state medical examiner's office has identified the body recovered from the submerged fishing vessel Lady of Grace as that of Antonio Barroqueiro, according to Cape and Island District Attorney Michael Trudeau. Barroqueiro, 50, was captain of the New Bedford commercial dragger, which sank about 12 miles north of Nantucket after it went missing Friday. Divers found Barroqueiro's body Monday in the vessel's wheelhouse, but were unable to search the enclosed areas of the ship because of leaking oil and other hazards, State Police Sergeant Robert Bousquet said. The State Police dive team will make more attempts to recover the remains of the three other fishermen who had been on the sunken boat, Bousquet said.

Green-Rainbow's Ross fined for speeding Grace Ross, the former Green-Rainbow Party candidate for governor, appeared in Palmer District Court last week on charges of driving with a suspended license and speeding, The Republican newspaper of Springfield reported. Ross, 45, of Worcester, was pulled over by State Police on Oct. 25 for going 80 in a 65 mile-per-hour zone. Ross later said her license should never have been suspended and attributed it to a problem with the Registry of Motor Vehicles involving insurance coverage, the newspaper reported. Judge Patricia T. Poehler dismissed the suspended license charge but found Ross responsible for speeding. She was fined $50 and charged another $50 in court costs, which she paid, the newspaper reported.

Man sentenced for sex trafficking of child A Revere man was sentenced in federal court Tuesday to 12 years and seven months in prison for arranging for a 13-year-old girl to work as a prostitute in August 2000, then driving her to Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island to perform sexual acts over the next two years. Robert Williams , 49, was sentenced by US District Judge Joseph L. Tauro on charges of conspiracy, transporting a minor in interstate commerce to engage in prostitution, and sex trafficking of children. Brooke Deman , 30, of Lynn, who played a lesser role in the conspiracy, was sentenced yesterday to probation. The FBI and US Department of Justice investigated the case as part of the Innocence Lost initiative, a crackdown on interstate sex trafficking involving children.

Ex-property manager convicted of larceny A Suffolk Superior Court jury convicted Darryl Gately on Tuesday of two counts of larceny over $250, said Jake Wark, a spokesman for Suffolk District Attorney Daniel Conley. Gately, 42, of Winchester, a former property manager, was convicted of taking $110,000 in rent money from people living on Broadway in Cambridge in 2001 and depositing it in his personal bank account. Gately was also convicted of depositing about $73,000 in rent money from tenants on Commonwealth Avenue in Boston in 1999 and 2001 .

Pedestrian is injured in hit-run accident Police were looking yesterday for a driver who fled the scene of an accident in which a pedestrian was hit at the entrance to the Massachusetts Turnpike in Newton Corner. A Newton man suffered internal injuries when he was struck at 7:17 p.m. Tuesday, police said. Witnesses said the victim, 59, was in the crosswalk when a vehicle ran a red light and struck him. The driver stopped then fled westbound on the turnpike. The victim, who was not identified, was taken to Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston. Police described the vehicle as a small, older white Toyota Tercel, Nissan Sentra, or Geo Prism. It had a white license plate with a blue heading. Anyone with information is urged to call Newton police at 617-796-2106.

FBI Investigates Fatal Shooting (LONGNJ)

By Sherry Koonce

Longview (TX) News-Journal, February 1, 2007

Family seeks documents; Officials trying to determine if civil rights were violated

The family of a 21-year-old man who was fatally shot by a Gregg County sheriff's deputy on New Year's Eve is calling for the release of documents entered in the case.

At the same time, the FBI is conducting an investigation to determine whether the victim's civil rights were violated.

On Wednesday, Tyler attorney Domingo A. Garcia accused the sheriff's department of stonewalling in its refusal to turn over videotape from the deputy's squad car, witnesses or the deputy's statements.

Sheriff's Officer Roy Nixon has been assigned to administrative duty while investigators look into the shooting death. Abel Jaimes, who has also gone by the name of Abel Jaimes Benitez, died after he was shot by Nixon during a suspected DWI traffic stop at FM 1252 near Liberty city on Dec. 31.

Sheriff Maxey Cerliano said because the shooting was under investigation, no additional information will be released.

"We have released the appropriate amount of information at this time, and will not release any more until the investigation is complete," he said.

Following a press conference Wednesday in Tyler, Garcia said the family had requested that the FBI investigate the case.

Peter Galbraith, supervisory senior resident agent with the Tyler FBI office, said the department had an open civil rights color of law investigation into the case.

Galbraith described the investigation is "pretty standard" when there has been a shooting death by a law enforcement agent.

The department will conduct a preliminary investigation and forward findings to the Department of Justice.

"They will determine whether a civil rights violation has occurred or whether prosecution should go forth," he said.

Garcia said his firm had been retained by the victim's family to investigate numerous questions surrounding the shooting death.

"The family wants to know why are they (the sheriff's department) hiding and keeping these public documents from them and the citizens of Gregg County," Garcia said.

Garcia said the family is awaiting autopsy results that should show whether Jaimes was shot in the front or back.

The next step is to obtain hospital and medical examiners records, Garcia said. If the sheriff's department does not release videotapes, the family has indicated intentions to file a federal civil rights lawsuit, so a judge can subpoena those records.

Nixon is a 10-year law enforcement officer. He had been a Gregg County sheriff's deputy for about six months when the shooting occurred. Prior to that, he served in the Gladewater and Kilgore police departments.

The shooting death is the second in three years involving Gregg County. In October 2003, Roger Lee Crossland, a 19-year-old Longview man, died from a single gunshot wound to the head while fighting with officer Mark Polk over a gun. Polk was cleared of any wrongdoing in the case.

Witnesses' Memories A Challenge In Reopening 1964 Case, Professor Says (AP)

By Emily Wagster Pettus, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

JACKSON - Witnesses' potentially fading memories could present a challenge in the prosecution of a reputed Ku Klux Klansman who faces federal kidnapping charges in the 1964 abduction, beating and drowning of two black teenagers in Mississippi, a law professor says.

Mark A. Godsey, professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Law, said some witnesses might have fading memories, while others might recall details about what happened on May 2, 1964, when prosecutors say two 19-year-old hitchhikers - Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee - were seized and killed.

“Something like this doesn't happen every day. It could be something that is very traumatic to witnesses,” said Godsey, who's faculty director and lead counsel for the Lois and Richard Rosenthal Institute for Justice/Ohio Innocence Project, where he represents convicted inmates who seek new trials because evidence such as DNA has emerged.

Reputed Klansman James Ford Seale, 71, has been jailed outside Jackson since federal authorities arrested him last Wednesday in Roxie, the tiny southwest Mississippi town where he lives in a motor home on land owned by his stepdaughter and her husband. He pleaded not guilty Thursday to three charges of kidnapping and conspiracy.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda R. Anderson denied Seale bond Monday, saying he was a flight risk because he has no job or property, is a pilot and lives in a vehicle that can be driven away. Anderson also said she had concerns because Seale concealed from federal authorities that he has a brother living in Louisiana.

Seale's trial is set for April 2, but that could be pushed back.

Paige Fitzgerald, an attorney for the Justice Department's civil rights division, said Seale took part in "a crime so horrific it boggles the mind."

Prosecutors say Klansmen seized Dee and Moore, took them to the Homochitto National Forest and beat them, then drove north to a site near Vicksburg where they tied heavy metal objects to the still living teenagers and tossed them into the Mississippi River. Their bodies were found about two months later as authorities dragged the river in search of three civil-rights workers who had disappeared about 180 miles away in Neshoba County.

Defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the charges against Seale, arguing that the statute of limitations has expired.

Godsey, in a telephone interview this week from Ohio, said there might be a constitutional problem in filing charges four decades after a crime is committed "if the prosecution had all the evidence and just sat on it." But the professor said there might not be a problem if new evidence becomes available.

Federal authorities reopened an investigation after The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson published documents in 2000 showing the attack on Dee and Moore took place in a national forest.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards has been cooperating with authorities the past few months.

Seale, wearing an orange jail jumpsuit and shackled at the ankles and wrists, showed little emotion after Anderson denied the bond. About an hour earlier, as he entered the courtroom, he smiled at his wife, seven other relatives and a family pastor who sat on the front row. One female relative blew him a kiss, and Seale waved, barely able to extend his hand because of the chains.

Seale's court-appointed public defenders requested that he be let out of jail without having to put up money for a bond because he has little income and lives off Social Security payments. They cited his lack of a job and a litany of complicated health problems, including a history of high blood pressure, back pain, kidney and bladder cancer, and emphysema so severe that he has to sleep under an oxygen tent.

Seale's wife, Jean, sat with her hands folded in her lap as she testified about her husband's medical problems and about where the couple has lived since they married in 1995 - most of the time in Roxie and part of the time near Demopolis, Ala., where they have relatives.

"He can't walk very far, and a lot of days he can't even get out of the motor home," Jean Seale testified.

She said her husband is under the care of five doctors and has problems with his left leg from having had polio earlier in life.

Fitzgerald asked Jean Seale whether the couple lives in "something you can drive?"

"Well, yeah, he can drive it," she said.

Federal probation officer Mark Quarles testified that during an interview before the bond hearing, Seale mentioned having one brother who's alive and one who has died. Quarles said Seale did not mention another brother, Don Seale, who lives in Louisiana and has been interviewed by FBI agents from New Orleans.

Quarles also said James Ford Seale denied having been in the Klan. Fitzgerald said she had documents showing Seale had been subpoenaed in 1965 to testify before the U.S. House Un-American Activities Committee, and she said the subpoena was served on him while he was at a Klan meeting.

"We're also confident that he is a member of the Ku Klux Klan, basically a terrorist organization," Fitzgerald said, prompting objections from Seale's attorneys.

Defense attorney Kathy Nester said there is "zero evidence to suggest Mr. Seale is currently or even in the immediate past affiliated with a Klan organization."

Victims' Advocates Outraged At Arrest In Fla. (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, February 1, 2007

Victims' rights groups in Florida are calling for police to review their policies after a college student was jailed within hours of reporting she had been raped.

The woman, 21, spent two days in jail after Tampa police discovered a warrant stemming from a crime she committed as a juvenile. Her lawyer said a jail employee refused to give the woman a second dose of emergency contraception because it conflicted with the employee's religious beliefs. The unidentified employee's lawyer, Jennifer D'Angelo, told the Associated Press the employee is prohibited from giving inmates medication without specific orders.

Tampa police apologized. On Tuesday, Chief Steve Hogue announced a policy giving officers discretion on whether to jail people reporting violent crimes who have felony warrants. "The chief was not happy to have a rape victim end up in jail," police spokeswoman Laura McElroy says. "He took very swift action to make sure it doesn't happen again."

"Every rape-crisis program is concerned about this," says Jennifer Dritt executive director of the Florida Council Against Sexual Violence. "I don't know anybody who isn't outraged."

USA TODAY does not identify people who say they were sexually assaulted.

The woman's lawyer, Virlyn "Vic" Moore III, says she was let down by people who were supposed to help her. "She reached out to the system that's supposed to help victims, and the system brutalized her again."

The University of South Florida student told police she was attacked Saturday as she walked to her car. She called police about 3:30 p.m., nearly two hours later, McElroy says.

Police took her to a crisis center, where she was examined and given one dose of emergency contraception. She then tried to help an officer pinpoint the location of the attack, but it was dark, and she could not, McElroy says.

By that time, police had discovered a felony warrant accusing the woman of not paying $4,585 in restitution for a crime committed in 2003, when she was 17. They took her to jail. Moore says the money had been paid.

The next day, Moore says, "She was not allowed to take her morning-after pill that morning, even though she was crying and begging for it. The nurse didn't want to give her the pills because it was against (the worker's) religion."

She got the drug Monday, he says, and was released about 5 p.m.

Police in Kansas City, Mo., also are under scrutiny after the release Tuesday of a videotape showing officers ignoring a pregnant woman in custody who said she was bleeding and needed to go to a hospital. Sofia Salva was held overnight on traffic violations and the next morning had a miscarriage, according to a lawsuit filed Friday in Jackson County Circuit Court.

Study Finds 2 Hot Spots For Profiling (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

D.C. police officers stopped black and Hispanic pedestrians in Georgetown and Adams Morgan at higher rates than others on the street, according to a year-long study commissioned by the police department.

The review was the department's most ambitious examination yet of racial and ethnic profiling. It found that police appear to be targeting blacks at Wisconsin Avenue and M Street NW, in the heart of Georgetown, and Hispanics and blacks at 17th and Euclid streets, in the Adams Morgan core -- two of the city's biggest commercial and tourist magnets.

An outside consultant reviewed data covering traffic stops and pedestrian stops from February 2005 through January 2006 at 25 intersections across the city. The police stops were made for panhandling, jaywalking, suspicious behavior, attempted car theft and "anything a police officer could stop a pedestrian for," said John C. Lamberth, the author of the study.

The study flagged no problems at 23 locations and identified no concerns about traffic stops. But it raised questions about the pedestrian stops at the two intersections.

At Wisconsin and M, black pedestrians were nearly six times as likely to be stopped as anyone else, the study found.

At 17th and Euclid, Latino and black pedestrians were about twice as likely to be stopped as others.

Lamberth's firm -- Lamberth Consulting, based in West Chester, Pa. -- specializes in racial profiling assessment. Its report said that the findings suggest that a "limited, yet significant" number of D.C. police officers are acting "in a manner consistent with the definition of racial profiling."

The report urged police to bolster training and monitor police activities at the intersections, particularly those where most pedestrians are white. The study was first reported by WTTG-TV (Channel 5).

DOJ_NMG_0125363

Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier said she was pleased with the 23 intersections that showed no racial bias but was concerned with the other two.

"I don't want there to be a higher ratio anywhere," she said. "We're going to take steps to deal with it."

Assistant Chief Peter Newsham, who oversees the police districts that include Georgetown and Adams Morgan, said the department is in the process of improving diversity training for all officers, especially the ones who patrol those intersections. He said the department is considering calling community meetings to discuss the findings.

Former chief Charles H. Ramsey, who stepped down in December, ordered the study as part of the Biased Policing Project, which he started in 2002 to examine whether the force had a problem.

The intersections monitored for racial profiling were in all seven police districts. Twenty were monitored for traffic stops, and five were monitored for pedestrian stops.

The study relied upon "odds ratios" to determine whether racial or ethnic groups were stopped at higher rates than their overall population.

First, researchers studied and counted the population at each intersection. Then, when police officers made stops at those locations, they recorded information about race and ethnicity.

The researchers then compared the numbers and ratios.

According to the survey, the odds ratio is best explained by filling in this blank: "If you are a black motorist, you are X times as likely to be stopped as if you are not a black motorist."

If no racial profiling is occurring, the ratio will be 1.

In Georgetown, police stopped 77 black people at the intersection, resulting in a 5.8 ratio.

In Adams Morgan, police stopped 49 black people, for a 1.8 ratio. At the same intersection, police stopped 52 Hispanic people, for a ratio of 2.

Philip K. Eure, executive director of the watchdog organization Office of Police Complaints, hired an independent consultant to analyze the report. He called attention this week to the Georgetown and Adams Morgan findings and said the study was a first step in looking at racial profiling in the District.

"I think it's a terrible thing for a Latino man or woman or an African American man or woman to think there may be problems with them going into predominantly white areas of the city," Eure said.

Ronald Hampton, executive director of the National Black Police Association and a former D.C. police officer, responded to the findings by saying: "I'm not surprised."

"Black people in Georgetown are seen as being in the wrong place," Hampton said. "If you're driving a nice car, you're not in the right place, because the majority of people who live there are white."

This issue ignited over the summer when British activist Alan Senitt was killed in Georgetown and three black people were charged with the crime. At a Georgetown community meeting, Andy Solberg, the commander of the 2nd Police District, said that "this is not a racial thing to say black people are unusual in Georgetown." He was responding to a resident who asked how to look out for suspicious people.

The comment led to a public outcry, and Solberg was temporarily removed from his post. Solberg publicly apologized, and after people from across the city sent letters supporting him, he was reinstated.

In the Adams Morgan Hispanic community, activists said they have been asking the police department for more Spanish-speaking officers. Eugenio Arene, executive director of the Council of Latino Agencies, said the relationship between Latinos and police has been tense.

Of the police department's 3,800 officers, 256 are Hispanic, according to police.

"You want officers to know the culture and the language," Arene said.

ANTITRUST:

Delta Creditors Reject Merger (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

DOJ_NMG_0125364

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

US Airways lost its aggressive takeover bid for Delta Air Lines yesterday when Delta's creditors rejected the $10 billion offer that would have created the nation's largest carrier.

The decision was a blow to US Airways' chief executive W. Douglas Parker, a blunt and fierce advocate of industry consolidation who led US Airways' merger with America West in 2005 that created the fifth-largest U.S. airline.

A committee of Delta's creditors said in a written statement that it decided against a merger because of the "timing and risks" of concluding a deal. The creditors said they would back Delta's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection as a stand-alone airline.

Parker said in a written statement that he was "disappointed" and that the committee was "ignoring its fiduciary obligation" to creditors. He did not respond to interview requests.

"Our proposal would have provided substantially more value to Delta's unsecured creditors than the Delta stand-alone plan," Parker said. "We would have created a better and more financially stable airline that offered more choice to consumers and increased job security."

Delta aggressively fought the proposal on Capitol Hill and in the news media. Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, has told creditors that it expects to be worth as much as $12 billion after emerging from Chapter 11.

Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, also declined a request for an interview. He said in a prepared statement that "this is a proud day for the thousands of Delta people, customers, communities, civic leaders and others who stood up for our stand-alone plan. . . . Our focus now is on the work still before us to emerge from Chapter 11 this spring as a strong, healthy, and vibrant global competitor."

Many analysts and airline executives said a US Airways-Delta merger would have sparked further consolidation in the industry.

Possible combinations included United and Continental airlines and Northwest and American. United and Continental have been in talks. Although Grinstein and other executives denied news reports that Delta was negotiating with Northwest, they have not ruled out considering such a merger.

Executives have said that consolidation is needed to help the industry expand networks, reduce costs and boost profits as carriers continue to recover from the economic downturn after the 2001 terrorist attacks. Analysts and trade groups expect the airlines to collectively report an annual profit for 2006, the first time in six years they will have done so.

Legislators and consumer groups have expressed uneasiness about potential mergers and how they would affect fares and service, particularly to small towns and rural areas. Several senators raised such concerns last week at a hearing. They said a Delta-US Airways combination would cut service to rural areas in such states as Mississippi and Maine.

Analysts said that resistance in Congress, potential trouble in obtaining antitrust approval and difficulties in combining antagonistic workforces probably led creditors to side with Delta's management.

"The US Airways' proposal had more money, but there were a lot of problems too," said Darryl Jenkins, an analyst and consultant. "Creditors saw Delta's plan as having less risk. Delta's management created enough doubt to be able to emerge free, for now."

Parker sought to merge with Delta while it was still under bankruptcy protection to take advantage of rules that make it easier to dump expensive leases on airplanes and other contracts. He said the merger would have allowed him to consolidate routes and reduce Delta's capacity by about 10 percent. He expected those efforts to trim costs by about $1.6 billion.

Analysts said they didn't expect US Airways to suffer much from failing to complete a merger. They noted that the company had been aggressive in controlling costs and raising fares, and they predicted that its stock price would rise.

Delta's Creditors Reject US Airways (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, February 1, 2007

The proposed merger of Delta Air Lines and US Airways fell apart Wednesday when Delta's bankruptcy creditors rejected US Airways' $10 billion takeover offer.

DOJ_NMG_0125365

The committee representing Delta creditors formally rejected the hostile takeover offer and sided with Delta, the USA's No. 3 airline, on its plan to remain independent. Following the announcement, US Airways, which had pursued the creditors since Nov. 15, withdrew its offer.

The decision appears to dampen much of the talk of an impending merger mania in the airline industry, which only recently has returned to profitability after being slammed by terrorism and recession in 2001. Wall Street analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities predicted airlines would not see anymore significant deals for a year.

In the end, the offer of $10 billion in stock and cash did not outweigh the perceived risks. US Airways is a major Delta competitor in the East, and the combination would have created the USA's biggest domestic carrier, eclipsing American Airlines.

Critics of the merger said the Department of Justice could spend months reviewing a pending deal and ultimately block it on antitrust grounds. Delta, meanwhile, told creditors its plan calls for a speedy exit from bankruptcy and that the company would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion as a stand-alone airline.

Among the top creditors are Delta's pilots union; the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which assumed responsibility for the pilots' pension plan; Boeing; Coca-Cola; and Bank of New York.

"This is a proud day for the thousands of Delta people, customers, communities, civic leaders and others who stood up for our stand-alone plan," Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein said in a statement.

The creditors' decision was a major victory for Grinstein, who opposed the takeover bid from the outset. Atlanta-based Delta rallied employees, customers and members of Congress. And Delta made major concessions to the committee to fend off the merger.

Delta executives, for example, agreed to a small equity stake in the reorganized company of about 4%, leaving more for creditors. Creditors also won the right to name most directors on the new board.

US Airways CEO Doug Parker was sharply critical of the decision. He said in a statement the committee was "ignoring its fiduciary obligation to those creditors" by choosing to back Delta because his plan was worth more.

With the takeover battle behind it, Delta will file a revised plan of reorganization with the bankruptcy court this week. It plans to exit bankruptcy in the spring. On Tuesday, it announced it had landed $2.5 billion in exit financing from six major lenders.

Delta Fends Off Takeover (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Delta Air Lines has successfully thwarted a hostile takeover attempt by rival US Airways, as the suitor withdrew its almost $10 billion offer yesterday after Delta's creditors endorsed the bankrupt airline's plan to remain independent.

A committee representing Delta's unsecured creditors said the financial risks and the amount of time needed to successfully complete the proposed buyout were too great to support.

The committee said it "has determined that it will support the stand-alone plan of reorganization as finally agreed upon between Delta and the Creditors Committee."

US Airways previously had said it would withdraw its cash-and-stock offer by today if it couldn't win over support of the creditors.

US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said he was disappointed with the creditors' decision and criticized them for "ignoring its fiduciary obligation." He added that his company's offer was worth substantially more than Delta's stand-alone plan.

"We would have created a better and more financially stable airline that offered more choice to consumers and increased job security to its employees," he said. "Our merger would have been able to be consummated in a reasonable time frame and we would have been able to obtain all requisite regulatory approvals."

But Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein, whose company repeatedly has said it wanted to exit bankruptcy alone, deemed yesterday a proud day for the airline.

"Our focus now is on the work still before us to emerge from Chapter 11 this spring as a strong, healthy and vibrant global competitor," he said.

The Atlanta airline, which has been operating in bankruptcy protection since September 2005, said it will be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion upon emerging from bankruptcy.

Delta rejected US Airways' initial offer of $4 billion and 78.5 million shares made public Nov. 15, saying the plan would burden the combined carrier with debt, face insurmountable antitrust issues, and result in job cuts and a loss of flights to smaller cities.

US Airways on Jan. 10 increased its offer to $5 billion in cash and 89.5 million shares. The stake Delta creditors would have held in the merged company rose to 49 percent from 45 percent.

US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., itself emerged from bankruptcy protection in September 2005 when low-cost carrier America West Airline bought it as part of a deal that consolidated the airlines.

Airline analyst Darryl Jenkins said he initially predicted Delta creditors would accept the buyout. But a vigorous public relations campaign by Delta turned momentum and public sentiment to the side of the Atlanta carrier.

"In the end Delta did a good job defending itself," he said.

Delta's defense was highlighted at a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee hearing last week, when dozens of Delta employees packed the meeting hall in support of their airline, and even more supporters lined up outside the building.

Mr. Parker, who urged the panel to "let the market work," was criticized by several senators worried that a consolidated airline would result in cutbacks in service to small communities.

Delta's pilots' union, a large creditor, also supported their company's goal of remaining independent.

Shares of US Airways rose $2.88, or 5.4 percent, to $55.98 yesterday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. It was the largest one-day gain since US Airways made its Delta offer public on Nov. 15. Delta shares fell 7 cents to $1.09 in over-the-counter trading.

Delta Strategy Pays Off With Victory Hostile Bid By US Airways Fails (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 1, 2007

US Airways withdrew its $10 billion merger proposal — a deal that threatened to move Delta's headquarters to Arizona — after Delta's major bankruptcy creditors refused to get behind the bid.

The creditors' decision came after an efficient campaign by Delta to torpedo the offer both publicly and behind the scenes.

Publicly, employee groups voiced vehement opposition through rallies and "Keep Delta My Delta" buttons. The airline also enlisted political allies who raised questions about whether a merger would survive scrutiny by federal regulators. Both tactics were designed to plant doubts in creditors' minds.

Behind the scenes, the hostile bid lit a fire under Delta's effort to put forth a standalone reorganization plan that the creditors would like better than the merger offer. Delta lined up $2.5 billion in exit financing from six big Wall Street firms, announcing the arrangement just 48 hours before the creditors committee had to make a decision.

Airline experts said Delta's 74-year-old chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, should get credit for rallying Delta — riven by hard times, job cuts and executive pay controversies in recent years — around the cause of independence.

"He's 74 years old, and maybe he'd rather be on a golf course," said Michael Boyd, president of a Colorado-based aviation consulting firm. "But he said what he meant, he wasn't evasive, and employees appreciate his candor. Despite all they've been through, their morale has seldom been higher."

The withdrawal of Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' bid clears Delta management to continue its plan to emerge from bankruptcy this spring as an independent airline. A court hearing on Delta's reorganization plan is set for Feb. 7 and could enable Delta to begin seeking creditors' votes for its plan.

It may not end speculation about possible mergers in Delta's future, however. Grinstein himself has said he is not opposed to all mergers, though he considered the US Airways offer fatally flawed because of the substantial overlap in the two airlines' routes.

For now, Grinstein thanked the creditors committee and trumpeted the news as a victory for workers.

DOJ_NMG_0125367

"This is a proud day for the thousands of Delta people, customers, communities, civic leaders and others who stood up for our standalone plan and said, emphatically, 'Keep Delta My Delta.' " Grinstein said in a statement.

From the start, US Airways bid faced an uphill battle because of Delta's hostile reaction to the bid and the daunting labor and regulatory obstacles that have undermined many airline mergers.

To have a chance at pulling it off, US Airways and its 45-year-old chief executive, Doug Parker, needed to convince Delta's official creditors committee that creditors would be better off with a merger. The court-appointed committee includes the biggest suppliers, banks and other groups with claims in Delta's Chapter 11 case, and it must approve any plan to emerge from bankruptcy.

The committee said in a statement that in rejecting the US Airways offer it "considered a variety of factors" including the deal's value, timing and risk factors along with the "likelihood of a successful consummation."

The committee said it plans to "work collaboratively with Delta towards confirmation and consummation" of its standalone Chapter 11 exit plan. A revised version of that plan will be filed later this week, the committee said.

Parker said the creditors committee failed to do its job.

"We are disappointed that the committee, which has been chosen to act on behalf of all Delta creditors, is ignoring its fiduciary obligation to those creditors," he said in a statement Wednesday.

"Our proposal would have provided substantially more value to Delta's unsecured creditors than the Delta stand-alone plan. We would have created a better and more financially stable airline that offered more choice to consumers and increased job security to its employees. Our merger would have been able to be consummated in a reasonable time-frame and we would have been able to obtain all requisite regulatory approvals."

It's not known how the creditors committee voted, but a court filing Wednesday indicated that MacKay Shields, a bond firm that was one of the original nine members, had left the committee. The firm could not be reached for comment.

A second, unofficial creditor group had pushed for a deal and expressed disappointment with Wednesday's news.

Under Delta's plan, creditors will get newly issued stock when it emerges from court. US Airways' proposal would have paid a combination of up-front cash and stock in the merged carrier. Each side claimed its plan was more valuable.

Walter Curchack, a New York bankruptcy attorney who has worked on airline cases, said Delta benefitted from luck and timing as well as shrewd defensive moves. He said official creditors committee members generally have deep relationships with the company and are inclined to stick with management's plan unless things go badly sour.

"Even if the US Airways deal was better all things being equal, everything wasn't equal," said Curchack.

Delta was 15 months into its Chapter 11 bankruptcy case when the US Airways bid arrived, and its recovery plan began gaining traction last year. Delta had already reached debt-payment deals with most of its largest creditors, including several members of the committee.

"I guess you could say Delta played it well and US Airways didn't play it as well," Curchack said. But the bottom line, he added, is "US Airways came to the party too late."

Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport has a non-voting seat on the official creditors committee. Its general manager, Ben DeCosta, said Wednesday: "I'm feeling very good about what has occurred so far and I'm very optimistic about the future of this airline. Delta is now on the path to having adequate financing, coupled with a plan that is already working and a strategy that is winning."

Delta's pilots union, the Air Line Pilots Association has a voting seat on the committee. Its leaders have vocally opposed the merger. In a statement, the union "cautiously noted" US Airways' decision.

"The focus of the union will return to successfully exiting bankruptcy and monitoring the company's restructuring plans while also remaining attentive of any future threat," the union said.

Calyon Securities analyst Ray Neidl said Wednesday that creditors had lost confidence in Parker's predictions that he could pilot the deal through anti-trust review. Delta executives argued that winning such approval from the Justice Department was highly improbable, given the merger's scope and the two carriers' substantial overlap of routes. Without a good chance of approval, they argued, pursuing the US Airways offer was a waste of time and would only delay the case.

But Neidl said Delta had to give up a large degree of control to creditors to stay in the pilots seat, noting that the airline is expected to have no "poison pill" takeover defenses when after it leaves from Chapter 11. Grinstein — who is expected to pass the controls to a yet-unnamed successor at that point — has denied reports that Delta has talked to Northwest Airlines about a post-bankruptcy merger.

US Airways wanted to merge the two carriers under the Delta name, creating the world's largest airline. A headquarters locale was never disclosed, but it was widely expected it would be in Arizona. That was the home of America West Airlines, which under Parker bought US Airways in 2005 and adopted the larger carrier's name.

That prospect generated many political allies for Delta.

One of the staunchest was U.S. Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.), who last year helped Delta get legislation passed that enabled it to preserve its main pension plan.

"There was no question this was a united front and our message was heard loud and clear," Isakson said in a joint statement Wednesday with fellow Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.).

Delta Air Creditors Reject Hostile Bid By US Airways (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

With yesterday's collapse of US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile takeover bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the widely anticipated wave of consolidation in the U.S. airline industry is likely to remain on hold -- at least for now.

The official committee of unsecured creditors for Delta yesterday rejected US Airways' $10 billion offer and formally endorsed the Atlanta airline's plan to exit bankruptcy this spring as an independent company. The publicly traded bonds of Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp., which is also operating under bankruptcy protection, slid as investors and analysts said any major mergers now may not materialize for another year or more.

The failure of the deal "moves consolidation onto the back burner for a while," said Philip Baggaley, Standard & Poor's Corp.'s senior airline analyst. He added there is a "reasonable chance there will be consolidation over the next year or two." People familiar with the situation said there is little chance that discussions regarding any other combination with Delta, including earlier exploratory talks with Northwest and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines that were put on hold, would resume as long as Delta and Northwest remain in bankruptcy court.

Delta management cited a drop in oil prices from last year's highs as well as planes continuing to operate nearly full industrywide as factors that could tamp down the attraction for immediate consolidation. Delta also argued that its lowered cost structure positioned the airline to emerge from Chapter 11 protection as a healthy, competitive player in the industry. Those factors have contributed to a recent upswing after years of losses for airlines. Many others also have shed costs through recent bankruptcy filings.

The committee determined that backing Delta's reorganization plan, which has the airline exiting court protection in the spring, posed less risk than extending Delta's stay in bankruptcy while a merger underwent federal antitrust review, according to people familiar with the situation.

The group worried that Delta management's vehement opposition to the deal would have made the process extremely difficult and potentially derailed it altogether, these people said. That resistance fueled opposition among lawmakers in Washington who might have worked to stall or disrupt the regulatory review, according to these people.

In a statement, the committee said it "considered a variety of factors, including, but not limited to, valuation of, the timing and the risks associated with, and the likelihood of a successful consummation of the US Airways proposal and the [Delta] Plan." Delta officials said in a statement that they used bankruptcy "the right way" and "transformed their company's business model."

In a statement, US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said the committee "is ignoring its fiduciary obligation" to Delta creditors. He said the decline in Delta bonds since it became apparent that major creditors were resisting the offer reduced the implied market valuation of what Delta's unsecured creditors can expect to recover by more than $1.5 billion.

The Tempe, Ariz., carrier's offer would have expired today. US Airways had expressed willingness to add a further $1 billion in cash to the deal if the creditors committee agreed to demand that Delta open its finances to due diligence by US Airways, among other measures.

Ultimately, the creditors committee decided it preferred the opportunity to take a strong hand in the governance of the nation's third-largest airline, which has shed $2 billion in annual costs, and steer it into potentially more lucrative deals in the future. In negotiations with Delta management in recent days, the creditors committee significantly strengthened its influence over Delta once the airline exits bankruptcy.

The most important agreement gives the committee the authority to appoint 10 of 11 directors who will compose Delta's postbankruptcy board, according the people familiar with the matter. Three current directors will be retained, each of whom will be selected by the creditors committee, those people said. The new Delta board is then expected to hire a new chief executive, who will also serve on the board. Current Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein has said he intends to retire after the company emerges from court protection.

The committee plans to install people who embrace consolidation as a strategic option and made clear to Delta in recent days that this was a condition of gaining its approval for the airline's standalone plan, according to knowledgeable people. Delta also agreed to a creditor committee request that the new charter and bylaws exclude any so-called poison-pill provisions that would pose insurmountable obstacles to future mergers, they said.

Delta and the creditors also reached consensus on a compensation plan in which senior Delta management will receive 2.6% of new company's shares, according to people familiar with the situation. An additional 1.4% will be reserved for executives hired in the future, these people said.

US Airways Withdraws Its $10.2 Billion Offer For Delta (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Someday, the long-predicted wave of consolidation in the airline industry could occur.

But for now it will remain just that — a prediction.

The latest chance at a merger ended yesterday, when US Airways withdrew its $10.2 billion offer for Delta Air Lines, after it failed to win the support of Delta's creditors, which included the Boeing Company and the federal pension agency.

The bid, originally made on Nov. 15 and subsequently raised, was scheduled to expire today.

The action was seen as a victory for Delta's chief executive, Gerald A. Grinstein, and its pilots' union, which led employees in a "Keep Delta Our Delta" campaign aimed at preserving the Atlanta-based airline's independence.

Mr. Grinstein, 73, a white-haired industry veteran, had vowed to rejuvenate his tradition-laden airline before he retired. To do so, he had to fend off W. Douglas Parker, 44, who knit together his previous airline, America West, and US Airways to form a nimble national carrier.

The deal's demise is the latest example of the difficulty any airline faces when it tries a hostile takeover of another carrier. Even friendly deals run into a myriad of problems in combining unions, routes and fleets. The task is even more complex in bankruptcy, where management essentially retains the right to put together a restructuring plan unless a judge decides otherwise, giving even the weakest carriers control over their fate.

So although industry specialists and executives have long predicted that airlines will eventually combine — as perhaps the only way they can achieve consistent profitability — others do not see that happening for the moment.

"I thought consolidation was a lot more likely a couple of years ago," when the industry was in the throes of its decline, said Herbert D. Kelleher, chairman and co-founder of Southwest Airlines.

Since then, however, lenders have come forward to help a number of airlines emerge from bankruptcy, including United Airlines, Aloha and Delta, which announced Tuesday that it had arranged $2.5 billion for its exit as soon as this spring.

"The carriers that went into Chapter 11 have done a very good job of getting their costs down and building up a lot of liquidity," Mr. Kelleher said. "They're not as vulnerable as they once were, and you lessen the case for consolidation."

Yet, some analysts say they believe that Delta will eventually find a partner. The leading candidate is Northwest Airlines, also operating in bankruptcy, which participates in a code-sharing agreement with Delta and Continental Airlines.

In January, Delta and Northwest held talks about a possible alliance or merger, people familiar with Delta's plan said.

Mr. Grinstein has since denied that characterization, saying that the airline hired an investment banker only to gather information from Northwest. Northwest's chief executive, Douglas M. Steenland, said yesterday that his airline would remain independent through the end of this year. Continental has held conversations with United, whose chief executive, Glenn F. Tilton, has repeatedly predicted consolidation will occur.

In a statement, Mr. Parker of US Airways said he continued to believe that a merger would provide more value for Delta's creditors, and suggested that their committee had overstated concerns about such a deal.

A deal would have combined Delta, the third-largest domestic airline by passenger volume, with US Airways, the fourth-largest. While US Airways claimed a merger would produce $1.65 billion in synergies and an airline with a dominant position in East Coast routes, Delta raised concerns about potential antitrust problems and the debt that a combined Delta-US Airways would carry.

Analysts, however, said the antitrust issues raised by Delta might have been overcome.

Philip A. Baggaley, an analyst with Standard & Poor's, said that other merger proposals might not encounter the same level of opposition. But time is running out, given the changing economic and political climate, he added.

"The airlines seeking a merger are not more likely to find a more sympathetic Department of Justice than right now," Mr. Baggaley said. "And there's a lot of money out there, with banks who are willing to finance combinations."

Had Delta's bankruptcy gone on longer, US Airways might have had an easier time persuading creditors to consider its offer, said Fruman Jacobson, a partner with Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal in Chicago. He represented the creditors' committee in the United case, which lingered more than three years.

By contrast, Delta may be out of court protection about 20 months after it filed for Chapter 11. "The way they really got the upper hand is that they're ready to come out of bankruptcy," Mr. Jacobson said.

In a statement, Mr. Grinstein thanked the creditors' committee and Delta employees for supporting the airline's plans to remain independent. "Using the bankruptcy process the right way, Delta people have transformed their company's business model," Mr. Grinstein said.

And last night, company executives gathered in Atlanta to reilluminate an airport sign that has long been a landmark there. It reads, "Fly Delta Jets."

Express Scripts Maneuvers For Time For Fed Review Of Caremark Bid (AP)

By Rose French

AP, February 1, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - Pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. of suburban St. Louis maneuvered Wednesday for more time for an antitrust review of its hostile takeover bid for rival Caremark Rx Inc.

Express Scripts said it intends to voluntarily withdraw its existing Hart-Scott-Rodino filing on Friday and will refile it on Tuesday, allowing the Federal Trade Commission another 30 days to review the proposed transaction. Otherwise, the federal agency had to announce by Friday if it had antitrust concerns about the Express Scripts offer.

Nashville-based Caremark, which favors an acquisition offer from by CVS Corp., is the nation's second-largest pharmacy benefits manager. Express Scripts, headquartered in Maryland Heights, Mo., is No. 3.

Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS, the nation's largest operator of drugstores, announced Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Caremark for CVS stock, a deal valued currently valued at about $24.6 billion.

Express Scripts launched its own bid for Caremark on Dec. 18, an offer now valued at around $24.6 billion.

But Caremark has since rejected the Express Scripts offer, saying it was inferior to the CVS deal because regulators might not approve it.

The agreement between CVS and Caremark has already received antitrust approval. Caremark shareholders will meet Feb. 20 to consider the CVS deal, and CVS shareholders will meet Feb. 23.

CVS said in a statement that the decision by Express Scripts to refile is the "clearest indication yet of the substantial antitrust risks inherent in its hostile takeover proposal" and that "3 into 2" mergers are often unsuccessful and almost always delayed by regulators.

The statement also said Express Scripts' refiling "confirms that the FTC staff and the 22 states that are reviewing the merger have identified serious antitrust concerns that, at a minimum, will require in-depth investigation."

Caremark raised the same point in a statement that said, "This is a transparent ploy by Express Scripts to avoid receiving an extensive second request for information and documents at this time from the Federal Trade Commission and to mislead Caremark shareholders into believing that Express Scripts' risky and highly conditional offer may be close to receiving regulatory approval."

Shares of Express Scripts were down 16 cents to $69.75 on the Nasdaq Stock Market in morning trading.

Caremark shares rose 28 cents to $61 while CVS shares rose 32 cents to $33.37 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Constantine Davides, an analyst with Boston-based Susquehanna Financial Group, said it's not surprising Express Scripts is refiling given the size of the deal, which will likely be heavily scrutinized by regulators.

He said many analysts expected Friday to come and either the FTC was going to issue a second request or Express Scripts was going to refile.

"It's a big acquisition," Davides said. "Regulatory approval can still happen, it just probably wasn't going to happen in the first 30 days."

The Caremark-CVS deal is being challenged in separate lawsuits filed by Express Scripts and shareholders, who contend it favors Caremark insiders.

Express Scripts repeated the claim in a response to a Caremark ad published Wednesday urging its shareholders to approve the CVS deal.

"It is outrageous that Caremark would spend stockholder money attempting to defend the lavish payments that its senior management would receive in a combination with CVS.

"We have trouble understanding how a 'merger of equals' could possibly warrant almost $100 million in sweetheart 'change of control' payments to people who will largely continue to be employed by the merged company," the statement reads.

Express Scripts' Delay In Caremark Bid Aids CVS (WSJ)

By David Armstrong And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

Express Scripts Inc. moved to allow federal antitrust regulators more time to review the company's hostile bid for rival pharmacy-benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc., a delay that boosts a competing offer for Caremark by drugstore giant CVS Corp.

The action makes it unlikely that Express Scripts can gain antitrust approval before Caremark shareholders vote on the CVS offer on Feb. 20. Under the new timetable, the Federal Trade Commission doesn't have to act on the Express Scripts matter until March 8.

That uncertainty favors the CVS deal, valued at about $25 billion, since the drugstore chain has already passed a similar FTC review and can close quickly on the deal following shareholder approval. CVS shareholders are slated to vote on the Caremark acquisition on Feb. 23.

With Express's antitrust case in limbo, the company is under increasing pressure to raise its offer, which yesterday was valued at $58.87 per Caremark share. That is only about 1% greater than CVS's transaction terms, valued at $58.19, which includes a $2 per share dividend once the deal is completed.

That leaves CVS in the driver's seat, given that an Express deal is months away from completion. The exact timing, however, is what is at stake with an FTC decision. And that is why it has become such a hot debate topic among the two feuding sides.

Express Scripts said it planned to withdraw its filing with the FTC on Friday and refile it Tuesday to give the agency another 30 days to review the proposed acquisition. The company said it intends to work with the FTC to clear the transaction without a "second request" for information, which would further delay regulatory approval.

Express proponents said the deal could be completed as early as May, while CVS argues a closing date is most likely in the third quarter. A person close to Express argued that the pulled filing was a sign of progress in dealing with the FTC. "You don't pull and refile unless you're working with the agency," to satisfy its requests, this person said. He added that Boston Scientific Corp.'s purchase of Guidant Corp. involved two pulled filings -- and no second request from the FTC.

Express Scripts and its advisers in recent days have been evaluating their options. One likely sweetener is a "ticking fee," which will award shareholders interest payments for each month that passes prior to FTC approval. The most important feature remains a sweetened price. Yesterday, shareholders moved Caremark stock up 54 cents to $61.26 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, 5% higher than the CVS offer and 4% higher than the Express deal.

The antitrust delay, combined with the sweetened offer CVS made two weeks ago that included the $2 per share dividend, makes it likely the "CVS offer will prevail," Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel wrote in a note to clients yesterday.

Sanofi Well-placed To Beat Rivals To BMS Deal (FT)

By Christopher Bowe, Andrew Jack And Delphine Strauss

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

For pharmaceutical companies considering a bid for Bristol Myers-Squibb of the US, it is the best of times and the worst of times.

BMS, a struggling company with promising new drugs and a good pipeline, has long seen 2007 as a pivotal point in its turnround after a having to cope with a raft of patent expiries on big drugs in recent years and serious legal troubles. It harbours considerable uncertainties for any buyer.

Yet it emerged this week that BMS and its long-standing French partner, Sanofi-Aventis, have held early-stage talks, prompting BMS to beef up its panel of investment banking advisers, adding Lehman Brothers to Citigroup and Morgan Stanley, partly to widen the field of potential interested parties. Sanofi is well placed to act fast and beat rivals to a deal. Barbara Ryan, an analyst at Deutsche Bank, says a formal bid now would be "opportunistic".

It would also be intriguing, she says. BMS has been operating for two years under a settlement with federal prosecutors after an accounting scandal. They appointed a corporate monitor to ensure compliance with corporate governance improvements negotiated to avoid criminal charges. This "deferred prosecution agreement" is set to end in June.

BMS has other legal complications, including a US justice department investigation into negotiations last year with the Canadian generic drugmaker Apotex to end a patent dispute over its blockbuster blood-thinning drug Plavix, accounting for more than a third of its earnings. The fall-out led to the firing of Peter Dolan, the chief executive.

The patent challenge over Plavix itself - for which hearings began this month - throws up more uncertainty until a decision, also expected in June. As Morgan Stanley analysts argued this week, the litigation adds to the pressure on BMS's ability to generate new cash to sustain dividend payments and commercialise its late-stage pipeline of future drugs.

Of all potential suitors for BMS, Sanofi-Aventis has the edge until June, as the developer and joint marketer of Plavix with long-standing links to BMS. As Bernstein Research put it, the "information asymmetries" mean the French company may be the only one willing to bid before the trial is resolved.

In other ways, too, a swift takeover may appeal to Sanofi-Aventis. It has heavy exposure to drugs coming under intensifying European price pressure, and generic competition on others from 2008. There is relatively little overlap with BMS's current or future drugs, and its smaller presence in the US creates cost-cutting opportunities.

But legal experts cautioned that a Sanofi-Aventis and BMS deal could face a hurdle preventing trans-atlantic mergers in the past. It would create "share flowback", whereby US investors seeking to invest in a US drug group are required to sell the new Sanofi-Aventis shares, depressing the French drugmaker's future share price.

Sanofi-Aventis would have liked its own share price to be stronger ahead of a bid, and may have to resort to debt to finance a deal worth more than $50bn. Its hand may have been forced by BMS's deal this month with AstraZeneca on two diabetes drugs, which already diminishes the appeal of an acquisition. Yet if the price is right, early may be better than never.

Vornado To Raise EOP Bid In Latest Shot At Blackstone (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0125373

By Ryan Chittum And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

An investor group led by Vornado Realty Trust is expected to raise its bid for Equity Office Properties Trust, topping Blackstone Group's bid in one of the biggest buyout fights in history.

The bid was set to be announced last night or before markets open today. Vornado had a deadline yesterday to complete its fact-finding or "due diligence" on whether to top Blackstone's most recent offer of $54 a share. If Vornado made such a bid, Blackstone could either go higher or claim the high road of discipline, tell investors that the price was too high and walk away with its consolation prize, a $500 million fee that it will share with investors. Equity Office is a real-estate investment trust founded by the Chicago real-estate magnate Samuel Zell.

The markets had expected a bid to materialize with EOP's stock up 89 cents, or 1.6% yesterday to $55.55 as of 4 p.m. composite on the New York Stock Exchange -- and Vornado's down $1.20, or nearly 1%, to $122.35 on the Big Board.

The latest round in the bidding caps a feverish period in which both sides have been consulting with potential buyers of some of the properties in the Equity Office portfolio, the largest in the U.S. by size and value, to determine how high to go.

The contest started on Nov. 19 when Blackstone agreed to buy Equity Office for $20.1 billion, or $48.50 a share. In July, Equity Office had spurned a then-secret offer by Vornado Chief Executive Steven Roth to merge the two companies.

Vornado struck back on Jan. 17 with two private-equity partners, Starwood Capital and Walton Street Capital, offering $52 a share with 40% payable in Vornado stock and the rest in cash. Blackstone returned the volley eight days later, raising its bid to $54 a share.

The frenzied back and forth came months after conventional wisdom still held that Equity Office was too big to be taken private. Though its stock had lagged behind its peers since the start of the decade, it was a behemoth with a total capitalization (including debt) of some $36 billion, which would require the largest "takeout deal" in history.

Previously, the biggest REIT deal including debt had been General Growth Properties Inc.'s $12.6 billion purchase of Rouse Co. in 2004.

Equity Office owns 585 buildings in 24 markets across the country, making it by far the largest office landlord in the U.S. Vornado, which primarily owns retail and office property in New York and Washington, D.C., has focused on Equity Office's holdings in those markets, as well as in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Boston.

Commercial real estate has been one of the primary beneficiaries of the extraordinary levels of liquidity washing through global markets in the past few years. Thanks to positive rental and vacancy trends, a solid global economy and low interest rates, the flow of capital has sharply pushed up commercial real-estate prices.

Separately yesterday, Equity Office reported its fourth-quarter earnings, which came in slightly below analysts' consensus estimates. For the fourth quarter, it reported funds from operations -- a key REIT cash-flow measure -- of 54 cents, up from 50 cents in the year-earlier quarter, but two cents below consensus estimates.

Nasdaq Ready For Long Battle Over LSE (FT)

By Norma Cohen In London

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Nasdaq has signalled that it is prepared to fight a prolonged battle with the London Stock Exchange.

The US stock market warned on Wednesday that, if its hostile takeover bid failed, it could offer its technology to an LSE rival as part of moves it expects to drive down the exchange's share price.

Bob Greifeld, chief executive, told the Financial Times that Nasdaq could keep its 28.75 per cent stake in the LSE for 18 months.

He expected the share price to fall in that time, he indicated. "In 18 months' time, we will know what is the fair value of the exchange." Nasdaq has refused to raise its offer price from £12.43 a share and looks steeled to seeing its current approach running out of time. LSE shares have stayed stubbornly close to £13, making it highly unlikely the bid will succeed.

Mr Greifeld defended his refusal to raise the price, saying the LSE had yet to grasp the nature of the fierce competition that European regulations will unleash.

It would take at least 18 months for the effect of the new competitive environment to sink into the London market's collective psyche.

"It is probably the most dramatic transition [for the LSE] in their 300-year-old history, except perhaps for Big Bang. I think it may be even more dramatic than Big Bang," he said, referring to the 1986 law that closed the LSE trading floor that divided banks into brokers and traders.

Nasdaq faces competition from upstarts in the US, including BATS Trading, which has captured 15 per cent of trading in Nasdaq-listed stocks by, in effect, paying people to trade on it.

"This is the competitive dynamic we live with," Mr Greifeld said. "This is the intellectual underpinning for our offer price." In a signal to LSE investors that they should wait for another bidder such as the New York Stock Exchange, Mr Greifeld revealed that Nasdaq last week met representatives of the consortium of banks planning a rival platform, Project Turquoise.

Although Nasdaq had not planned to use its technology to compete with the LSE, it was considering, if its bid failed, licensing it to the consortium. Nasdaq's high-speed INet platform is understood to be on a shortlist of preferred technology providers, according to bankers familiar with the project.

However, he said Nasdaq would seek to hedge at least a portion of its exposure to the LSE, a move which could involve buying put options or selling shares short.

He said Nasdaq would not participate in a move by hedge funds to replace LSE management with one more amenable to approaching a prospective buyer – possibly Nasdaq – with a view to achieving a higher sale price.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

A Clearer Global Climate Forecast (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

By 2100, retired snowbirds will be joined by "sun birds" – who flee north to escape oppressively hot, humid summers not just in Miami, but Milwaukee as well. In the US West, deep mountain snows – currently a key natural reservoir for fresh water – will virtually vanish. And while the growing season will expand by about a month, urban gardeners will spend more time indoors as higher temperatures help boost smog at ground level.

Welcome to a world where the climate is, on average, 3 degrees Celsius (5.4 degrees Fahrenheit) warmer than today.

That projection – more specific than any previous one – is just one element expected to emerge this week as some 500 scientists from around the world gather to put the finishing touches on a major report on the Earth's climate and what the future may hold for it as humans continue to pump heat-trapping greenhouse gases into the atmosphere.

It's the first of three volumes set for release this year by the UN-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). Details in the document, which focuses on climate change, remain closely held until its release Friday morning. Leaks to the press based on earlier drafts, however, suggest that the researchers are projecting temperature increases of between 2 and 4.5 degrees C (3.6 and 8.1 degrees F.) by century's end if carbon-dioxide concentrations in the atmosphere reach twice their preindustrial levels. Their "most likely" increase is expected to be about 3 degrees C.

"Three degrees is very significant warming," acknowledges Thomas Delworth, a researcher at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Geophysical Fluid Dynamics Laboratory in Princeton, N.J.

Of course, projecting future climate is a dicey proposition. High-powered computers are loaded with mind-numbing programs whose math represents a range of key processes in the oceans, atmosphere, and land. Scientists enter a few key numbers at start-up, such as the sun's radiation level and levels of greenhouse gases at a beginning time, then press "enter."

Still, "we're not completely sure of a lot of the physics, and it's hard to build a model for something you don't understand," says William Collins, a modeler at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. "We don't know the trajectory for man-made greenhouse gases over the next century."

To finesse that issue, the IPCC has developed a range of emissions profiles, based on different assumptions about population and economic growth and the pace of adoption of new technologies to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions. The emissions profile that yields the 3-degree C warming "is fairly optimistic," Dr. Collins says. It assumes rapid economic growth, a rapid influx of new, more efficient technologies, and a world population that peaks mid century, then starts to decline. Based on past and current emissions, many climate scientists say that a doubling of atmospheric CO2 by century's end is a done deal.

One rule of thumb: Wet areas will get wetter and dry areas will get drier. The most rapid warming is expected over the continents. In essence, climate bands move north, giving Wisconsin the kind of summers once limited to places like southern Mississippi. Warming in northern North America and north-central Asia would be largest in winter. Already, disappearing sea ice, melting permafrost, shifts in vegetation, and melting Greenland ice are signaling the changes under way in the far north.

One likely hot spot: coastal areas around the Mediterranean Sea.

"Every model projects strong drying over the Mediterranean, from Spain through the Middle East," Dr. Delworth says. The region could range on average from 4 to 8 degrees F. warmer in the summer than today, sending any remaining beachgoers on the Costa del Sol scrambling for cooler climes. "That's a very profound impact" on a geopolitically important part of the world, he adds.

Another region of concern is Africa's Sahel, which has seen a series of severe droughts over the past 30 years. Yet Delworth acknowledges that the models fail to agree on whether the drying trend of the past 30 years will continue.

For the US, global warming will squeeze more moisture out of the already dry Southwest. "But the consensus among models is not as high," he explains. One reason: Models are still having a hard time capturing the wind patterns that bring seasonal monsoons to the region.

Mountains in the US West will still get precipitation in winter, but it's more likely to be rain than snow. Throughout the country, when it rains, it will pour, as extreme-weather events become more common – raising the likelihood of floods and giving fits to Western water managers.

In one study published last year, researchers from the US and Australia compared projections from several models and found that climate extremes – ranging from more frequent and intense heat waves and fewer frost days to longer dry spells and heavier rainfall – appear around the globe, although consensus among the models begins to evaporate when they tried to look at regional patterns.

One broad area that may receive more scrutiny: the portions of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado that host vast expanses of sand dunes. A recent study by researchers at the University of Nebraska and the University of Wisconsin notes that many of these dune systems are on the knife's edge of mobilization, and could begin to wander across the landscape if moisture becomes much more scarce.

US Companies Lag On Climate Issues (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall In New York

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

US companies are lagging behind Europe in their readiness to identify climate-change risks, according to the most comprehensive survey to date of industry awareness of the issues.

Only 47 per cent of the members of the S&P 500 index responded to a request last year for information on their assessment of climate change risk that was signed by 225 international pension funds and investors.

In contrast, 76 per cent of the members of the FT 500 index responded to the same questionnaire, which seeks information on carbon emission policies and other issues such as exposure to physical risk from severe weather.

The report on the responses was prepared for Ceres, a coalition of investors and environmental groups, and Calvert, one of the largest US socially-concerned investment firms.

It comes amid growing corporate awareness of climate change risk in the US. Earlier this month, several leading US corporations, including General Electric, Alcoa and Duke Energy, formed a new alliance to lobby for regulation to control carbon emissions.

But Mindy Lubber, president of Ceres, said the survey results indicated that "many US companies are still downplaying climate change and its far-reaching business impacts".

In particular, she noted that only 5 out of 14 insurance companies bothered to respond to the survey, despite the industry suffering more than $70bn of losses from the 2005 hurricanes alone.

Many US banks also stated that "climate change had little to do with their business", although the report highlighted the above average level of the responses from both Citigroup and Bank of America.

On carbon emissions, 80 per cent of the 228 companies that responded addressed the need to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, but that only a quarter of them had disclosed measurable emissions reductions targets and specific time frames for reductions.

The report also highlighted the progress on emissions reporting made by Wal-Mart, the world's largest retailer, since it announced its intention to reduce its carbon dioxide emissions of 20.8m tons in October 2005.

"Despite its massive size, the company has managed to produce a comprehensive accounting of its worldwide emissions from refrigerants, on-site combustion, trucks, cars, airplanes, and purchased electricty," the report said.

France Tells U.S. To Sign Climate Pacts Or Face Tax (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold

New York Times, February 1, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 31 — President Jacques Chirac has demanded that the United States sign both the Kyoto climate protocol and a future agreement that will take effect when the Kyoto accord runs out in 2012.

He said that he welcomed last week's State of the Union address in which President Bush described climate change as a "serious challenge" and acknowledged that a growing number of American politicians now favor emissions cuts.

But he warned that if the United States did not sign the agreements, a carbon tax across Europe on imports from nations that have not signed the Kyoto treaty could be imposed to try to force compliance. The European Union is the largest export market for American goods.

"A carbon tax is inevitable," Mr. Chirac said. "If it is European, and I believe it will be European, then it will all the same have a certain influence because it means that all the countries that do not accept the minimum obligations will be obliged to pay."

Trade lawyers have been divided over the legality of a carbon tax, with some saying it would run counter to international trade rules. But Mr. Chirac said other European countries would back it. "I believe we will have all of the European Union," he said.

Mr. Chirac spoke as scientists from around the world gathered in Paris to discuss an authoritative international report on climate change, portions of which will be released on Friday.

Mr. Chirac's critics say that despite his comments in support of environmental measures, his record as president is far from green. He angered environmentalists across the globe when he conducted nuclear tests in a Pacific atoll within months of coming into office in 1995. He has been a loyal ally of French farmers and their pollution-causing practices, blocking some proposed Europe-wide reforms.

Most recently, France's national plan for allocating carbon emission credits to businesses had to be revised after the European Union rejected it as too generous.

The Long Consensus On Climate Change (WP)

By Naomi Oreskes

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

With the release of the new report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change tomorrow, the fourth since the organization's founding in 1988, many will be looking for what's new. How have estimates of sea-level rise changed? How soon will we achieve a doubling of carbon dioxide levels?

Scientists and journalists focus on novelty, because both are largely about discovery. But from a policy perspective, what matters is not what's new but what's old. What matters are not the details that may have shifted since the last report, or that may shift again in the next one, but that the broad framework is established beyond a reasonable doubt. Although few people realize it, this framework has been in place for nearly half a century, and scientists have been trying to alert us to its importance for almost that long.

Scientific research on carbon dioxide and climate dates to the 19th century, when Irish scientist John Tyndall established that CO2is a greenhouse gas -- meaning that it traps heat and keeps it from escaping to outer space. In the 19th century, this was understood as a fact about our planet, one that made it hospitable to life, but did not have any political implications.

That began to change in the early 20th century, when Swedish geochemist Svante Arrhenius deduced from Tyndall's work that CO2released to the atmosphere by burning fossil fuels could alter Earth's climate. By the 1930s British engineer Guy Callendar had compiled empirical evidence that this effect was already discernible.

Callendar's concern was pursued in the 1950s by numerous American scientists, including oceanographer Roger Revelle, a one-time commander in the U.S. Navy Hydrographic Office, who helped his colleague Charles David Keeling find funds to implement a systematic monitoring program. By the 1960s, Keeling's assiduous measurements at Mauna Loa Observatory in Hawaii demonstrated conclusively that atmospheric carbon dioxide was, indeed, steadily rising. (For this work, President Bush awarded Keeling the National Medal of Science in 2002.) Although these scientists may not be household names, they are well known in the scientific community. However, even most scientists don't know that they -- and others -- have been communicating concerns about global warming to presidents of both parties since the 1960s.

One early warning that we "will modify the heat balance of the atmosphere to such an extent that marked changes in climate . . . could occur" came in 1965 from the Environmental Pollution Board of the President's Science Advisory Committee. While the Bush administration has been loath to accept this reality, an earlier administration accepted it as a statement of scientific fact. In a special message to Congress in February 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson noted: "This generation has altered the composition of the atmosphere on a global scale through . . . a steady increase in carbon dioxide from the burning of fossil fuels."

A second warning came in 1966 from the U.S. National Academy of Sciences Panel on Weather and Climate Modification, headed by geophysicist Gordon MacDonald, who later served on President Richard Nixon's Council on Environmental Quality. While examining the question of deliberate weather modification, MacDonald's committee concluded that increased carbon dioxide might also lead to "inadvertent weather modification."

In 1974, in the wake of the Arab oil embargo, Alvin Weinberg, director of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory, realized that climatological impacts might limit oil production before geology did. In 1978, Robert M. White, the first administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration and later president of the National Academy of Engineering, put it this way:

"We now understand that industrial wastes, such as carbon dioxide released during the burning of fossil fuels, can have consequences for climate that pose a considerable threat to future society."

In 1979 the subject was addressed by the JASON Committee, the reclusive group of scientists with high-level security clearances who gather annually to advise the U.S. government; its members have included some of the most brilliant scientists of our era.

The JASON scientists predicted that atmospheric carbon dioxide might double by 2035, resulting in mean global temperature increases of 2 to 3 degrees Celsius and polar warming of as much as 10 to 12 degrees. This report reached the Carter White House, where science adviser Frank Press asked the National Academy of Sciences for a second opinion. An academy committee, headed by MIT meteorologist Jule Charney, affirmed the JASON conclusion: "If carbon dioxide continues to increase, [we] find no reason to doubt that climate changes will result, and no reason to believe that these changes will be negligible."

It was these concerns that led to the establishment of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change and, in 1992, to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, which called for immediate action to reverse the trend of mounting greenhouse gas emissions. One early signatory was President George H.W. Bush, who called on world leaders to translate the written document into "concrete action to protect the planet." Three months later, the treaty was unanimously ratified by the Senate.

Since then, scientists around the world have worked assiduously to flesh out the details of this broadly affirmed picture. Many details have been adjusted, but the basic parameters have not changed. Well, one thing has. In 1965, the concern that greenhouse gases would lead to global warming was a prediction. Today, it is an established scientific fact.

Can Ethanol Get A Ticket To Ride? (WSJ)

By Ilan Brat And Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

Like the corn it's made from, ethanol is largely a product of the small-town Midwest, distilled in places like Nevada, Iowa, and shipped to market by train.

Now, as ethanol producers ramp up production, they are straining railroads already taxed by burgeoning shipments of coal, containers and grain. And they worry that the transportation crunch could make it difficult for ethanol, despite its surge of support in Washington, to compete with energy rivals.

Rail and transportation logistics for the ethanol industry is "the mountain to climb...as we go forward," says Ken Eriksen, a senior vice president of Informa Economics Inc., an agricultural and renewable fuels consulting firm in Memphis, Tenn.

Unlike gasoline, natural gas and oil, ethanol attracts water and other chemicals, so it can't be sent through the long-established pipelines that move those fuels. That means the ethanol industry has been forced into a marriage with the already groaning railroads.

"It's supply and demand," says Walt Wendland, president and CEO of Golden Grain Energy LLC in Mason City, Iowa. "We're a captive market for them."

Few people think the strains will derail the boom, fueled first when it became a popular replacement for the gasoline additive methyl tertiary-butyl ether (MTBE) and boosted by President Bush's call for more homegrown energy alternatives. But ethanol's popularity has meant that producers have had to struggle to upgrade their rail yards and secure enough tank and grain cars to efficiently ship both ethanol and its byproducts. Railroads are prodding them to make the changes while also rushing to expand their own tracks and freight yards to handle the increasing shipments. Even though some parts of the economy have slowed recently, rail freight volumes are still near record highs.

Despite the concern about the rail system, producers aren't flocking to the waterways. Barges are considered too slow to handle ethanol's rush to market, most plants aren't located near bodies of water and other liquid commodities already have soaked up the majority of the tank-barge capacity.

Railroad executives say ethanol, though still a small part of their total freight traffic, promises to be a lucrative growth opportunity. Shipments of ethanol have nearly tripled since 2001 to about 106,000 rail carloads last year and are projected to increase to at least 140,000 in 2007, according to the Association of American Railroads in Washington. Each tank car has a capacity of 30,000 gallons.

"We had a hiccup here and there, absolutely," says David Lawson, vice president of industrial products at Norfolk Southern Corp., a large railroad based in Norfolk, Va. "But we feel like we handled the growth very well."

Railroads have been pushing producers toward shipping by longer, more-efficient trains, called unit trains. Such trains carry 75 to 95 tank cars of ethanol and provide a faster and more economical alternative to shipping a few ethanol cars at a time. Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp. in October 2003 began running its Ethanol Express to shuttle ethanol to California from the Midwest. It now runs two to three times a week. But some producers have chafed under the industry's initiatives.

After the corn is distilled into ethanol, it's mixed with a small amount of gasoline at the production plant before being shipped by train to a petroleum terminal, where it is blended with gasoline. Large petroleum terminals are accustomed to receiving their product by pipeline and then distributing locally by truck. Most terminals haven't developed the infrastructure of tracks, storage tanks and rapid unloading to receive ethanol by unit trains, says Kevin Kaufman, group vice president of agricultural products of BNSF's rail unit. Expanding is difficult because they are sometimes hemmed in by buildings, highways and bodies of water.

On the other end of the line in ethanol country, many of the producing plants aren't large enough or lack the track and facilities to fill unit trains themselves. That is forcing the producers to shell out millions on tracks and equipment they hadn't planned to spend. Engineers from rail giant Union Pacific Corp. in Omaha, Neb., are requiring Mr. Wendland to triple the size of Golden Grain's rail yard even though he is only doubling the size of the 65 million-gallon ethanol plant in land-locked Mason City.

The 24,000-foot track expansion will push him over his $2 million budget by $1.5 million. He also had to purchase 55 acres of nearby land for $500,000. Mr. Wendland says Union Pacific told him their freight yards were too strapped for space to store his cars, so he'll have to store them himself. "It's a huge commitment, to say the least," he says. The railroad confirmed Mr. Wendland's account.

Lately, large railroads have used their newfound market power to raise prices on many commodities they carry. For producers it comes at a time when high corn prices are squeezing their margins.

To cope with the price increases, Rick Brehm has started packing tight every car of distillers dried grain, an ethanol byproduct sold as cattle feed, he ships out. The 50-million-gallon-a-year Lincolnway Energy LLC ethanol plant in Nevada, Iowa, sits beside Union Pacific's mainline. Mr. Brehm is having an employee shovel the grain into every corner of his rail cars. That way he can fill up an extra 3% to 4% of space that was lost to air pockets before.

Union Pacific is ratcheting up investment to expand its own yards and track lines to handle the extra shipments in ethanol producing areas in Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska. Even small railroads are trying to climb aboard. Iowa Northern Railway Co. is helping to build a new ethanol-storage facility in Manly, Iowa. Trucks will collect ethanol from production plants over hundreds of miles and bring it to Manly, with unit trains heading out from there.

Still, some railroads question the durability of the ethanol boom. Oil prices could drop, corn supplies could dwindle and alternatives could crop up. Ethanol producers are pushing ahead despite their dependence on the railroads.

"We are going to do what it takes to move it," says Dennis Miller, president and CEO of Iowa Interstate Railroad Ltd. in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. "But you just don't bet the farm on something that is volatile and controlled by many different forces."

Meanwhile, Imports Are Rising (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

Even as the U.S. looks to ethanol as a way to wean itself off foreign petroleum supplies, imports of the biofuel are soaring.

Despite a sharp tariff levied on most ethanol shipped from abroad, importers are finding they can compete with domestic ethanol on price. Some foreign suppliers, especially Brazil, also can provide ethanol more easily in some cases because of shipping bottlenecks in some areas of the U.S.

The surge in imports has yet to cause political backlash because U.S. ethanol supplies haven't caught up with demand. But tensions could arise this year as production at a slew of new domestic ethanol plants threatens to outstrip demand. Already, Corn Belt farmers who supply ethanol plants have taken to calling Brazil, the top foreign supplier of ethanol to the U.S., the "Saudi Arabia" of ethanol. "Why should we be trading dependency on one energy source for dependency on another?" asks Matt Hartwig, a spokesman for the Renewable Fuels Association, a trade group for the U.S. ethanol industry.

The U.S. ethanol industry benefits from a 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit as well as a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff levied on most imports. The tariff drives up the price of imported ethanol. Neither subsidy is likely to change despite Bush administration hints that it wouldn't mind seeing the tariff disappear.

While a certain amount of foreign supplies can avoid the tariff if the ethanol is dehydrated in a Caribbean country before it enters the U.S., the amount of duty-free ethanol is capped at 7% of annual U.S. ethanol consumption.

The import surge suggests that users are happy to base their purchases less on where it comes from than cost and convenience. "It all comes down to economics," says Gene Edwards, executive vice president at Texas-based Valero Energy Corp., a major North America oil refiner that blends ethanol into gasoline. "If it's Brazilian sugar cane that makes the ethanol, why should we care?" About 30% of the ethanol that Valero blended last year was imported, according to the company.

New players are piling into the U.S. ethanol market, including China, the Netherlands and even Pakistan. Through November, total U.S. imports of ethanol used for fuel last year were 616 million gallons, more than four times as much as the 135 million gallons in 2005, according to the U.S. International Trade Commission.

Brazil, which makes its ethanol from sugar cane instead of corn, is one of the world's most efficient producers of the biofuel. U.S. imports of Brazilian ethanol rose to 418 million gallons in the first 11 months of 2006, from 31 million gallons in all of 2005, according to figures from the trade commission. Jamaica was the second-largest exporter to the U.S. last year, followed by China.

Oil companies adopted en masse last year as a clean-burning replacement for another key gasoline additive, methyl tertiary-butyl ether, that was being phased out.

As oil prices soared last year, demand got another shove when President Bush in his State of the Union address called on Americans to start using more renewable fuels, ranging from ethanol to biodiesel, as a way to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil. Congress then passed a bill requiring the U.S. oil industry to use 7.5 billion gallons a year of renewable fuels by 2012, most of which is expected to be ethanol. President Bush has since called for the use of 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels, including liquefied natural gas, by 2017 in order to cut gasoline consumption by 20%.

U.S. producers can't yet make enough ethanol to supply domestic needs. Last year about 4.9 billion gallons of ethanol were produced in the U.S., while about 5.5 billion gallons were consumed, according to the Renewable Fuels Association. Imports made up the difference.

Brazilian imports have been attractive because imported ethanol can be about the same price as the U.S. product, and sometimes cheaper. For instance, with corn at about $3.70 a bushel, the wholesale price of a gallon of ethanol -- including transportation and production -- is about $1.90. At current sugar-cane prices, a gallon of ethanol costs about $1.75 a gallon, including transportation from Brazil and the tariff.

Shipping convenience is also a factor. Many of the biggest users of ethanol are on the coasts, while many of the ethanol plants are clustered in the Midwest. For coastal users, it is often simpler and more reliable to have ethanol hauled on a ship from Brazil than on already-strained railroad lines from rural Nebraska or Iowa. Moving the budding ethanol industry "beyond its Midwest roots out to some of the coast routes is a challenge," says Rick Tolman, chief executive of the National Corn Growers Association.

With demand outpacing supply, the growth of imports shouldn't cost U.S. producers much business. But that could change when the dozens of new U.S. ethanol plants projected to come on line in the next year are added to the 100-plus existing plants.

Last month, at the World Economic Forum in Switzerland, Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman said he believed more imports were going to be needed to meet ethanol demand. "The idea is that at some point in the future all these technologies need to stand the test of the free market," he said.

But farm and ethanol interests are likely to block any move to remove the tariff or let it expire in 2009.

Some American companies clearly see benefits in foreign ethanol, especially that made from sugar cane. Last year, agriculture giant Cargill Inc. of Minneapolis invested in a Brazilian sugar-cane-ethanol plant.

"We think the best way to ensure a strong, growing market domestically is assurance of supply," says Bill Brady, spokesman for Cargill. "That's why we favor a global marketplace when it comes to ethanol."

On Energy And Ethanol Politics (WSJ)

By David Wessel

Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

There are at least three ways to look at President Bush's energy initiative. One is knee-jerk: If Mr. Bush proposed it, it must be stupid. A second is to pretend you're king: How would I solve this problem? A third is to ask: Given the administration's stated conviction that markets know best, does the proposal make sense and go far enough?

Partisan critics do the first. Academics do the second. Let's try the third.

DOJ_NMG_0125381

Mr. Bush says the U.S. energy market isn't working well. At current prices, Americans use too much oil and gasoline for our own good. He says he is worried about an imprudent dependence on oil, the price of which is heavily influenced by regimes not always friendly to the U.S., and about global warming.

His solution: "Diversify our nation's energy supply."

The economists' user guide to policy says the most efficient response to a market price that doesn't fully reflect the costs of consuming a good -- in this case, the risk to national security and to life on Earth as we know it -- is a tax. It could be on oil, or on gasoline, or on carbon, a major constituent of fossil fuels. No one inside the Bush camp will say this publicly -- at least until they leave. Gregory Mankiw, the Harvard economist who did a turn as chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, now is campaigning for a $1-a-gallon gasoline tax phased in over 10 years.

A tax would raise the price of oil or gasoline or carbon, discourage consumption of gasoline (or whatever was taxed) and create incentives to produce alternatives. The market, not the government, would pick the best alternative.

But Mr. Bush is allergic to anything that smells like a tax. So he opted for a not-very-Republican alternative. He would use the government's muscle to force Americans -- or more precisely, the companies that blend motor fuel -- to consume less gasoline than they otherwise would and more of something else. A lot more. A 2005 law requires blenders to increase their use of alternative fuel, most of it ethanol made from American corn, to 7.5 billion gallons a year by 2012 from the current six billion gallons. Mr. Bush proposes to boost that to 35 billion by 2017. If there isn't enough alternative fuel to go around, blenders will have to pay a tax-like penalty to the government, the size of which hasn't been determined.

OK. It isn't the economists' first choice, but economists don't often run for office. The president's proposal has some logic: The government isn't picking winners, just guaranteeing lasting demand for alternatives to gasoline -- broadly defined -- to stimulate investment and technological progress.

With all that guaranteed demand, more than makers of corn-based ethanol could ever meet, one might think there was no longer any need for the 51-cent-a-gallon tax credit for ethanol, which will cost taxpayers about $2.6 billion next year and more in later years as ethanol production rises. One might also think that, since the goal is to "diversify" the U.S.'s energy sources, there is little reason to continue a 54-cent-a-gallon tariff on imports of sugar-derived ethanol from Brazil.

But Mr. Bush didn't say anything about repealing the tax credit, or about altering it so that the government pays a subsidy only when oil prices are low and ethanol is economically unattractive. Nor did he say anything about repealing the tariff.

The reason has little to do with economics, and a lot to do with the politics of corn. The tax credit was born during the oil-price spike of 1978; the tariff was added to prevent foreign producers from getting U.S. subsidies. The two measures sustained an embryonic ethanol industry in corn-growing states when oil prices were low and there wasn't much government, consumer or Wall Street interest in alternative fuels.

Times have changed, but the folks who benefit don't much like the idea of repealing the credit or tariff. And they have a lot of friends in the Senate -- including Charles Grassley of Iowa, the top Republican on the Senate Finance Committee -- and among presidential candidates, for whom ticking off Iowa's corn farmers would be an exercise in masochism.

Mr. Bush's serious advisers have a hard time defending the tax credit or the tariff. "At some point in the future all these technologies need to stand the test of the free market" says Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman -- or at least a market in which the government puts a floor under demand.

Under current law, the tariff expires in 2009 and the tax credit in 2010. Mr. Bush's advisers figure repealing the measures is politically impossible and hope to persuade Congress to resist pressure to extend them. Yet Mr. Bush, the self-described admirer of markets who won't ever again face voters in Iowa or probably anywhere else, wasn't willing to say even that much in his State of the Union address. * * *

Postscript on last week's column on prizes: A report by the National Research Council, an affiliate of the National Academy of Sciences, last week urged the government to launch "an ambitious program of innovation inducement prize contests" as "a sound investment in strengthening the infrastructure for U.S. innovation."

Federal Judge In Las Vegas Sets New Hearing On 'Divine Strake' (AP)

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A federal judge told government lawyers Wednesday he wants to be kept closely informed on plans for a non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would send a mushroom-shaped dust cloud high over the Nevada desert.

With no date set for the test, dubbed "Divine Strake," U.S. District Court Judge Lloyd George set another status hearing March 2, and said he wants to see a draft environmental assessment prepared about the Defense Threat Reduction Agency experiment.

"I'll pay a lot of attention to this case, I assure you," the judge said.

Justice Department lawyer Caroline Blanco said if a date is picked for the explosion, it will be at least 30 days after the environmental assessment is completed and a finding is made that the explosion would pose no significant threat to the environment or people.

Blanco, speaking by conference call from Washington, D.C., said that until a decision is made to go ahead, it was premature to address opponents' claims that the test will kick up and spread radioactive dust from the Nevada Test Site.

Robert Hager, a Reno-based lawyer representing Western Shoshone tribe members and "downwinders" in Utah and Nevada, said that he plans to challenge flaws in the environmental assessment.

The document has been the focus of public meetings this month in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, where elected officials have questioned the safety of the experiment. It was postponed last year after Hager filed suit.

Critics have called the blast a surrogate for a low-yield nuclear "bunker-buster" bomb, and have expressed fears that it would scatter radioactive dust contaminated by nuclear weapons experiments at the test site from 1951 to 1992.

The experiment would explode 700 tons of fuel oil and fertilizer over an underground tunnel, about 85 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

Government officials have called it important for gathering data about penetrating hardened and deeply buried targets.

DEFENSE RESERVATIONS Native Americans On Trial Often Go Without Counsel (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

SELLS, Ariz. -- As Joseph Juan's May 2005 trial at the Tohono O'Odham Nation Tribal Court began, prosecutor Lisa Stronawski fired off questions, asking potential jurors about their views on drug laws.

At the defense table, there was no lawyer representing Mr. Juan. The 55-year-old tribe member, who faced charges of possession of marijuana with intent to deliver for sale and conspiracy, couldn't afford a lawyer and didn't have one. For most of the trial, his voice, normally a low mumble, went unheard.

The right of defendants to legal counsel is guaranteed by the Constitution. But due to a little-known quirk in federal law, Native Americans aren't assured this protection. That's because under U.S. law, Indian tribes are considered sovereign nations, and are not subject to all privileges afforded by the Bill of Rights.

The country's 560 tribes are largely responsible for funding government services such as schools, police, and hospitals, as well as courts. The tribes have jurisdiction over crimes committed on reservations by the nation's 2.4 million American Indian and Alaska Natives.

Many of these tribal courts, like their federal and state counterparts, have their own prosecutors, tribe-appointed judges and jail facilities. Court proceedings can be judge or jury trials. There are 275 such courts in the U.S., each governed by the laws of an individual tribe or village. According to the U.S. Justice Department, more than 9,200 Native Americans convicted in tribal courts are locked up in tribal facilities or local jails off tribal lands.

Mostly absent from this parallel justice system are public defenders -- a luxury that many poor tribes say they cannot afford. The defense gap means that accused criminals often end up representing themselves. As a result, many plead guilty and risk exposing themselves to additional charges at the federal and state levels. In some instances, they may be subject to double jeopardy -- two trials, sentences and punishments for the same crime.

"The Constitution acts as a floor beneath you that no state can go below. For Native Americans, that floor doesn't exist," says Zig Popko, an Arizona State University law professor and a former federal public defender.

The Indian Civil Rights Act, passed in 1968, gave individual tribe members some protections, such as the right to a speedy trial and the right to a trial by jury. But it did not provide the right to counsel for defendants too poor to hire attorneys.

Each year, the federal government spends nearly $400 million to subsidize tribal justice systems. The money goes to equipping and training police officers, constructing jails and providing grants to courts, prosecutors and victims programs. Of the total, less than $1 million is made available to tribal public defender offices.

Many tribes never see "a single penny for indigent defense," from the government, says Nick Fontana, director of the defense advocate office for the Pascua Yaqui nation in Arizona. In the decade that the office has existed, he says, the tribe has borne all operational costs.

Over the years, various congressional bills have sought to address the problem of tribal defense funding. Last year, Arizona Sen. John McCain, then chair of the Indian Affairs Committee, held a hearing to argue for more government assistance. The issue has yet to gain traction.

Stretched Resources

Some tribes, such as the Pascua Yaqui Nation outside Tucson and the Tohono O'Odham Nation, have programs to help provide attorneys for the indigent. But stretched resources mean many defendants still go without. Mr. Fontana says problems usually arise when a group of people face arrest.

"We represent them first-come, first-serve," he says. "It's brutal. We have to tell people all the time that we can't represent them because we are representing someone else connected to the case. All I can do is hand them a list of advocates and attorneys who can practice in court here and tell them, 'You will have to pay for it yourself. Good luck.' "

Such limitations left Joseph Juan to defend himself. Mr. Juan was one of four people accused of hauling marijuana across the San Miguel border between Arizona and Mexico in 2005. Arrested by border-patrol officers, he was charged with conspiracy and possession with intent to distribute the 198 pounds found in the truck he was driving.

Mr. Juan didn't act quickly enough to secure an attorney. Although his tribe does have a defense advocate office, a co-defendant sought counsel first, soaking up scant available resources.

The courthouse in Sells, the tribal capital, is about 60 miles southwest of Tucson in a remote area of the state. The main route there, Highway 86, is a narrow, two-lane road marked with 48 memorial crosses erected for members killed along the 21 miles that stretch from the beginning of the Tohono O'Odham boundary to Sells. It is an area where high winds blow constantly, creating dust storms that can lower the visibility to just beyond the hood of a car.

At his trial here, Mr. Juan faced Ms. Stronawski, a tribal-court prosecutor and a University of Pennsylvania law-school graduate. She had five witnesses, including three federal border-patrol agents, a tribal police officer and an Arizona state-police lab examiner. Her supervisor, also an attorney, joined her in the proceedings. Mr. Juan was alone.

"As I recall, he didn't have any family" present, says Ms. Stronawski. "I'm sitting there with my Ivy League law degree, halfway through an advanced law degree.... And my boss, who has been a prosecutor 15 years is sitting next to me. How can that possibly be fair?" Mr. Juan wasn't available for comment.

Despite being asked repeatedly by the judge whether he had problems with any of the evidence in the case, Mr. Juan only raised two objections during his trial. One was to dispute the time of day an incriminating picture provided by the prosecution had been taken. According to tapes of the proceedings, Mr. Juan spoke just over two minutes in his defense, including an 80-second opening statement. He was convicted and sentenced to two years in a tribal jail.

Gaps in the Case

Ms. Stronawski, now a defense attorney with the Pinal County, Ariz., public defender, acknowledges there were gaps in her case against Mr. Juan that she might have exploited as a defense counsel. "In the end I felt he had as fair a trial as could be. I don't feel like I railroaded him," she says. "But going into a courtroom against a defendant without counsel is a hollow case."

Tribal-court judges say they try to compensate for the paucity of public defenders by interacting more with defendants.

"I'll ask them certain questions that would elicit something that would help their defense that they wouldn't think of," says Potawatomi Tribal Court Judge Phil Lujan, who also serves as circuit judge for several other tribes. Normally, says Judge Lujan, it would be the defense attorney's job, but "99.9% of them do not have attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0125384

A jurisdictional quagmire is partly to blame. The federal government has responsibility for prosecuting major crimes committed by Native Americans on tribal land, such as murder, rape, robbery and arson. But federal prosecutors regularly decline the cases. Instead, they are left to tribal courts where defense offices are limited and judges are restricted in the length of sentences they can hand down.

Cheryl Stein, a Washington, D.C., defense lawyer who is helping Mr. Fontana with research in several of his cases, listened to the taped transcripts of Mr. Juan's trial. She says the judge asking Mr. Juan whether he objected to certain evidence or jury instructions is akin to a "doctor asking a patient whether he objects to the interpretation of the X-ray. He has absolutely no basis on which to make an intelligent answer."

Indian casino operations have enriched some tribes, letting them provide all the services of an independent government, including criminal defense counsel. A few even pay out tens of thousands of dollars annually to each member. But most tribes are not so well off.

Consider, for example, the Tohono O'Odham Nation in Arizona, where Mr. Juan was arrested. With 2.8 million acres of tribal land and 28,000 members, the area is larger than Connecticut and second only to the Navajo nation in land mass. Although the tribe runs three casinos that fund many of the services provided by the tribal government, more than 40% of the members live below poverty level, according to the U.S. Census.

Double Jeopardy

The tribes' quasisovereign status allows defendants to be tried again in state or federal court for the same crime -- without the double-jeopardy protections provided by the Constitution. Defendants who enter guilty pleas in tribal court don't always realize that they are opening themselves up to federal or state charges for the same crime.

Billy Joe Lara, a member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa, faced this situation when he was arrested for public drunkenness in 2001 by Bureau of Indian Affairs officers at the Spirit Lake Nation Reservation in North Dakota. While being detained, he punched one of the federal officers. Without an attorney, he pleaded guilty the following day in tribal court to that and two other charges. He was sentenced to more than 160 days in a tribal jail.

Two months later, Mr. Lara was indicted on a federal charge of assaulting a federal law enforcement officer. In that case, under federal jurisdiction, he was granted the right to defense counsel. But his attorney, Alexander Reichert, says that the prior guilty plea, entered without any counsel, put his client at a disadvantage. "He just walked in and laid it out in the guilty plea," Mr. Reichert said. "He admitted all the details necessary to bring a federal case against him."

Mr. Lara, who had already spent three months in a tribal jail for the first conviction, went to trial and was also convicted in federal court. He was sentenced to another 10 months in federal prison for his punch.

Mr. Reichert fought the case to the Supreme Court, arguing that his client was charged twice for the same crime. Mr. Lara lost his challenge in 2004 when the high court sided with the government in its 7-to-2 ruling which said the case didn't constitute double jeopardy.

The opinion, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, essentially stated that tribal nations are separate, sovereign governments. Thus, when a defendant commits a crime that violates the laws of two sovereigns -- in this case the tribe and the federal government -- both can bring charges.

In the meantime, Mr. Fontana says he routinely asks area lawyers to assume cases his office cannot take. "I beg defense lawyers," he says. "But some of them have caller ID and they're avoiding taking my calls now."

Schumer Proposes $1 Billion War On Violent Street Gangs (Westchester Journal)

By Steve Lieberman

Westchester Journal News, January 31, 2007

U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer today proposed spending more than $1 billion and passing tougher laws to fight a nationwide surge in gang violence and drug dealing.

Schumer unveiled a staff report showing a rise in violent crime and drug arrests across New York from 2000 to 2005 as an example for the entire country.

The Gang Abatement and Prevention Act of 2007 includes spending $1 billion over five years for law enforcement to fight gangs on the streets and $50 million for for police and educational programs in schools.

The package would fund investigations, prosecutions, short-term witness protection programs and gang prevention services. An estimated $100 million alone would go toward hiring prosecutors, staff and technology.

Supporting the package was Rockland District Attorney Michael Bongiorno, the president of the New York State District Attorney's Association.

Street gangs are criminal enterprises and selling drugs finances their operations, Bongiorno said.

The gangs referred to were local groups as well as nationwide organizations like the Bloods, Crips, Latin Kings and MS-13. Those gangs are represented, among others, in the lower Hudson Valley

Senator Proposes Strong Medicine For Gang Violence (EMPSN)

EmpireStateNews.net, February 1, 2007

Gang violence is “spreading like a virus”, said U.S. Senator Charles Schumer, during a news conference Wednesday. The Democrat senator released a new report showing that there has been a 10 percent increase in reports of violent crime and a nearly 20 percent jump in the number of drug arrests in cities and communities across upstate New York.

“Every sheriff, every police commissioner, the DEA, shows that a remarkably high percentage these days of both violent crimes and drug arrests are gang-related.”

Schumer said part of the medicine is to change federal law, to make gang recruitment a primary offense.

The senator announced two new pieces of legislation that would provide more than $1 billion in new federal funding to combat the rise of gangs and impose tough new penalties for those who participate in gang violence.

“Our bill replaces the current federal laws sentencing enhancement for gang-related conduct. That’s almost never used, and you have to have another predicate crime. This makes it a crime in itself – the recruitment of young people into gangs.”

The legislative package also addresses issues raised by local law enforcement, including money for enhanced witness protection, and grants directly to school district for programs to prevent and respond to violence in elementary and secondary schools.

Blood Or Urine? HGH Testing Feud Simmers (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 1, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Olympic athletes soon will have their blood tested for human growth hormone, but the NFL and baseball officials instead are embracing the unproven concept of urine testing in their bid to stop use of the performance-enhancing drug.

Critics question whether the pro leagues truly are intent on rooting out HGH, thought to be widely abused because no one currently is testing for it. But baseball and football officials say they are stymied by union contracts that prohibit taking blood from players, and they cite privacy concerns and doubts about the accuracy of blood tests.

The two leagues recently awarded grants worth a combined $1 million to develop a urine test, but even the scientist who received most of the research money concedes an effective urine screen is years away, meaning players can continue using HGH with little fear of getting caught.

"It's a difficult proposition," said Don Catlin, chief of the Olympic Analytical Laboratory at UCLA. "It's going to take a while."

This blood feud over how to root out cheaters has opened a deep schism at the highest levels of amateur and professional sports.

The World Anti-Doping Agency plans to test the blood of elite amateur athletes by the end of this year. The agency's chief, Dick Pound, dismissed efforts by the NFL, Major League Baseball and their unions as "a piddling little amount" spent on unproven technology to combat a major problem.

DOJ_NMG_0125386

"Our view is that it's out there being used with impunity because of the lack of testing," Pound said.

Anti-doping agencies that police amateur athletes around the globe have spent nearly $10 million over the past decade to develop a blood test to detect synthetic growth hormone.

"All the experts we have consulted told us to forget about urine tests," said Olivier Rabin, the anti-doping agency's top scientist. "In urine you will find less than 1 percent of human growth hormone than you will find in the blood."

Human growth hormone occurs naturally in the body and synthetic versions taken by injection are chemically identical, making detection difficult. The new blood tests are designed to find higher-than-normal hormone levels that can be reached only by taking synthetic versions.

Rabin said the blood test can detect the presence of synthetic growth hormone for about two days after it's injected, which requires the agency to conduct unannounced, random samplings.

Some 300 athletes at the 2004 Olympics in Athens underwent blood testing without a positive result. But Rabin says testing deterred human growth hormone use because athletes knew the tests were coming.

An NFL official, however, said that proves the tests were unreliable.

"Our indication is that there are outstanding issues with respect to the availability and the reliability of the blood test," league spokesman Greg Aiello said.

Donald Fehr, head of the baseball players' union, said: "We would have nothing to say about it until it came out and we had an opportunity to review it."

Human growth hormone is produced in the pituitary gland, a pea-sized structure at the base of the brain that controls growth and other functions. In the mid-1980s, scientists at the biotechnology pioneer Genentech Inc. figured out how to produce the hormone by genetically engineering human genes into bacteria.

Since then, the global market for human growth hormone has reached nearly $1 billion annually with seven companies, including Eli Lilly & Co., Pfizer Inc. and Novartis, producing similar versions. Its uses include treating pituitary gland tumors and growth disorders in children.

But black market demand for the drug is strong and growing. It has become the darling of anti-aging advocates and professional athletes looking to boost energy, increase strength and stave off the effects of getting old.

Even without testing, several athletes have been caught. Last year, federal investigators intercepted a package of growth hormone sent to Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley.

Grimsley said he began using HGH in order to evade baseball's newly implemented steroids testing program in 2003, according to federal investigators. He also identified several other players who used or supplied drugs, though their names were blacked out of court documents.

Grimsley's case bolstered anti-doping experts' belief that abuse is rampant in baseball and raised public awareness about the drug.

A doctor prescribed human growth hormone to several Carolina Panthers football players during the team's 2003 Super Bowl season, according to court records. During that time, no player was suspended for violating the league's substance-abuse policy. The doctor, James Shortt, was sentenced to a year in prison in December.

Still, the extent of human growth hormone use by athletes is unclear, and might never be known.

"The stuff works and it works well," said Chuck Yesalis, a Penn State expert on performance-enhancing drugs. "I would be in the camp that says it's a pandemic."

Congress Monitors Baseball Steroid Probe (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Congress is monitoring George Mitchell's investigation of steroids in baseball and could intervene if he doesn't get more cooperation, two lawmakers told the former Senate Majority Leader.

The leaders of a House subcommittee that held hearings on steroids in 2005 pledged their support for Mitchell in a letter sent to him Tuesday and released to the media Wednesday.

"We sincerely hope that all relevant parties will work constructively to facilitate the completion of your investigation and your ongoing efforts to clean up the sport," wrote House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade, and Consumer Protection chairman Bobby Rush, a Democrat from Illinois, and ranking Republican Cliff Stearns of Florida.

Stearns proposed the Drug Free Sports Act in April 2005. That bill called for a two-year suspension for a first offense and a lifetime ban for a second, while leagues that failed to comply would have been fined at least $5 million.

It was one of several pieces of legislation about steroids in pro sports that lawmakers stopped pushing after baseball introduced wider-ranging and more stringent drug rules in November 2005.

"Hopefully, similar legislative initiatives will remain unnecessary," Rush and Stearns wrote.

Mitchell told baseball's owners on Jan. 18 that he intends to interview active players and raised the possibility that Congress could compel testimony -- something he can't do. Mitchell was hired by commissioner Bud Selig last March after more than a year of allegations against Barry Bonds, Mark McGwire and other stars.

"We appreciate your warning to team owners and concur with your recommendation for better cooperation with your independent investigation," the congressmen wrote.

Congressmen Back Up Mitchell's Steroid Warnings (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Two weeks after George J. Mitchell warned baseball owners that Congress could become involved in his steroids investigation if he did not receive more cooperation from those within the sport, two congressmen offered their backing for Mitchell's efforts.

In a letter that was sent to Mitchell, who is a former Senate majority leader, the congressmen reinforced the message that Mitchell delivered to the owners. The congressmen were the leaders of a House subcommittee that held hearings on steroids in May 2005.

"We sincerely hope that all relevant parties will work constructively to facilitate the completion of your investigation and your ongoing efforts to clean up the sport," wrote Bobby Rush, a Democrat from Illinois, who is the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection, and Cliff Stearns, the ranking Republican from Florida. The letter was made public yesterday.

When Commissioner Bud Selig appointed Mitchell last March to head a commission that would investigate steroid use in baseball, Mitchell's greatest impediment was that he did not have subpoena power to compel players, executives, coaches, medical personnel and owners to speak. Unlike Congress, Mitchell could not require cooperation.

Months after the investigation started, Mitchell asked Selig to consider disciplining those who refused to be interviewed. Mitchell, who is also a former federal prosecutor, acknowledged last December that the investigation would take longer than he expected because of a lack of cooperation.

But by warning the owners that Congress could again get involved with baseball and steroids, Mitchell is trying to persuade more people within the sport to testify. If nothing else, Mitchell has now succeeded in getting a reaction from Congress.

"We appreciate your warning to team owners and concur with your recommendation for better cooperation with your independent investigation," Rush and Stearns wrote.

Stearns was responsible for proposing the Drug Free Sports Act in April 2005. The bill included a two-year suspension the first time a player failed a drug test and a lifetime expulsion for the second offense. In addition, leagues that did not abide by this act would have faced fines of at least $5 million.

In recent years, baseball has twice implemented harsher testing policies for performance-enhancing substances. They now call for a 50-game suspension for a first-time offender and a lifetime ban after the third offense. Baseball has also begun testing for amphetamines for the first time. Congressional leaders seemed satisfied, and stopped lobbying as fervently for the Drug Free Sports Act. But now Mitchell has weighed in. "Hopefully, similar legislative initiatives will remain unnecessary," Rush and Stearns wrote.

More U.S. Aid May Fund Social Projects (MH)

DOJ_NMG_0125388

By Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, February 1, 2007

BOGOTA - The Bush administration will seek almost $600 million from Congress this year to aid Plan Colombia II, the second phase of a multi-pronged effort to battle drug trafficking and insurgency in this Andean nation.

The strategy may include shifting more resources to economic development projects, administration officials said Wednesday.

"The strategy that the Colombian government is proposing for Plan Colombia II is perfect because it understands that it has to have a strong social component," Thomas Shannon, Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemispheric Affairs, said in a news conference in Colombia.

Shannon did not specify how much of the aid would go toward economic development, which has traditionally received less than a quarter of the approximately $700 million in annual funds for Colombia since Plan Colombia was launched in 2000.

Despite spending over $4 billion since the effort began and eradicating thousands of acres of coca fields, the raw material for cocaine, Colombia remains the world's largest producer and supplier of the drug.

Leftist guerrillas, as well as remnants of right-wing paramilitaries, the bulk of which demobilized, continue to control supply and distribution lines, which help them fund their illegal wars with the government and each other.

Since taking power in 2002, the government of President Alvaro Uribe has focused most of its efforts on combating the four-decades-old insurgent group, known as the FARC, successfully displacing the rebels from traditional strongholds.

However, the resilient guerrillas have just as often returned to those strongholds and dwindling resources for economic projects have made it hard for the government to maintain the loyalty of local citizens.

In the Caquetá province in the south of the country, for instance, the U.S. government announced last year that it was withdrawing all its resources and personnel because of security concerns and because the economic programs, which included a large rubber tree planting project, were simply not effective in weaning the farmers away from growing coca.

Shannon hinted that some of these resources would be replenished or other areas would receive needed boosts.

"The Colombian government recognizes that when they can establish security, they have to take the next step of ensuring social development," he said. ``And we are looking for funds to help this project."

Analysts in Colombia, however, were skeptical that there would be any significant changes to Plan Colombia and considered possible alterations in terms of the Bush administration's efforts to appease the Democrat-controlled Congress in Washington.

"Although there might be more resources for social programs and alternative development, most of the aid will probably still go towards the armed forces," said Diana Rojas, a political science professor at the National University in Bogotá.

"The way he's presenting it now has more to do with the political climate in the United States," Rojas said.

Shannon's remarks came after a three-day tour of Colombia during which he met with Uribe as well as Colombia's foreign chancellor, María Consuelo Araujo, and visited a number of U.S.-funded projects.

Deputy Enters Plea In Alleged Mob Leak (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 1, 2007

A deputy U.S. marshal pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges that he leaked confidential information that a mob hit man was cooperating with the FBI against organized crime.

John Ambrose was charged last month with telling a family friend that Nicholas Calabrese, the only member of the Chicago Outfit ever to become a government informant, was releasing details of gangland slayings.

Ambrose's alleged role as the inside source came to light in cryptic conversations between imprisoned Outfit boss James Marcello and his brother, Michael, that were secretly recorded by the FBI.

Following Wednesday's arraignment, Ambrose's lawyer, Francis Lipuma, said he has been told that federal officials plan to place Ambrose on unpaid leave from his job, but Lipuma intends to fight the move. He is currently on paid leave.

Ambrose, 38, a 10-year veteran of the U.S. Marshals Service, is free on bail.

IMMIGRATION:

Feds Ask Court To Toss Cuban Militant's Bid For Release (AP)

By ALICIA A. CALDWELL, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

EL PASO, Texas (AP) -- U.S. immigration officials have asked a federal judge to toss out Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles' bid to be set free pending his ordered deportation.

In a four-page motion filed Wednesday in El Paso, the government argued that Posada's lawsuit is moot because he was transferred to the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service after being indicted Jan. 11. He had filed the lawsuit last year after spending nearly a year in a federal detention center on an immigration violation. He has been charged with several counts of lying during an interview and on an application in a bid to become a naturalized U.S. citizen.

Posada, who has pleaded not guilty, is being held without bond at the Otero County jail in New Mexico.

The motion was filed a day before a court-imposed deadline for immigration authorities to justify Posada's continued detention pending his deportation.

A federal immigration judge ruled in 2005 that Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. Army soldier who had roles in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba and the Iran-Contra scandal, had to leave the U.S. But Judge William L. Abbott also ruled that the ailing anti-Castro militant could not be sent to Venezuela, where is a naturalized citizen, or Cuba, where he was born, because of fears that he would be tortured.

Governments of both countries want Posada sent to Venezuela to stand trial on charges that he was in Caracas when he planned the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner. Posada has denied any wrongdoing.

Several countries, including Mexico, have refused to let Posada in and Posada has argued that he should be set free while the government continues efforts to find some place to send him.

The motion filed Wednesday argues that because Posada is no longer being held by immigration authorities, the court cannot order them to release him.

Felipe D.J. Millan, Posada's El Paso lawyer, said the motion was a stalling tactic.

"This is an issue that has to be addressed sooner or later," Millan said. "What is the government going to do with Mr. Posada once he is deemed guilty, or not guilty? That's something that needs to be addressed now. It's not a moot issue. He is in marshal custody, we don't dispute that. But at some point he is going to go back to immigration custody."

Millan said Posada's legal team is preparing a response.

Increased Immigration Fees Denounced (WP)

By Darryl Fears And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) joined a chorus of immigrant advocacy groups in condemning the Bush administration's plan to charge legal immigrants significantly more money to obtain green cards, adjust their residency status and bring relatives to the United States.

Under the plan, announced yesterday by Emilio Gonzalez, director of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, the government would charge $905 -- up from $325 -- to apply for a green card or to adjust residency status. Immigrants with green cards would have to pay $595 to become naturalized citizens, a $265 increase. The cost of bringing a foreign fiance to the United States would more than double, to $455.

"This drastic increase will price the American dream out of reach for qualified immigrants wanting to be citizens of our country," Kennedy said. He called on Congress to appropriate more money to USCIS, which depends on fees for 99 percent of its budget. "We are a nation of immigrants, and Congress should recognize its responsibility to support the vital work of immigration services by appropriating the necessary funds," he said.

Kennedy's comments were echoed by Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops: "This increase reflects a disturbing trend which places the benefits of citizenship on the open market, with only those of a certain economic level able to access it."

Gonzalez said the fee increases are necessary to operate his agency more efficiently. "Anytime you have to raise a fee, you understand it's going to affect people," he said. "We also have a necessity to create a system that will process . . . people in a streamlined way."

USCIS has long been plagued by an application backlog, slow processing by poorly trained personnel and an inability to track applications for people. The agency receives no money from Congress and passes on most costs to applicants. A highly critical 2004 Government Accountability Office report said that the agency's fees did not cover its costs.

Gonzalez said the increase would pay for better facilities, more workers and more training so that applications can be processed faster and by a more courteous and professional staff. He said the improvements would help USCIS cope with a guest-worker program should Congress approve some type of comprehensive immigration reform.

The fee increases will be published today in the Federal Register, beginning a two-month comment period. USCIS expects to process nearly 5 million applications in the 2008-2009 fiscal year.

"We've never seen regular fees that were this high," said Fred Tsao, policy director for the Illinois Coalition of Immigrant and Refugee Rights. "I think a lot of people are going to get discouraged."

Immigration Agency Proposes Raising Fees (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

The immigration service yesterday proposed big increases in the fees to apply for immigrant and work visas and for naturalized citizenship, but some lawmakers said it is time for taxpayers to foot part of the bill to ease the cost on potential immigrants.

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, one of the few fee-based agencies in the government, said the current rates don't cover the cost of doing business. It also said the increases will pay for more employees and equipment, reducing wait times.

Director Emilio Gonzalez said immigrants will "see the difference" in service.

"I need these fees to give us the agency that these immigrant communities expect," he said. "They don't want long waits, they don't want to go into dingy buildings, they don't want to meet with rude employees, they don't want to do a lot of things which they are going through now, because we haven't had the resources to make a difference."

But the proposed increases were so steep that Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary immigration, border security and citizenship subcommittee, said it's time to look at spending taxpayer money to help immigrants.

"This drastic increase will price the American dream out of reach for qualified immigrants wanting to be citizens of our country," he said. "We are a nation of immigrants, and Congress should recognize its responsibility to support the vital work of immigration services by appropriating the necessary funds."

That would be a major change for the agency, which funds 99 percent of its operations through fees.

Under the changes, applying for naturalized citizenship would cost $595, up from $330, and the cost for processing fingerprints and other biometric information would increase $10, to $80. The cost of some complicated applications would jump by more than $1,000.

On the other side of the ledger, Mr. Gonzalez has proposed eliminating the fee for applying for a visa as a victim of human trafficking.

The fees would go into effect in about six months, after a public-comment period that begins today. The fees would add $1 billion to the agency's $2 billion annual budget.

Overall, the agency expects to receive about 5 million applications a year.

DOJ_NMG_0125391

The American Immigration Lawyers Association said the cost of applying for citizenship has increased fourfold since 1994, when it was $95.

"Funding an entire agency on the backs of immigrants and their U.S. citizen spouses is beyond the pale," said Carlina Tapia-Ruano, the group's president.

She said she doubts immigrants will get superior services because of the increases, and she echoed Mr. Kennedy's call for Congress to begin footing some of the bill.

Mr. Gonzalez said the Government Accountability Office, Congress' watchdog agency, has deemed the fee increases necessary. He is in the middle of upgrading his agency's technology infrastructure and said the new funds are critical.

The director said the agency also is proposing new rules to do away with inconsistencies, such as when someone can apply for a waiver of fees even though his or her company should be able to pay, and when family-based visa applicants are allowed to apply for waivers even though their families are supposed to certify they can support the applicants.

Advocates Criticize Proposed Hike In Immigration Fees (MCT)

By Lesley Clark And Alfonso Chardy

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Immigration advocates likened a Bush administration proposal to hike immigration and naturalization fees to a ``second wall'' that could make it harder for many new arrivals to earn U.S citizenship.

Immigrants applying for citizenship or temporary work permits could pay almost twice as much as they do now under a proposal floated Wednesday by the administration, which says the increase would speed up processing.

Nearly every immigration or naturalization fee would be raised and some of the increases would be substantial, according to figures supplied by U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services:

_The application fee for citizenship would increase from $330 to $595.

_The fee to apply for status as a legal permanent resident would rise from $325 to $905.

_The cost of work permits would rise from $180 to $340.

_Even the cost of fingerprints would go up $10, to $80.

Some fees, including the $50 application for temporary protected status, would not change and the $270 fee for a temporary visa for victims of human trafficking would be lifted.

The proposed increase will be published in the Federal Register and the agency will take comments from interested parties, starting Thursday. It would not take effect until later this year - likely mid-June, agency director Emilio Gonzalez said.

Immigration officials said the fee hikes are necessary to keep the fee-dependent agency afloat and the increases would close security gaps and improve service.

But the proposal met with considerable resistance from immigration advocates and on Capitol Hill - where Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., suggested such a ``drastic increase'' would put ``the American Dream out of reach'' for many immigrants.

Kennedy, who chairs a Senate subcommittee on immigration, border security and citizenship, suggested Congress should look for other means of running the agency.

``We are a nation of immigrants and Congress should recognize its responsibility to support the vital work of immigration services by appropriating the necessary funds,'' Kennedy said.

In the House, Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., the chair of the immigration subcommittee, said she planned to ``carefully examine'' the agency's justification for the increases.

``Changes in the current fee structure must be fair and reasonable,'' she said.

In Miami, immigration advocates were even more emphatic.

``It's unbelievable,'' said Jose Lagos, head of Honduran Unity, an immigrant rights group that represents Honduran and other Central American immigrants, many of whom rely on permits to be able to work in the United States.

He said the majority of the Central Americans are undocumented and have work and residence permits under temporary protected status. A large number get work permits and renew them regularly to maintain status, he said. Most clean homes or offices for a living and barely make $250 to $300 a week.

Cheryl Little, executive director for the Miami-based Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center, dubbed the increase ``a second wall'' for immigrants - saying the first is the one the federal government plans to build along portions of the U.S.-Mexican border.

Lidia Urbina, a Nicaraguan immigrant who arrived illegally in 1998 and now lives and works in Miami under temporary protected status, said she's not sure she would be able to afford the increased cost of work permits because she already has trouble earning the more than $600 a month she needs to afford rent, food and money to send home to her seven children and nine grandchildren.

``I don't know what I'm going to do,'' said Urbina, 50, who cleans homes and offices for a living.

Agency officials defended the proposed increases - the first other than inflation adjustments since 1998, they said - as key to speeding up the processing of applications and strengthening the security of the country's immigration system. The agency processes about 5 million applications a year and the increases would bring in about $1 billion for the agency.

``This better reflects the true cost of doing business,'' said Gonzalez. ``These are not arbitrary prices. We drew them with as much sensitivity as we could.''

He said the increased fees represent a ``fine balance'' between the need to streamline the agency's operation and not put up barriers ``to immigrants who may have trouble coming up with the money.

``It's a necessity for this agency and an opportunity for us to get to where we need to be,'' said Gonzalez.

The agency will retain the option of waiving the fees for those who can't afford them, he said.

The money would be spent on hiring more employees, training and improving the agency's facilities.

``They don't want long waits, dungy buildings and meetings with rude employees,'' he said of the applicants.

Groton Man Faces Tax-fraud Charges (LOWSUN)

Lowell (MA) Sun, February 1, 2007

BOSTON -- A Groton resident faces charges in U.S. District Court for defrauding the government on his tax returns.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, Joseph K. Berardi, 50, failed to report his sales to S. Strogoff & Co. a scrap-metal dealer in Chelsea, as taxable income on his federal returns in 1997, 1998 and 1999. He is believed to be one of the parties involved in a conspiracy to defraud the government of tax revenue.

Yale Strogoff, of Swampscott, pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud the government in 2004. Strogoff conspired with his customers to pay those customers checks payable to fictitious payees for scrap metal sold to his company. Strogoff also arranged for the banks to cash the checks with no identification required. The customers would then keep the money for themselves instead of recording it as corporate income.

If convicted, Berardi faces up to three years in prison with another year of probation, and a fine of up to $250,000.

FRIENDLY LANDLORD Wal-Mart Cuts Taxes By Paying Rent To Itself (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

As the world's biggest retailer, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. pays billions of dollars a year in rent for its stores. Luckily for Wal-Mart, in about 25 states it has been paying most of that rent to itself -- and then deducting that amount from its state taxes.

The strategy is complex, but the bottom line is simple: It has saved Wal-Mart from paying several hundred million dollars in taxes, according to court records and a person familiar with the matter. And Wal-Mart is far from alone.

IT'S A DEAL

Below, an excerpt from the lease agreement signed between a Wal-Mart-owned REIT and another Wal-Mart unit.

The arrangement takes advantage of a tax loophole that the federal government plugged decades ago, but which many states have been slower to catch. Here's how it works: One Wal-Mart subsidiary pays the rent to a real-estate investment trust, or REIT, which is entitled to a tax break if it pays its profits out in dividends. The REIT is 99%-owned by another Wal-Mart subsidiary, which receives the REIT's dividends tax-free. And Wal-Mart gets to deduct the rent from state taxes as a business expense, even though the money has stayed within the company.

Partly thanks to sophisticated financial strategies like these, states' tax collections from companies have been plummeting. On average, Wal-Mart has paid only about half of the statutory state tax rates for the past decade, according to Standard & Poor's Compustat, which collects data from SEC filings. The so-called "captive REIT" strategy alone cut Wal-Mart's state taxes by about 20% over one four-year period. Now several state regulators are trying to crack down on the strategy, used largely by retailers and banks, and some other states have changed their laws to try to end the practice. Yesterday, New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer included elimination of the loophole as part of his proposed budget, a fix he said would bring the state $83 million a year.

RELATED DOCUMENTS

In a June 2002 affidavit,1 a Wal-Mart executive laid out the relationship between the REIT and its owner, another Wal-Mart subsidiary. H. Lee Scott Jr., now Wal-Mart's CEO, served as the REIT's "managing trustee," according to a property deed from 19962.

North Carolina tax authorities are challenging Wal-Mart, saying its REIT strategy was intended to "distort [the company's] true net income," according to its filings in the case in Superior Court in Raleigh, N.C. The state calls captive REITs a "high priority corporate tax sheltering issue" and in 2005 ordered Wal-Mart to pay $33 million for back taxes, interest and penalties stemming from the REIT. The company paid it and last year sued the state for a refund.

The structure Wal-Mart is using features some unusual elements. Because REITs must have at least 100 shareholders to gain tax benefits, roughly 100 Wal-Mart executives were enlisted to own a combined total of around 1% of the REIT's shares, without any voting rights. H. Lee Scott Jr., now Wal-Mart's CEO, was listed as the REIT's "managing trustee" from 1996 to 2004.

A single Wal-Mart real-estate official, Tony Fuller, represented the company both as tenant and landlord in its lease with itself. Ernst & Young LLP, the accounting firm that sold the strategy to Wal-Mart, also is the company's outside auditor. In its internal sales training materials, the accounting firm explicitly labeled the strategy as a method to reduce taxes -- a red flag to tax authorities, who often demand that tax shelters have other business purposes.

Wal-Mart attorneys say in court filings that the strategy is perfectly legal and that North Carolina is exceeding its authority. A spokesman for the Bentonville, Ark., company, John Simley, said Wal-Mart "is comfortable with its current structure and is in compliance with federal and state tax laws." He added that the REIT structure was adopted to "more effectively and efficiently manage the company's real-estate portfolio, including the impact on the company's overall state tax planning."

Regulators in at least a half-dozen states are going after companies that have trimmed their taxes through similar arrangements, including Regions Financial Corp.'s AmSouth Bancorp. unit; AutoZone Inc. of Memphis, Tenn.; and two units of Bank of America Corp. In a Massachusetts case against Bank of America unit Fleet Funding Inc., authorities call Fleet's REIT arrangement a "sham" in court filings. They note that Fleet increased the salaries of the roughly 100 employees whom it made REIT shareholders to compensate them for personal income taxes stemming from ownership. The Multistate Tax Commission, an association of state revenue authorities, says it has started examining the use of captive REITs to avoid taxes, alerting states to the issue and proposing legislative fixes to close the loophole.

States collected more than $44 billion last year in corporate income taxes, out of $607 billion in total state tax receipts, according to the Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, a nonpartisan think tank associated with the State University of New York. But the average effective corporate state and local tax rate has dropped from 6.7% during the 1980s to about 5% during the first half of this decade, according to a recent report by the Congressional Research Service. This is in part because of the proliferation of state and local tax breaks, as well as tax shelters, according to several academic and government studies.

Some corporate state tax planners say arrangements like these are merely smart business, and that the loopholes exploited by companies should be fixed by state legislatures rather than litigated by state lawyers. Critics of the shelters complain they let companies use public services provided by local governments -- such as police and fire protection or new highways -- without having to shoulder their fair share of the costs. Meanwhile, the portion of state taxes borne by individuals is steadily rising.

Congress created REITs in 1960 as a way to allow smaller investors to put money in a wide portfolio of commercial real estate, spreading their risk. Congress also gave them a tax benefit: REITs aren't subject to corporate income tax on the profits they pay to shareholders as long as they pay out at least 90% of the profits. The shareholders still usually get federally taxed on the dividends, which still count as income for them.

After a boom in REITs in the early 1990s, big accounting firms including Ernst & Young and KPMG LLP figured out that on the state level, they could pair the tax break on REIT dividends with a separate tax rule that allows companies to receive dividends tax-free from their subsidiaries. With the REIT as a subsidiary itself, two rules aimed at avoiding double taxation could be combined to effectively avoid any taxation at all.

The strategy worked especially well if the REIT was owned by a company incorporated, and claiming to do all its business, in a state such as Delaware or Nevada that often wouldn't tax the corporate income anyway. That created an extra hurdle for other states to challenge the practice if they caught onto it.

Ernst & Young early on targeted the banking industry as a possible beneficiary of the captive REIT strategy. Like retailers, banks have branches in many states and often are liable for lots of state-level corporate tax. Ernst & Young targeted at least 30 banks, some of them its audit clients. The SEC generally permits that dual role as long as the firm's fee isn't contingent on the tax savings.

According to documents from a 1995 internal Ernst & Young sales training meeting reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, the accounting firm suggested banks put some of their income-producing assets, such as a portfolio of mortgages, into a REIT subsidiary, then use the double-tax break to "shelter" the income from state taxes. The REIT would issue a tiny number of non-voting shares to bank "officers and directors" to meet the 100-shareholder rule that REIT law requires.

U.S. banks "pay millions of dollars each year in state and local taxes," read the Ernst & Young presentation to its sales force. "The FSI State Tax Financial Product we have developed can significantly reduce or eliminate this heavy tax obligation..." One section of the Ernst & Young sales package featured hypothetical questions from clients about the REIT shelter, and the proposed answers. To pass legal muster, many corporate tax shelters purport to have additional business purposes behind merely saving taxes. Ernst & Young, however, was blunt about the reason for its proposed strategy:

"Q: What's the business purpose?

"A: Reduction in state and local taxes.

"Q: What if the press gets wind of this and portrays us as a 'tax cheat'?

"A: That's a possibility....If you are concerned about possible negative publicity, you can counter it by reinvesting the savings in the community."

An Ernst & Young spokesman declined to comment on its REIT work, saying the firm was "prohibited from commenting on client matters." The spokesman said he could not verify the authenticity of the internal sales training documents based on quotes provided by the Journal. However, he said the "limited language communicated in the internal memo does not reflect the quality and nature of the advice we provide to our clients."

State authorities have had mixed records so far in pursuing back taxes and penalties in captive-REIT cases. AutoZone, the big auto-parts chain, won the right to deduct the dividends from its taxes in Kentucky but lost a preliminary round in Louisiana. The Hawaii Department of Taxation won a case involving a REIT used by Central Pacific Financial Corp., a bank holding company. AmSouth is in litigation with Alabama over tax benefits from its REIT.

Fleet Funding's REIT, on which the company was advised by KPMG, has led Massachusetts to seek more than $42 million in back taxes, interest and penalties. BankBoston Corp. is in similar litigation with Massachusetts. Both banks have been acquired by Bank of America, which declined to comment on the litigation.

Fleet's attorneys have said in court papers that its REITs were legitimate, and the fact that they were partly motivated by tax considerations does not legally undermine their valid business purpose -- to raise capital, they say. A KPMG spokeswoman declined to comment on the Fleet case, but said it had stopped any involvement with "prepackaged tax products" before a 2005 agreement it made with the U.S. Justice Department over improper tax strategies that also led to the indictment of 17 former KPMG officials.

It's unknown how many disputes have been raised over the strategy used by Wal-Mart and others, because such tax disputes are generally not disclosed unless lawsuits are publicly filed or the company reveals them in SEC filings.

Wal-Mart adopted its captive-REIT structure just as it was unwinding a previous strategy to reduce taxes that states had begun to challenge. For the first half of the 1990s, the retailer used a so-called intangible holdings company structure also used by many other corporations. Wal-Mart transferred its trademarks to a subsidiary called WMR Inc. in Delaware, which does not tax many forms of corporate income. Then it paid the subsidiary for the use of the brands. That allowed Wal-Mart to deduct those payments from its local income taxes in some states, while WMR's income wasn't taxed by Delaware.

Several states won challenges to the strategy, used by various retailers. Wal-Mart settled a dispute over its use of WMR in Louisiana -- the details of the settlement are sealed -- and lost on the main points of a case in New Mexico. Wal-Mart merged with WMR in February of 1997 and its use as a state tax avoidance vehicle was apparently discontinued, according to New Mexico court records.

In the meantime, Wal-Mart set up a new vehicle to control its state tax bill: captive REITs. In the summer and fall of 1996, Delaware corporate records show, Wal-Mart created a new hierarchy of subsidiaries: a REIT called the Wal-Mart Real Estate Business Trust; a Delaware-based parent company for the REIT, called the Wal-Mart Property Co.; and Wal-Mart Stores East Inc., parent of the Delaware firm. Wal-Mart Property owned 99% of the REIT's shares, and 100% of the voting shares, according to Wal-Mart court filings in North Carolina and West Virginia. The company also set up a similar arrangement for its Sam's Club stores.

To meet the 100-shareholder threshold required for REITs, Wal-Mart distributed a minimal amount of nonvoting stock, to approximately 114 Wal-Mart employees, according to a person familiar with the arrangement. The dividend payouts were nominal. The structure involved Wal-Mart's top executive tier. The shareholders were generally executive vice presidents and above. David Glass, then Wal-Mart's president and CEO, was listed as president of Wal-Mart Stores East on the lease agreement, and Paul Carter, then a Wal-Mart executive vice president, was listed as the president of the REIT.

Wal-Mart began transferring to the REIT ownership of the properties -- the land and buildings -- for hundreds of its stores in 27 states, real-estate records show. Then Wal-Mart Stores East signed a 10-year lease agreement with its REIT that took effect on Jan. 31, 1997, agreeing to pay a fixed percentage of the stores'"gross sales" as rent, according to a copy of the arrangement filed in the North Carolina case. Mr. Fuller, the Wal-Mart real-estate official, is listed as the contact for both the tenant and the landlord. The original lease was due to be renewed this week.

Wal-Mart could deduct from its state-taxable income the rent paid by Wal-Mart Stores East to the REIT. The REIT paid the majority of its rental earnings to its 99% owner, Wal-Mart Property Co., in the form of dividends. That company's base in Delaware gave it another way to avoid liability for state taxes, since some states do require that dividends a REIT pays to its corporate owner be taxed, as the federal government does.

The Delaware subsidiary then paid the money back to Wal-Mart Stores East, the same subsidiary that made the payments to the REIT to begin with. Those payments to Wal-Mart Stores East weren't taxed either, because dividends paid to a corporation by a subsidiary normally aren't counted as taxable income for the parent company.

The result of the circuitous transaction: Wal-Mart could effectively turn rental payments to itself into state level tax-deductions in most of the states where the payments have been made. Under typical circumstances, rent paid to a third-party landlord also would reduce taxable income. But that would ordinarily be cash out the door, like most other tax-deductible expenses. Here, the majority of the tax-deductible rental payments came straight back to Wal-Mart.

The national tax savings have been significant. Over a four-year period, from 1998 to 2001, Wal-Mart and Sam's Club paid company-controlled REITs a total of $7.27 billion that eventually came back to Wal-Mart in states across the country, according to a North Carolina Department of Revenue auditor's report filed in court by Wal-Mart. Based on an average state corporate income tax rate of 6.5%, three accounting experts consulted by The Wall Street Journal estimated the REIT payments led to a state tax savings for Wal-Mart of roughly $350 million over just those four years. SEC filings show the company paid $1.18 billion in state taxes during that period. The loss of federal deductions that bigger state tax payments would have triggered brought the company's effective tax savings overall down to about $230 million. Wal-Mart declined to comment on the figures.

It is not clear how much Wal-Mart has paid to its own REITs in the most recent five years. The yearly rental payments -- on which the tax savings are based -- are pegged to the "gross sales" of the stores, according to the lease agreement.

Underscoring that the rental payments were cashless Wal-Mart accounting moves, an affidavit filed in North Carolina by the company's former controller, James A. Walker Jr., states that the payments were made by simply debiting the account of one subsidiary and then crediting the account of the other. "Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. served, in effect, as a bank for" both sides, the affidavit stated.

In 2005, after an audit, the North Carolina Department of Revenue issued a notice to Wal-Mart challenging the REIT structure. The state is site of about 140 of the company's roughly 3,900 U.S. stores, including Sam's Clubs. Wal-Mart paid the $33 million the state sought, and in March 2006 sued for a refund.

The company argues that the state does not have the authority to essentially combine the results of the subsidiary that did business in North Carolina with those of the Delaware-based unit and the REIT. The Delaware-based subsidiary, the company says, did no business in North Carolina and therefore was not taxable there. The company says in court filings that the REIT was qualified under federal law, that all the deductions were properly taken and that its North Carolina tax returns reflect its "true income."

Earned Income Tax Credit To Get A Push (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, February 1, 2007

The IRS, the U.S. Treasurer and a coalition of consumer groups plan to launch a nationwide initiative today to encourage more low-income families to claim the earned income tax credit, an often-overlooked benefit that's worth up to $4,536 this year.

Consumer advocates and the IRS say they hope the program will also reduce the number of low-income taxpayers who take out refund-anticipation loans — high-interest loans offered by some tax-preparation companies. Though the use of those loans fell by more than 20% in the 2005 tax-filing season, they're still used by about 30% of EITC recipients, says Chi Chi Wu of the National Consumer Law Center.

Refund-anticipation loans let taxpayers get their money right away — but at a steep price. Fees range from $30 to more than $125, and the effective interest rate can range from 40% to 500%, says the Consumer Federation of America. The federation says the loans are unnecessary because people who file electronically can get their refunds in two weeks or less. Under their initiative, the IRS and consumer groups will promote volunteer sites where low-income taxpayers can have returns prepared and filed electronically for free.

In an interview Wednesday, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson called the refund-anticipation loans "predatory" and said some ads for them are "over the top."

"They're giving tax preparers a bad name," Everson said.

Dan Smith, a spokesman for H&R Block, the nation's largest tax-preparation chain, said it has reduced the cost of refund-anticipation loans by up to 40%. Some taxpayers can't benefit from electronic filing and direct deposit because they have no bank account, Smith said. For those people, he said, H&R Block provides "the lowest-cost short-term option available."

The earned income tax credit is designed to offset Social Security taxes and help families escape poverty. The refund amount is based on income, filing status and the number of qualified children in the family (see box). Even families who owe no taxes may be eligible, said U.S. Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral. Yet up to a quarter of eligible taxpayers fail to claim the EITC.

The credit "can transform a family's life," Everson said.

Separately, the IRS said Wednesday that more than a third of taxpayers who have already filed their returns failed to claim the new telephone excise-tax refund, which is worth up to $60. Others who requested the refund are inflating the size of their claims, the IRS said.

The government stopped collecting the tax in August after courts ruled it had been illegally applied to long-distance service. Taxpayers can claim a standard amount, ranging from $30 to $60, or the actual amount of taxes paid from Feb. 28, 2003, to Aug. 1, 2006.

The IRS said some early filers have requested refunds that seem to be based on their entire phone bill, not just the long-distance excise tax. The IRS is also investigating whether some preparers urged filers to seek larger refunds than they're entitled to, Everson said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Addresses Income Inequality (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 31 -- President Bush acknowledged Wednesday that there is growing income inequality in the United States, addressing for the first time a subject that has long concerned Democrats and liberal economists.

"The fact is that income inequality is real -- it's been rising for more than 25 years," Bush said in an address on Wall Street. "The reason is clear: We have an economy that increasingly rewards education and skills because of that education."

In some respects, Bush's remarks were an unremarkable statement of what many economists accept as common wisdom. But they appeared to represent the first time Bush has personally addressed an issue on which his administration has found itself under fierce attack from Democrats. The official White House Web site offers no record of Bush uttering the phrase "income inequality" in a speech or remarks, and aides said they could not recollect such an instance.

The comments came during a generally upbeat economic speech outlining Bush's economic agenda and the state of the economy.

They appeared to be another presidential nod to the evolving political landscape on Capitol Hill, now controlled by Democrats after a campaign that focused in part on their complaints of corporate greed and growing middle-class insecurity. House Democrats have pressed that agenda with legislation to raise the minimum wage, cut interest rates for college loans and reduce prescription drug prices for Medicare recipients.

In three separate hearings Wednesday in Washington, Democrats probed the causes of middle-class angst, focusing on rising income inequality. Meanwhile, the Senate separately has taken aim at executive compensation, adding a provision to the minimum-wage bill that would limit the ability of executives to amass millions of dollars in tax-deferred accounts.

In his remarks, Bush also touched on that hot-button issue, saying the "salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders." While Bush said the government should not set compensation, he told the business executives gathered in the ornate rotunda of Federal Hall that they "need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve."

Democrats said Bush's speech is a reaction to the success of their agenda and to growing anger among voters who feel they are being left behind.

"They recognize the unhappiness voters have with inequity in this country," said Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee. "For much of last year, they tried to deny this. But the election finally clinched it. So I guess there's no point in denying it anymore."

Bush aides did not deny that Bush was seeking to address Democratic concerns, but they said income inequality has been on the minds of senior administration officials such as Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., who mentioned the subject in his first major address last spring, and chief economic adviser Edward Lazear.

"It's something that obviously the administration has made note of," said presidential counselor Dan Bartlett. The president "understands that there are many Democrats who have spoken to this issue. It is an important time for the Congress and the American people to hear what he says," Bartlett said.

Few economists would disagree that income inequality is real and getting worse. The gap between rich and poor has been growing wider since the 1970s. According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, the wealthiest 20 percent of households accounted for 45.4 percent of total U.S. income in 1979, but claimed 53.5 percent in 2004. Households in the bottom fifth dropped from 5.8 to 4.1 percent over the same period.

Democrats have blamed Bush's tax policies for contributing to that trend. Wealthy households reaped the most benefit from tax cuts enacted between 2001 and 2006, according to an analysis by the Tax Policy Center, a project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution. Last year, families making more than $1 million a year saw their after-tax income increase by 6 percent because of the tax cuts, while families making $40,000 to $75,000 saw after-tax income rise by about 2.5 percent.

"Years ago, we used to have a grade at Princeton called 'flagrant neglect.' That's what they should get. Because they're aggressively making the problem worse," said Alan S. Blinder, a Princeton University economist and the former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors.

At the same time, Blinder said, neither Bush nor federal policies in general are responsible for the problem. And Bush is correct, he said, in arguing that the nation's economic losers typically lack sufficient education. "Sometime in the 1970s, the market turned ferociously against the less skilled and the less educated," Blinder told a hearing of the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

But that is likely to change in the future, he said, as globalization and technological advances begin to trigger the same kind of upheaval in the service sector as has hit manufacturing.

Bush cited income inequality in the part of his speech touting the No Child Left Behind Act. He described the bill as "one of the most important economic initiatives" of his presidency because of its role in closing what he terms the "achievement gap" between students.

"The question is whether we respond to the income inequality we see with policies that help lift people up, or tear others down," Bush said. "The key to rising in this economy is skills -- and the government's job is to make sure we have an education system that delivers them."

Bush Assails 'Income Inequality' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

President Bush yesterday said there is a growing "income inequality" gap between rich and poor Americans, and told companies they should rethink the giant compensation packages they offer top executives.

The markedly populist message, a divergence from the past, in which Mr. Bush has accused critics of practicing class warfare, was all the more noteworthy given his venue -- a speech at Federal Hall in New York, in the middle of Wall Street, the capital of capitalism.

But the president called for conservative market-based answers, including demanding that Congress renew trade-promotion authority, which allows him to negotiate trade agreements then present them to Congress in a take-it-or-leave-it fashion.

Mr. Bush said he expects a bruising debate before his current trade-promotion authority expires July 1.

"Bashing trade can make for good sound bites on the evening news," Mr. Bush said. "But walling off America from world trade would be a disaster for our economy. Congress needs to reject protectionism."

In what was billed as his update on the state of the U.S. economy, Mr. Bush took credit for the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, promised to submit a budget next week that eliminates the deficit in 2012, and asked Congress to give him a version of line-item veto authority.

"When people across the world look at America's economy, what they see is low inflation, low unemployment and the fastest growth of any major industrialized nation," he said. "There is one undisputed leader in the world in terms of economy, and that's the United States of America."

But Democrats said Mr. Bush's rosy picture of the overall economy was out of focus.

"If you really spend time out in middle-class America -- if you descend from the president's economic view at 30,000 feet to the real communities of Main Street America -- you know that all is not well with the middle class," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat.

Mr. Bush has spoken of corporate responsibility before, most notably following the accounting scandals that ensnared companies such as Enron early in his administration.

But yesterday marked the first time he has spoken of a problem of income inequality.

"The fact is that income inequality is real; it's been rising for more than 25 years," he said, adding that he sees the dividing line as between those with good educations and those without.

He also challenged businesses to "step up to their responsibilities."

"They need to pay attention to the executive-compensation packages that you approve. You need to show the world that America's businesses are a model of transparency and good corporate governance," he said.

After his speech, the president made an unannounced stop on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, getting a warm reception amid the chaos of the room.

But his reception in the new Democrat-controlled Congress has been chilly so far.

The most contentious of the ideas in yesterday's speech is free trade, an issue that used to enjoy the support of a strong bipartisan coalition, but which has seen Democratic support crumble after President Clinton left office.

Mr. Bush yesterday pressed to complete the Doha round of expanded free-trade talks at the World Trade Organization, saying it can help the U.S. economy and also lift millions of people worldwide out of poverty.

"We are dedicated to making sure we have a successful Doha round," he said.

Labor unions, though, called for a break from new trade agreements.

"We need a strategic pause to assess what have been the real and significant costs of our trade policy for working men and women in the U.S. and abroad," said AFL-CIO President John Sweeney.

And Mr. Bush's call for clamping down on lawsuits came under fire from trial lawyers, with the American Association for Justice -- formerly the American Trial Lawyers Association -- accusing him of ignoring the nation's major issues in favor of "corporate bottom lines and a free pass for corporate friends."

Bush: Link Exec Salaries To Performance (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 1, 2007

President Bush took aim Wednesday at lavish salaries and bonuses for corporate executives, standing on Wall Street to issue a sharp warning for corporate boards to "step up to their responsibilities" and tie compensation packages to performance.

Bush's "State of the Economy" speech, delivered from the financial center of the world, was aimed at bringing his economic message out of the shadows of the Iraq war. On his second day in a row focused on the economy, the government reported faster-than-expected growth of 3.5 percent in the final quarter of last year.

The president acknowledged people's continuing nervousness about their financial picture, despite a string of similar reports that provide some reason for optimism. He said some workers are being left behind in the booming economy and the disparity between the rich and the poor is growing.

"The fact is that income inequality is real. It has been rising for more than 25 years," the president said. "The earnings gap is now twice as wide as it was in 1980," Bush said, adding that more education and training can lift peoples' salaries.

The president spoke to an audience of business leaders at the venerable Federal Hall — a symbol of both America's democracy and its economic resilience. Later, he stopped along Broad Street to shake hands with New York police officers and then ducked inside the New York Stock Exchange. The surprise visit caused a frenzy on the already chaotic trading floor. It was so crowded that traders standing just five feet away of Bush had a better view of him on television screens.

In his address, Bush said he realized that stories about the enormous salaries and other perks for CEOs, for instance, create anger and uncertainty that affect the country's investors.

The president does not endorse any government role in reducing those packages. Instead, Bush highlighted new federal rules that the administration thinks are a better path toward wise compensation decisions by companies.

"Government should not decide the compensation for America's corporate executives," he said. "But the salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders."

In effect starting last month, the rules give investors access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks. Their impact will become apparent as corporations begin issuing 2006 annual reports.

"America's corporate boardrooms must step up to their responsibilities," Bush said. "You need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve. You need to show the world that America's businesses are a model of transparency and good corporate governance."

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, has said he will push legislation to require shareholder approval of executive compensation plans. And a separate bill before the Senate to raise the minimum wage would fund accompanying tax breaks to ease the burden on small businesses by capping executives' tax-deferred pay packages at $1 million a year.

Still, even Bush's words on pay were met with complete silence from the business crowd he addressed.

Huge salaries and other perks for CEO have drawn investor ire and made splashy headlines. Anger over executive compensation unrelated to performance, even as companies stumble, lay off employees or renege on billions of dollars in pension obligations for workers' retirement, has spread from shareholders to union activists and buttoned-down mutual fund trustees. The chasm between executives' salaries and the pay of rank-and-file employees continues to widen.

Home Depot chief executive Bob Nardelli was earning an average of $25.7 million a year — excluding stock options — before he was forced out in a furor over his hefty pay. He left with a severance package worth about $210 million.

In 2001, General Electric Co. paid chief executive Jack Welch $16.25 million. Welch was replaced that year with Jeffrey Immelt, who earned $3.4 million in total annual compensation in 2005.

The New York Stock Exchange faced an uproar over former CEO Richard Grasso's $187.5 million severance package. Former New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, now governor, sued members of the NYSE board over the package given to Grasso when he quit as chairman in 2003.

The annual salary of the president is $400,000.

"The state of our economy is strong," he declared.

Democrats respond that Bush is giving a misleadingly rosy picture about the economy.

"President Bush can deliver all the economic pep talks he wants, but the fact remains that his failed leadership has led to the worst job recovery on record, stagnating household incomes, a rise in poverty and record deficits," said Stacie Paxton, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee.

Since Bush took office in 2001, the country has seen one in five manufacturing jobs disappear, a total of 2.96 million lost jobs. The U.S. trade deficit is expected to climb to a fifth consecutive record when final 2006 figures are totaled next month.

Bush Tells Wall St. To Rethink Pay Practices (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

President Bush yesterday called on corporate boards to hold their chief executives more accountable by tying their pay to performance — a new message from a president who is closely allied to the business community.

Addressing business leaders on Wall Street, Mr. Bush said “the salaries and bonuses of C.E.O.s should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders.”

“America’s corporate boardrooms must step up to their responsibilities,” he said. “You need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve.”

Mr. Bush’s comments, made at one of Wall Street’s great landmarks, Federal Hall National Memorial, were met with silence from an otherwise friendly crowd gathered to hear what the White House billed as a “State of the Economy” speech. It came more than a week after his State of the Union address, and days ahead of the unveiling of his annual budget on Monday.

The president may be buffeted by bad news out of Iraq and record-low poll ratings, but he was buoyed on yesterday by positive economic signals. And he purposely chose Wall Street as the arena for his message that the economy is vibrant, a theme his aides hope can help him rebuild his flagging support.

The visit included a surprise stop on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, where his path through the crowd was marked by an audible wake of cheers.

(White House officials said Ronald Reagan was the only other president to visit the stock exchange during trading hours.)

With Democrats and some Republicans continuing to discuss resolutions critical of his new plan for Iraq in Washington, Mr. Bush used his speech earlier at Federal Hall to flaunt new economic data.

Speaking before the Association for a Better New York, a civic group, Mr. Bush invited Democrats to join him in finding a long-term fix for Social Security, warned them against raising taxes and asked lawmakers from both parties to renew his authority to negotiate trade deals and submit them to Congress for straight up or down votes without amendments.

The president's trade authority is set to expire July 1. He indicated that he expected his call for its renewal to prompt a fierce debate with members of Congress who have expressed increasing concern about the effect of global trade deals on American workers — an issue in the 2006 midterm elections and certain to be one again in 2008.

"I know there's going to be a vigorous debate on trade, and bashing trade can make for good sound bites on the evening news," Mr. Bush said. "But walling off America from world trade would be a disaster for our economy. Congress needs to reject protectionism."

Democrats have said that they would seek to include new environmental and labor requirements for future trade deals as a condition for renewing the president's negotiating authority.

His call for closer scrutiny of executive pay seemed to pit him against natural allies in the business community who have supported him throughout his political career.

For the last few years, shareholder advocates and lawmakers have criticized the growing chasm between executive pay and workers' salaries, often in harsh tones. But executive pay continues to rise rapidly.

The average pay for a top executive is now 170 times that of the average worker, according to recent academic research.

White House officials said that Mr. Bush decided to raise the issue out of his own sense of outrage over deals in which executives have left flagging or failed companies with huge compensation packages, as workers and lower-level executives have been left far behind.

But officials said there was also an economic concern: that distrust of corporate executives over their pay had the potential to scare individual investors out of the market.

"Our capital markets are based on trust," said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor.

Mr. Bush said he did not believe that the government should interfere in corporate governance, a swipe at Democratic plans to push legislation requiring shareholder votes on pay packages. Rather, he said he supported new rules by the Securities and Exchange Commission requiring greater disclosure of executive pay packages.

"I appreciate the fact that the S.E.C. has issued new rules to ensure that there is transparency when it comes to executive pay packages," Mr. Bush said. "The print ought to be big and understandable."

But compensation experts say that better disclosure has often led to even greater paychecks once executives see what their peers make and demand that their boards match or exceed it.

Bush Sides With Corporations On Executive Pay Issue (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK -- President Bush stepped into the swirling debate over executive pay on Wednesday, saying that corporate directors, not government officials, should be the ones to judge whether chief executives are earning their keep.

"Government should not decide the compensation for America's corporate executives, but the salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders," Bush told business leaders gathered at historic Federal Hall here.

"America's corporate boardrooms must step up to their responsibilities," Bush said. "You need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve."

The Republican president's comments came a day after the Democratic-led Senate agreed to vote on a measure that would limit the amount of executive pay eligible for tax-free deferral. The bill was introduced amid widening criticism of corporate compensation packages that guarantee huge paychecks, even for executives who don't succeed.

In January, for example, Bob Nardelli was forced out as the chief executive of Home Depot Inc., walking away with stock-based compensation and severance pay valued at $210 million. During his tenure, the company's shares lost 12 percent.

Corporate-governance activists were pleased to hear Bush call on corporate directors to do their jobs, but said his comments were unlikely to stem the trend of rising pay. Bush devoted only a few sentences to the topic at the end of a broad economic speech.

"It's a little late for him to comment on this situation that has caused so much controversy over the past five years," said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at the Corporate Library, a Maine-based firm that studies executive compensation and related issues. "It's very clear that he's not going to take any legislative action in this area."

Brian Foley, an executive-compensation expert in White Plains, N.Y., agreed with Bush that the government should not set pay levels. But he said the president could have spoken out more forcefully.

"He certainly could have been a little more pointed and used the bully pulpit to say we need more restraint in the corner office," Foley said.

Bush's mention of CEO pay set off a mini-firestorm in executive-compensation circles as consultants and lawyers murmured back and forth about the message the president was conveying. There was so much e-mailing going on, "I was surprised we didn't have a brown-out," said Bob Profusek, a lawyer at Jones Day in New York.

Profusek believes that executive pay is not a problem and that corporate directors work hard to offer fair pay. Others with that belief seemed to think the president had turned on them.

"It was 'can you believe this -- even Bush has jumped on this bandwagon,'" Profusek said.

The president's comments came at the end of a "State of the Economy" address across the street from the New York Stock Exchange at Federal Hall, where George Washington was inaugurated.

"I like to call him George W.," Bush joked.

After dwelling briefly on the economy in his State of the Union speech last week, Bush is trumpeting the economy's strong performance as he stumps for domestic policy goals, such as extending tax cuts.

On Wednesday, Bush laid out policy proposals in four areas -- trade, health care, energy and education.

While praising the economy as vibrant, Bush addressed concerns that globalization and corporate mergers are causing job fears.

"By and large, our dynamic and innovative economy has helped Americans live better and more comfortable lives," Bush said, but he acknowledged that "for many Americans, change means having to find a new job, or to deal with a new boss after a merger or to go back to school to learn new skills for a new career."

Bush also addressed the pay gap between rich and poor.

"The fact is that income inequality is real," Bush said, adding, "The earnings gap is now twice as wide as it was in 1980 -- and it continues to grow."

Bush Gives Hope To Foes Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

President Bush, in a Wall Street speech, backed business demands to pare post-Enron reforms, which he called "costly for businesses." But he also used the forum to join the chorus of critics questioning lavish executive pay.

"Government should not decide the compensation for America's corporate executives," Mr. Bush said, "but the salaries and bonuses of CEOs should be based on their success at improving their companies and bringing value to their shareholders." He said corporate directors bear the responsibility for keeping pay in line, adding: "You need to pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve."

QUESTION OF THE DAY

Vote: Are Bush's policies helping or hurting the economy?2

The president addressed business executives yesterday at historic Federal Hall on Wall Street, the site where the federal government began in 1789. He touted the robust U.S. economy while recapping the country's economic comeback after the 2001 terrorist attacks. Mr. Bush spoke on a day the government reported a sharp rebound in economic growth late last year, and more evidence that inflationary threats are receding.

Aides said the White House decided on a separate speech on the economy because last week's State of the Union address focused largely on Iraq and foreign policy, as well as a new outreach to Democrats on domestic policy.

Later, the president made an unscheduled stop at the New York Stock Exchange, touching off a 15-minute frenzy of well-wishing and cellphone picture-taking on the floor. Mr. Bush was the second president to visit the floor during trading hours; President Reagan was the first, White House officials said.

IN THE MONEY

• The News: President Bush went to Wall Street to tout the strength of the nation's economy.

• The Message: Mr. Bush joined calls to soften the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, but also questioned lavish executive compensation.

• What's Next: While the president's attacks on pay are largely rhetorical, Democrats are exploring action.

In his speech, Mr. Bush repeated his view that the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law he signed amid a wave of corporate accounting scandals has been a success. But he gave encouragement to the law's critics, saying that one section in particular "may be discouraging companies from listing on our stock exchanges."

He said "we don't need to change the law; we need to change the way the law is implemented," and praised efforts by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson -- former head of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. -- and Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox to roll back what they have termed excesses.

Mr. Bush's comments likely will fuel efforts to relax Sarbanes-Oxley, particularly Section 404, which requires companies to assess whether they have adequate controls over their financial reporting. Business groups, especially smaller companies, say the assessments are costly and burdensome, and focus on minor issues such as who has access to office keys, while placing insufficient emphasis on who has access to financial records.

Mr. Cox has already begun watering down the provision, and Mr. Bush's remarks provide him with political cover to go further. Mr. Paulson, chairman of the president's Working Group on Capital Markets, plans to host a conference this spring to examine the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets and may make his own recommendations on some rules.

While giving Wall Street comfort on the regulatory front, Mr. Bush nodded to the political clamor over economic disparity, saying, "The fact is that income inequality is real." While he traced that mainly to gaps in education, the president then turned to the increasingly controversial subject of executive pay, saying: "A free and vibrant economy depends on public trust. Shareholders should know what executive compensation packages look like." He applauded new SEC rules that require more disclosure of pay details.

The new Democratic Congress, however, plans to try to push Mr. Bush further than he has so far seemed willing to go, both on executive pay and on inequality more broadly. The Senate will pass as soon as today legislation that would raise taxes on certain forms of executive compensation.

In an interview, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said he plans to push ahead with a measure giving corporate shareholders more power to vote on executive compensation. He said it is "unrealistic to expect boards of directors to serve as a check on CEOs," as Mr. Bush suggested, because "the relationship is too close."

In one of many hearings on Capitol Hill of late exploring challenges middle-class families are facing, the Joint Economic Committee yesterday heard testimony from two former Treasury secretaries under President Clinton, Robert Rubin and Larry Summers. Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, chairman of the committee, said "this administration has simply ignored those new challenges for the last six years."

Bush Calls On Companies To Uphold Americans' Trust (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK — Days before he unveils his budget proposal, President Bush addressed fears about a growing wage gap and called on companies to tie executive compensation to performance.

Bush, speaking from the nation's financial center, pronounced the U.S. economy as strong but noted "income inequality is real." His speech at Federal Hall and a surprise visit to the New York Stock Exchange's trading floor came as the government reported the economy grew 3.5% in the fourth quarter last year.

"When people across the world look at America's economy, what they see is low inflation, low unemployment and the fastest growth of any major industrialized nation," Bush said.

It was Bush's second speech this week focusing on the economy. On Monday, he will unveil his proposed budget for the 2008 fiscal year, which will begin on Oct. 1.

In his remarks, Bush called on Congress to extend tax cuts and renew "fast track" trade authority, which requires Congress to cast an up-or-down vote on any international trade deal and make no amendments to the agreements.

Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, and other Democrats have criticized recent trade deals as allowing businesses to move jobs overseas and ignore environmental and labor standards.

Bush highlighted the economy's growth and low unemployment and noted the earnings gap between the rich and poor is twice what it was in 1980. The president said an improved education system is vital to lifting wages and repeated his call for Congress to renew his No Child Left Behind education law.

The president also said "a free and vibrant economy depends on public trust" and called on companies to make clear the details of executive pay packages. "The print ought to be big and understandable," he said.

Bush said government should not decide executive compensation, but he urged corporate boards to "pay attention" to the salaries and bonuses they approve.

"You need to show the world that American businesses are a model of transparency and good corporate governance," he said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and other Democrats said Bush's proposals for economic growth are inadequate. Schumer said that when average Americans look at the economy, they see higher prices for fuel, tuition and health care.

"Criticizing CEO pay won't do anything to raise the wages of average Americans," Schumer said.

After his speech to a New York civic group, Bush crossed the street to the New York Stock Exchange, whose record levels Bush also touted. His appearance on the crowded trading floor sparked a frenzy.

Bush also dealt with the lingering effects of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center. He met privately with Ceasar Borja Jr., 21, the son of a New York police officer who died last week of lung problems. The Borja family attributed his illness to rescue work at Ground Zero in the days after the 9/11 attacks.

Borja attended Bush's State of the Union speech last week with New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on the same day his father died. He asked Bush for federal assistance to help other responders who have fallen ill after 9/11.

Before the meeting, the White House said it would include $25 million in assistance as part of the budget to be unveiled Monday.

Borja said he was pleased with the president's commitment. "I did feel that he cares," he said, but he added that more money will be needed in the future.

Economy Grows At 3.5 Percent Pace In 4Q (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, February 1, 2007

The economy snapped out of a sluggish spell and grew at a faster-than-expected 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year as consumers ratcheted up spending despite a painful housing slump.

DOJ_NMG_0125405

The fresh snapshot of business activity, released by the Commerce Department Wednesday, underscored the resilience of the economy; it has managed to keep on moving despite the ill effects of the residential real-estate bust and an ailing automotive sector.

The economy's performance in the October-to-December quarter, which followed two quarters of rather listless activity, exceeded analysts' forecasts for a 3 percent growth rate.

The economy opened 2006 on a strong note, growing at a 5.6 percent pace, the fastest spurt in 2 1/2 years. But it lost steam during the spring and late summer. It grew at a 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter and then a weaker 2 percent pace in the third quarter. The fourth-quarter's rebound ended the year on a positive note.

Against this backdrop, the Federal Reserve on Wednesday left a key interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, citing improvements in economic growth and in inflation.

On Wall Street, stocks soared. The Dow Jones industrials gained 98.38 points to close at 12,621.69.

For all of 2006, the gross domestic product (GDP) increased by 3.4 percent. That was an improvement from a 3.2 percent showing in 2005 and was the best performance in two years.

That's even more impressive considering the economy was hit by the housing slump. Investment in home building for all of last year was slashed by 4.2 percent, the most in 15 years.

GDP measures the value of all goods and services produced within the United States and is the best barometer of the country's economic standing.

"Housing and autos hit the economy with their best punch, and the economy is still standing. It is dancing," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group.

The White House pointed to the GDP figures as evidence that the president's policies are working and benefiting most Americans. President Bush, in a trip to New York, to highlight his economic stewardship declared: "The state of our economy is strong."

But Democrats, now in control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, counter that economic inequality is widening and that it's harder for the middle class to get ahead.

An AP-Ipsos poll in early January found that 55 percent of Americans disapproved of the president's handling of the economy, while 43 percent approved.

In other economic news, employers' costs to hire and retain workers moderated, which could ease concerns about the development of inflation pressures. Wages and benefits rose 0.8 percent in the fourth quarter, down from a 1 percent rise in the third quarter, the Labor Department reported.

Spending on construction projects around the country dropped 0.4 percent in December, after edging up in November, mostly reflecting fallout from the housing slump, the Commerce Department said in another report.

In the GDP report, consumers spent more freely in the fourth quarter, a major factor behind the rebound in overall economic activity. Consumer spending grew at a 4.4 percent annual rate, up from a 2.8 percent pace in the third quarter and the strongest since the opening quarter of 2006.

An improvement in the nation's trade picture helped by stronger U.S. export growth also was a factor in the overall GDP boost.

More brisk government spending also helped the fourth-quarter GDP. Government spending increased at a 3.7 percent pace in the final quarter, up from a 1.7 percent growth rate in the third quarter. Federal spending on national defense rose at a rate of 11.9 percent in the fourth quarter, the most since the spring of 2003, when the country went to war with Iraq.

All those positive contributions to GDP helped to blunt some negative forces.

Investment in home building during the fourth quarter plunged at a rate of 19.2 percent, even worse than the 18.7 percent drop in the prior quarter. Both were the worst drops in 15 years.

The drop in residential building in the fourth quarter shaved 1.16 percentage points off GDP. In the third quarter, it sliced a bigger 1.20 percentage point off of overall economic growth. That led to hope that the damage to the economy from the housing slump might be easing a bit.

DOJ_NMG_0125406

In the troubled automotive sector, a pullback in car and truck production shaved 1.17 percentage points off fourth-quarter GDP.

Businesses, meanwhile, trimmed investment in equipment and software. They also didn't invest as much in building their inventories as they had in the previous quarter.

An inflation gauge tied to the GDP report showed that core prices — excluding food and energy — rose at a rate of 2.1 percent in the final quarter of last year, down from a 2.2 percent pace in the third quarter.

Even with the slight improvement, underlying inflation is running higher than the Federal Reserve would like. For all of 2006, core inflation rose by 2.2 percent, up from 2.1 percent in 2005.

Economy Gained Strength In 2006 (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The U.S. economy turned in a surprisingly strong performance last year, new data show, growing 3.4 percent despite higher interest rates, high oil prices and the sharpest housing downturn in 15 years.

The report from the Commerce Department, showing that economic growth picked up in 2006 from the 3.2 percent growth of 2005, dispelled any lingering doubts about the momentum of the economy going into this year. Many economists predict growth will slow this year, but gone are the recession worries of last summer.

"Nothing, other than an external shock, will derail the economy this year," said Eugenio J. Alem?n, senior economist at Wells Fargo. "The economy's in good shape."

Unemployment and inflation fell last year while wages and salaries rose at their quickest pace in five years, according to a series of recent government reports. The reports suggest that troubles in housing and manufacturing, though painful for many people, have not caused the widespread economic damage that many experts had feared.

Federal Reserve policymakers held short-term interest rates steady yesterday, showing they are content -- at least for now -- with the state of the economy. They left their benchmark rate on overnight loans between banks unchanged at 5.25 percent, where it has been since June. But they indicated that they remain ready to raise borrowing costs if strong economic growth fuels a fresh bout of inflation.

President Bush hailed the news in a speech extolling the strong "state of the economy" on Wall Street, where he was also mobbed visiting the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. "As we begin this New Year, America's businesses and entrepreneurs are creating new jobs every day," he said. "Workers are making more money; their paychecks are going further. Consumers are confident, investors are optimistic."

The bright picture contrasts with the outlook of last summer, when home sales were plummeting and oil was hitting $77 a barrel. Many analysts predicted that consumer spending would stall because of costly gasoline, rising unemployment, and stagnant or falling home prices.

But the economy's buoyancy reflects two little-appreciated facts. First, the economy is less vulnerable to high oil prices than in the past, for several reasons, including improved efficiency.

Second, while the housing boom did give the economy a boost, the housing bust has not damaged the rapidly growing service industries, which employ about 80 percent of U.S. workers. And those jobs fuel consumer spending, which accounts for 70 percent of economic activity.

"This is not your grandfather's economy," said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research. "This is not a smokestack economy. . . . The consumer is the ultimate driver of the economy."

Economic growth did slow sharply in the spring and summer from a torrid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year to a 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter and then 2 percent in the third quarter.

Much of the decline was accounted for by home building, which fell at a 19 percent annual rate in both the third and fourth quarters.

Nonetheless, overall economic growth rebounded in the last three months of the year, with gross domestic product, the value of all goods and services produced in the country, rising at a robust 3.5 percent annual rate.

DOJ_NMG_0125407

Unemployment drifted lower through the year, to 4.5 percent in December from 4.9 percent a year earlier. The job market remained tight as employers in health, education, finance and other service industries created many more new jobs than were cut by mortgage lenders, home builders and automakers.

And the economy got a lift as oil prices tumbled to about $61 a barrel by the end of 2006 -- about where they had been a year earlier.

Drivers paying less at the pump had more to spend on shopping during the holiday season. Consumer spending rose at a blistering 4.4 percent annual rate in the last three months of the year, the Commerce Department said yesterday.

Falling oil prices helped shave the nation's import bill at year-end, and strong economic growth overseas boosted demand for U.S. exports. The Commerce Department estimated that the improvement in trade added 1.6 percentage points to the rate of economic growth in the fourth quarter.

Businesses continued to build more offices, factories and other types of nonresidential structures, helping to cushion some of the effect of the housing downturn on construction industries.

And unusually warm weather probably prompted more shopping, hiring and construction than would have occurred in colder conditions, several economists said.

Although some of the year-end momentum reflected such temporary factors, analysts said, the tight labor market bodes well for 2007.

The Commerce Department report "shows you the ability of the economy to ride out the storm of the housing market," said Wells Fargo's Alem?n. "The rest of the economy is so strong." Inflation also cooled slightly last year. Consumer prices rose 2.8 percent, a bit less than the 2.9 percent gain recorded the year before, the agency said.

Many economists seek a sense of underlying inflation by looking at so-called core inflation, which excludes volatile food and fuel prices. Core prices rose 2.1 percent in 2006 after rising 2.2 percent in 2005.

The Fed noted the improvement but said in a statement that "inflation risks remain" because of the possibility that the tight labor market will fan price pressures.

A separate Labor Department report yesterday showed that wages and salaries rose 3.2 percent last year, the fastest rate in five years.

Employers' labor costs -- including both pay and benefits -- rose 3.3 percent in 2006, up from the 3.1 percent gain in 2005.

Several analysts said the gains should not alarm the Fed. "Employers' labor costs remain moderate and do not appear to be generating inflationary pressures," said Jared Bernstein, senior economist at the Economic Policy Institute.

The economy is likely to grow about 2.4 percent this year -- more slowly than last year but at a moderately good pace -- according to the average prediction of economists surveyed by Blue Chip Indicators, a monthly publication.

Housing is likely to remain a drag on growth. Builders are still stuck with bloated inventories of unsold homes. Unemployment may rise this spring when builders break ground on far fewer new homes.

But several analysts said that despite these lingering soft spots, the Fed appears to have achieved the Holy Grail of central banking -- a "soft landing" in which it raised interest rates last year just enough to cool price pressures without triggering a recession.

Now, the central bank is likely to leave interest rates on hold for a while, said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for Global Insight. "The Fed has the economy where it wants it."

US GDP Grows 3.5% In Fourth Quarter (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

The US economy expanded at a fast pace last quarter as consumer demand and exports rose while inflation cooled, government figures published on Wednesday showed.

Gross domestic product increased by 3.5 per cent in the last three months of 2006 after a gain of 2 per cent in the previous quarter, while rises in core prices slowed to a rate of 2.1 per cent from 2.2 per cent, the commerce department said.

The stronger-than-expected performance comes as investors and economists are radically upgrading their assumptions about the trajectory of the economy to bring them into line with the confident outlook of the Federal Reserve.

The Fed is expected to keep interest rates on hold when it wraps up its monetary policy meeting later on Wednesday, while warning that it remains wary about the risk of rising inflation in the coming year.

Drew Mathus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The growth figure shows us that 2006 ended with a bang. It also tells us that the first quarter is not likely to be exceptionally weak. We can also see that inflation remains a modest risk."

"On balance the Fed is more likely to raise rates than cute rates this year, although we're currently expecting the Fed to stay on hold for the rest of the year," the economist added.

The figures sent waves through financial markets as the dollar gained against the euro and yen and bond yields rose to five-year highs.

The yield on the 30-year long-bond rose to more than 5 per cent while the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury bond rose to 4.9 per cent.

The positive economic data released on Wednesday is broadly in line with the central bank's internal assessment of the economy and is unlikely to alter significantly its outlook for interest rates.

Much of the accelerated growth is attributable to a sharp 4.4 per cent rise in personal consumption, as Americans continue to spend despite the correction in the housing market.

The economy was also strengthened by a 10 per cent rise in exports, compared with an increase of 6.8 per cent in the third quarter.

U.S. Economy Grows 3.5%; Inflation Gauge Falls Sharply (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

If the housing slump has the potential to sink the U.S. economy, that danger wasn't evident in the latest data on economic growth.

In the fourth quarter, consumers did more than enough shopping to offset a sharp drop in housing, propelling the nation's economy to a seasonally and inflation-adjusted growth rate of 3.5%. That was up from 2.0% in the third quarter and 2.6% in the second, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

ECONOMISTS REACT

The economy "busted out" in the fourth quarter, one economist said, after the fourth-quarter GDP reading surpassed even raised forecasts. Read economists' reactions2 to the report.

Consumer spending, which makes up more than two-thirds of the U.S. economy, rose at an annualized rate of 4.4.%, contributing 3.1 percentage points to the fourth-quarter growth in gross domestic product. GDP is a broad measure of economic activity.

Residential investment, meanwhile, plummeted an annualized 19.2% as home builders cut back on construction, shaving 1.2 percentage points from fourth-quarter growth.

Though still subject to revisions, the solid GDP report amply exceeded economists' expectations, and adds credence to the idea that the Federal Reserve's inflation-fighting efforts, which some had worried would trigger a recession, haven't broken the economy's momentum. For all of 2006, real GDP grew at a rate of 3.4%, up from 3.2% in 2005 and well above its 20-year average of 3.1%.

"The soft landing is over, and I'm not even sure there was a landing," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at consulting firm Global Insight.

Growth in the fourth quarter might have been even stronger than the official figures suggest. That's because an anomalous drop in recorded light-truck prices boosted the government's estimate of inflation-adjusted auto output in the third quarter. Some of that effect unwound in the fourth quarter, contributing to a drop in auto output that shaved 1.2 percentage points off the GDP number.

Economists attributed the robust growth to a combination of factors. For one, lower fuel prices, rising income and a buoyant stock market encouraged consumers to spend more. Also, the trade picture improved: Strong growth outside the U.S. boosted exports, while imports fell as U.S.-based businesses worked down backlogs of unsold goods instead of buying more stuff from abroad. Finally, some believe construction activity would have fallen more steeply were it not for unusually warm weather, which allowed builders to break ground on more projects than they otherwise would. The Commerce Department said construction spending fell 0.4% in December from November.

Economists warned that some of the drivers of fourth-quarter growth, particularly the weather effect, are likely to reverse themselves in quarters to come. "The return to more-seasonable weather probably means that we're going to see some payback in economic activity, although modest," said Richard Berner, chief U.S. economist at Morgan Stanley in New York. Forecasters tracked by consulting firm Macroeconomic Advisers expect real GDP to grow at an annualized rate of 2.6% in the current quarter.

The GDP report sent mixed signals to investors. In recent months, stock and bond prices have been boosted in part by expectations that the Fed will lower short-term interest rates this year to offset the effects of the housing slump and stimulate the broader economy. But as the economy has proven more resilient than expected, investors have abandoned their hopes for a shot of cheap money. Some have even begun to entertain the possibility that the Fed will lean toward raising rates to keep inflation in check—a bias the central bank reiterated in its monetary-policy statement yesterday.

"All in all the economy appears to be extremely healthy," said David Glocke, senior portfolio manager at The Vanguard Group in Valley Forge, Pa. "The risk is that if inflation doesn't come off as quickly as the Fed anticipates, it might lead to higher interest rates." Immediately after the GDP report, futures markets shifted their forecasts from a slight probability that the Fed will lower rates by July to a slight probability that it will raise rates.

Most measures of inflation, while still above the Fed's comfort range, have shown signs of cooling in recent months. According to the latest GDP report, consumer prices rose at an annualized rate of just 1.5% in the fourth quarter, while prices excluding food and energy -- the Fed's preferred inflation gauge -- rose at an annualized rate of 2.1%.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that its employment-cost index, a measure of compensation that includes salaries and benefits, increased a bit less than economists had expected. It rose 0.8% in the fourth quarter, and was up 3.3% from a year earlier.

Still, with the unemployment rate low and companies hiring, wage pressures haven't gone away. That's evident at Manda Machine Co., a Dallas-based maker of metal parts for aerospace, defense and power generation.

Andy Ellard, the company's president and co-owner, said his total compensation costs rose more than 5% in 2006. "Skilled machinists are very hard to find," he said. "You're going to be stealing them from a competitor, which means you're going to have to offer better compensation."

Higher labor costs can seep into the prices of everything from hamburgers to haircuts, unless businesses compensate by squeezing more output out of each worker -- something the most recent productivity data suggest they haven't been doing as much as in the past. "That's where the risks on inflation lie going forward," said Bruce Kasman, head of economic research at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. in New York.

Vigorous Consumer Spending Helped Economy Grow 3.5% At The End Of 2006 (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

The economy regained momentum at the end of 2006, pulling out of a midyear slowdown as gas prices fell and Americans reached into their wallets with renewed confidence.

The government said yesterday that its broadest and best-known measure of economic growth, the gross domestic product, advanced at an annual rate of 3.5 percent from October through December. That was noticeably stronger than the 2 percent rate of growth during the third quarter and the 2.6 percent measured in the second quarter.

Spending by consumers — on things like food and visits to the doctor — gave the economy the biggest lift. Spending by the federal government, particularly on the military, also added a significant increase. At the same time, goods and services exported to foreign countries increased, helping shrink the nation's trade deficit.

The swiftness of the expansion in the final months of the year surprised many economists, who were expecting a rate closer to 3 percent. Such strong growth was the latest indication that the economy was showing authentic vigor, despite forecasts of a deeper downturn.

The government also reported yesterday that inflation fell back yesterday on two fronts: in an index of prices that the Federal Reserve watches closely and a separate measure of labor costs.

That seemed to reaffirm the Fed's decision yesterday to hold interest rates steady, though the central bank warned, as it has for many months, that "some inflation risks remain."

The economy's resilience has not been lost on the White House, which has spent the last two days playing up the expansion. President Bush spoke in Manhattan yesterday, noting faster growth in wages and consumer confidence. "The state of our economy is strong," he told an audience at Federal Hall, the site where Congress and the Supreme Court first convened.

But underneath the robust growth numbers, some economists saw signs that the first few months of 2007 might not be as strong as the last few months of 2006. They noted a number of factors that were not likely to repeat, including the spending increase brought about by lower gas prices.

"The boost to consumption in the fourth quarter was all about the fall in oil prices," said Paul Ashworth, senior United States economist with Capital Economics. "That's very much a temporary boost that's now gone."

In addition, businesses cut back investment in equipment and software in the fourth quarter.

Still, the quarter turned out to be much healthier than economists were predicting just two months ago. Many experts thought the slump in the real estate market would have much wider effects on the overall economy. Housing did weigh on overall economic growth. The contraction in residential real estate investment, the sharpest since 1991, subtracted 1.2 percentage points from the overall G.D.P. growth figure in the fourth quarter.

Another significant drag was a slowdown at the nation's auto plants, which took another 1.2 percentage points off the G.D.P.

"Housing and autos, when they're down a lot you're supposed to look for a low number — and they were both down a lot," said Robert Barbera, chief economist with ITG.

But consumers helped offset those effects. The drag on spending that many economists said would come as Americans watched their home values falter has not happened. Instead, consumer spending increased at a 4.4 percent annual rate in the fourth quarter, much faster than in the second or third quarters.

For the full year, the gross domestic product grew 3.4 percent, an improvement on 2005, though not quite matching the 3.9 percent rate of 2004.

Some economists expect the effects of the housing slowdown to remain limited. In its statement yesterday, the Fed noted "some tentative signs of stabilization" in housing.

John Ryding, the chief United States economist at Bear Stearns, said that the residual effects from the housing bust "will disappear and vanish over the next couple of quarters," leading to faster growth. "As those factors dissipate, the underlying growth rate picks up," he said.

For The US Economy, A Surprise Growth Spurt At End Of 2006 (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

Rising exports and falling oil prices have kicked the US economy into a higher gear.

This news comes at an opportune time, since it helps to offset continuing weakness in the housing market and raises hopes that America's gaping trade deficit could fall this year.

The nation's output of goods and services grew at a 3.5 percent annual pace in the final quarter of 2006, higher than many economists had predicted.

Just as important, the report on US gross domestic product (GDP) raised no new concern about inflation. Consumer prices, as measured by the report's gauge of personal consumption expenditures, rose at an annual pace of 2.1 percent. That's slightly above the Federal Reserve's comfort zone, but it suggests that the Fed is succeeding in taming inflation pressures.

DOJ_NMG_0125411

"We seem to be having an almost perfect 'soft landing,' " says Rajeev Dhawan, director of the economic forecasting center at Georgia State University in Atlanta. "GDP growth is not too bad, and the inflation numbers have really moderated."

The current economic expansion, which began in 2001, hasn't been a barn-burner in terms of job growth. Like the early 1990s, it was at first dubbed a "jobless recovery." But the economy has marched forward, and the unemployment rate has fallen to just 4.5 percent.

As the expansion gained momentum, the Fed shifted from its stimulative stance on interest rates, raising the short-term rate gradually to its current 5.25 percent. That's designed to pilot the economy for a soft landing – maintaining growth while ensuring that inflation doesn't pick up – and it seems to be doing the trick.

"The Fed has the economy where it wants it," Nariman Behravesh, chief economist of Global Insight in Lexington, Mass., wrote in a report Wednesday.

The GDP news came as the Fed was finishing a two-day policy meeting. The central bank was expected to hold its interest rate steady when the meeting finished, after the Monitor's press time.

Wednesday's report means that GDP grew by 3.4 percent for the full 2006 calendar year, up from 3.2 percent in 2005. Economists generally expect somewhat slower growth this year.

The strong fourth-quarter output came from several factors:

• Exports rose 10 percent.

• Imports fell by 3 percent, which adds to GDP because foreign-made goods are subtracted when the government tallies America's output.

• Consumer spending rose 4.4 percent, a faster pace than in the third quarter.

The improvement in trade reflects a strong global economy. The worrisome US trade deficit – the amount by which imports exceed exports – will begin to shrink for the first time since 1995, predicts Diane Swonk, an economist at Mesirow Financial in Chicago. The record trade gap is one reason Democrats in Congress are pushing for more scrutiny of the impact of globalization on the economy – the subject of a House hearing this week.

President Bush, outlining his economic agenda in a speech on Wall Street Wednesday, touted a strong economy that is benefiting from open trade. "I know there's going to be a vigorous debate on trade, and bashing trade can make for good soundbites on the evening news, but walling off America from world trade would be a disaster for our economy," he said, urging Congress to renew his fast-track authority for negotiating trade agreements.

Business spending on new equipment fell a bit, in Wednesday's report. "If that does not pick up, then that would mean that the future growth of the economy goes away," says Mr. Dhawan. "Investment today means jobs tomorrow."

Consumers Lifted Economy In '06 (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

The economy bounced back at the end of last year, growing at a surprisingly strong 3.5 percent rate, after a steep drop in gasoline prices revived consumer purchasing power and spurred a Christmas spending spree.

A report from the Commerce Department yesterday showed that consumers defied expectations and powered a solid performance in the economy all year, shrugging off not only the summer's record-high energy prices but also a collapse in the housing market and sharply higher interest rates. Despite the obstacles, economic growth during the year ticked up to 3.4 percent from a 3.2 percent pace in 2005.

But incomes did not keep up with spending, despite solid growth in jobs during the year, forcing consumers to go deeply into debt and dip into their savings to maintain a robust spending pace. The result was that the savings rate for the year plummeted into negative territory at minus 1 percent -- something not seen since the Great Depression.

"There's nothing stronger than a fully employed American consumer," said Argus Research economist Richard Yamarone, noting the "blistering" 4.4 percent pace of fourth quarter spending startled many on Wall Street. "It's not the value of a home or the level of the stock market, but employment that drives consumer spending and the economy."

DOJ_NMG_0125412

Stocks rallied on the unexpectedly strong economic performance and low inflation seen in the Commerce Department report, which appeared to please the Federal Reserve and enabled the central bank to keep interest rates steady at a meeting of its rate-setting committee yesterday.

The record drop in oil prices during the quarter not only bolstered consumer spending but also caused a rare drop in the value of imports, further boosting growth.

"The economy has clearly caught its second wind," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, an economic advisory firm in Princeton Junction, N.J. "After six months of below-trend growth, the combination of higher real wages, low unemployment and the drop in energy prices ignited the economy's engines once again.

"What's really remarkable about the economy's performance last year is that it successfully dodged so many bullets," he said, attributing that to the flexibility of American consumers, workers and financial markets. "Most other economies in the world would have gone belly up" in the face of the same obstacles.

The Fed said in its statement that stronger growth and tightness in the labor market require it to maintain vigilance against a possible uptick in inflation. But yesterday's growth report put to rest months of rumors on Wall Street that the Fed's next move would be to cut rates amid mounting worries about weakness in the housing market -- weakness that had been expected to spread to consumer spending.

To the contrary, the report showed above-average growth despite a 19 percent drop in home construction in the fourth quarter -- the second such major decline in the once-booming housing market and the biggest losses in 15 years.

The Fed noted "tentative signs of stabilization" in housing, most likely referring to a report from the Mortgage Bankers Association yesterday that showed a small pickup in mortgage applications for home purchases from year-ago levels. Housing continues to benefit from relatively low long-term mortgage rates, which are not directly set by the Fed.

Roger M. Kubarych, economist at UniCredit Markets, said he does not expect a repeat of last quarter's stellar economic performance. Consumers benefited not only from falling oil prices but also from aggressive pre-Christmas price discounting on big-ticket items such as autos and electronics, whose prices fell at a record 8 percent rate, he said.

"That kind of price collapse is not going to be repeated," he said, "nor is the pace of consumption going to be sustained."

Richard Berner, economist at Morgan Stanley, also questioned whether the decline in inflation will last. He said that unusually warm weather may have prompted stronger than normal economic activity this winter and if weather was the stimulant, there will be a "payback" in the form of slower growth in the spring.

Mr. Yamarone said he expects growth to remain impressive in the first quarter because jobs remain plentiful and energy prices have stayed low due to the mild winter.

The danger is that inflation will remain a problem as well, he said, since stronger-than-expected growth in the United States will contribute to pressure on world commodity prices. In addition, the U.S. is likely to suffer from a homegrown problem -- soaring food prices brought on by a shortage of corn for making oil, sweeteners and other common food ingredients as farmers increasingly devote their corn crops to making ethanol.

"We've heard from several companies like Kellogg, General Mills, Tyson Foods, Procter & Gamble and Pepsi about price pass-alongs, and we expect many more to join in," Mr. Yamarone said. A 60 percent jump in corn tortilla prices already has produced a minor crisis in Mexico, which imports much of its corn from the U.S.

Economy Closed '06 With Powerful Rush (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The economy roared back from a midyear slump by growing at an annual rate of 3.5% in the final three months of 2006, the government reported today.

The growth, up from 2% in the three summer months and 2.6% in the spring, was accomplished without an inflationary spurt. Inflation fell from an annual rate of 2.2% in the third quarter of last year to 2.1% in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0125413

And in a separate report, the Labor Department said employment costs to businesses increased by 0.8% in the fourth quarter, down from 1% in the previous three months.

The Fed's policy-making Federal Open Market Committee, which had raised interest rates consistently from mid-2004 to mid-2006, left rates unchanged at 5.25% at its meeting that concluded just hours after publication of the new economic growth figures.

In a statement accompanying its decision, the Fed suggested that its next move on interest rates was some time away, but when it does move it seemed to lean in the direction of making an increase designed to slow economic growth and choke off inflation.

"Readings on core inflation [excluding food and energy] have improved modestly in recent months, and inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time," the committee said. "However, the high level of resource utilization has the potential to sustain inflation pressures.

"The committee judges that some inflation risks remain. The extent and timing of any additional firming that may be needed to address these risks will depend on the evolution of the outlook for both inflation and economic growth, as implied by incoming information."

President Bush lost little time broadcasting the economic growth news. In a speech to the Assn. for a Better New York, he said, "America's businesses and entrepreneurs are creating new jobs every day. Workers are making more money — their paychecks are going further. Consumers are confident, investors are optimistic. Just today, we learned that America's economy grew at an annual rate of 3.5% in the fourth quarter of 2006."

The 3.5% growth rate outpaced the predictions of most private economists.

Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist of High Frequency Economics, said the economy owed much of its surprising growth to foreign trade — the U.S. trade deficit, though still enormous, was less than expected.

The biggest drag on economic growth was the housing sector. Residential housing construction fell 30% from the third quarter to the fourth; that had the effect of shaving 1.2 percentage points off overall economic growth in the fourth quarter.

The personal savings rate remained negative, as it has been for the past two years. Americans spent 1% more than they earned in the fourth quarter of last year, the Commerce Department said, a slight improvement from the 1.2% excess of spending over earnings in the third quarter.

Fed Holds Interest Rates At 5.25 Percent (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, February 1, 2007

Pointing to a revved-up economy and encouraging news on inflation, the Federal Reserve held interest rates steady on Wednesday and extended a half-year breather for U.S. borrowers. Wall Street surged in response.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his central bank colleagues left an important interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, the fifth straight meeting without budging the rate. The decision was unanimous.

On Wall Street, stocks rose sharply. The Dow Jones industrials gained 98.38 points to close at 12,621.69 in preliminary data.

That means commercial banks' prime interest rate — for certain credit cards, home equity lines of credit and other loans — stays at 8.25 percent, once again giving a break to borrowers who until last summer had endured the pain of two-plus years of rate increases.

Fed policymakers delivered a more positive assessment of the economy than in December, recognizing improvements in economic growth, inflation and even the troubled housing sector.

"Overall, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace over coming quarters," they said.

The Fed also observed that core inflation, which excludes energy and food prices, has "improved modestly in recent months." That was an upgrade from December when policymakers fretted about "elevated" readings on underlying inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0125414

They continued to note that inflation risks remain, keeping open the possibility of a rate increase. Still, with the Fed's fairly upbeat assessment, many economists believe rates are likely to remain where they are for much of this year.

"I think they are taking a slightly softer stance on inflation. They are not as concerned about inflation as they were last year," said Victor Li, associate professor of economics at Villanova School of Business. "I think right now they are taking a wait-and-see approach."

The Fed's announcement came hours after the government reported that the economy snapped out of a sluggish spell and grew at a 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year as consumers ratcheted up spending.

The report also showed that underlying inflation ebbed during the quarter.

The fresh snapshot of business activity, released by the Commerce Department, underscored the resilience of the economy. It has managed to keep moving despite the ill effects of the residential real-estate bust and an ailing automotive sector.

President Bush pointed to the economic figures as evidence that his policies are working. The president, in a New York speech, also sought to calm fears about an economy that is constantly changing.

"By and large, our dynamic and innovative economy has helped Americans live better and more comfortable lives," Bush said. "Yet the same dynamism that is driving economic growth ... also can be unsettling for people. For many Americans, change means having to find a new job, or to deal with a new boss after a merger or to go back to school to learn new skills for a new career."

An AP-Ipsos poll in early January found that 55 percent of people disapproved of the president's handling of the economy, while 43 percent approved.

Democrats, in control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, argue that the White House hasn't paid attention to widening economic inequality that they say is making it harder for the middle class to succeed. "Middle class families are not struggling to get by, but they are struggling to get ahead," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

The economy opened 2006 on a strong note, growing at a 5.6 percent pace, the fastest spurt in 2 1/2 years. But it lost steam during the spring and late summer. It grew at a 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter and then a weaker 2 percent pace in the third quarter. The fourth quarter's rebound ended the year on a positive note.

"The economy has clearly caught its second wind," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group.

For all of 2006, the economy increased by 3.4 percent. That was an improvement from a 3.2 percent showing in 2005.

That's even more impressive considering the economy was hit by the housing slump. Investment in home building for all of last year was slashed by 4.2 percent, the most in 15 years.

An inflation gauge tied to the report showed that core prices — excluding food and energy — rose at a rate of 2.1 percent in the final quarter of last year, down from a 2.2 percent pace in the third quarter.

To fend off inflation, the Fed had steadily boosted interest rates for two years, the longest stretch in its history.

But since last summer, it has left rates alone. Economists believe the Fed is on course to achieve its goal of slowing the economy sufficiently to thwart inflation but not so much as seriously hurt economic activity.

"The Fed almost seemed to be on the verge of declaring victory," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors.

Encouraged Fed Leaves Interest Rates Alone (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve left interest rates unchanged Wednesday and suggested it was more apt to raise rates in the near-term than cut them.

Fed policymakers also delivered a more upbeat economic assessment than in recent months in a statement reflective of recent data. The government said Wednesday the economy grew in the fourth quarter at the fastest pace since early 2006 while inflation eased.

DOJ_NMG_0125415

In an unanimous vote, Fed officials left their target for short-term interest rates, which influence the cost of borrowing for everything from mortgages to credit cards, at 5.25%, the highest in six years. The Fed has left interest rates alone for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006.

FED SPEAK: Read the statement

Recent data "have suggested somewhat firmer economic growth, and some tentative signs of stabilization have appeared in the housing market," Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues said.

While the Fed officials repeated previous statements that they expect the economy will expand at a "moderate pace" in the near-term, their wording was far more upbeat than in December, when policymakers pointed to "substantial cooling" in housing.

Fed officials also said price pressures have "improved modestly." Last month, they said inflation had been "elevated." Although Fed officials continued to stress they were more concerned about inflation than about a slowdown in the economy, some economists said the shift in the Fed's wording suggested the central bank would be leaving rates alone for some time.

"They may not be thinking about lowering rates, but this statement tells me they are not thinking hard about raising rates, either," PNC Financial Services chief economist Stuart Hoffman says.

Earlier Wednesday, the government said the economy grew 3.5% at a seasonally adjusted, annualized rate in the fourth quarter vs. 2% in the third quarter. The gain was the biggest since the first quarter and was led by strong growth in consumer spending.

For all of 2006, the economy grew 3.4%, up from 3.2% in 2005, the Commerce Department said.

In the same report, Commerce said the Fed's favorite inflation gauge fell at the end of 2006. Excluding food and energy, inflation slowed to a 2.1% annual rate in the fourth quarter from 2.2% in the third quarter.

With inflation fears ebbing, most economists believe the Fed is done raising interest rates for this cycle and many expect U.S. central bankers will cut rates sometime in 2007, according to a USA TODAY survey of 56 economists conducted Jan. 18-24. But expectations vary widely: Forecasts for the Fed's target interest rate at the end of the year ranged from 2.5% to 6.5%.

The variety of answers shows the uncertainty surrounding the economy. There are many unknowns, most important surrounding housing, National City chief economist Richard DeKaser says. Although recent housing data have been positive, it's unclear if the downturn is over or is pausing before sliding further.

"I could easily imagine the housing market turning out both better or worse than expected," he says.

Fed Sees Progress On Inflation (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan In Washington And Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

The Federal Reserve on Wednesday signalled growing confidence that the economy was heading for a soft landing, triggering a broad rally in the stock market.

The statement issued at the end of the Fed's January policy meeting – which kept interest rates on hold at 5.25 per cent – for the first time raised the possibility that the US housing market could be bottoming out.

At the same time, it cited progress on inflation, noting "readings on core inflation have improved modestly in recent months".

These comments suggest that the Fed is growing comfortable with the outlook for both growth and inflation.

The Fed's encouraging words came after figures showed the US economy grew at an above-trend rate of 3.5 per cent in the fourth quarter, while inflation and wage growth moderated. Consumer spending grew at a blistering rate, while growth was also supported by a surge in US exports.

Stocks and bonds rose in response to the Fed's outlook. The Dow Jones Industrial Average set a record high in afternoon trading, before closing up 0.8 per cent at 12,621.69. Bond prices rallied, with 10-year yields ending the day nearly 5 basis points lower at 4.83 per cent. The dollar slipped against the euro and the yen, while interest rate futures were broadly unchanged.

The Fed acknowledged the strong economic data in its statement, noting that growth looked "somewhat firmer" than it did at the time of the last meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee in October.

However, the Fed hinted that its views on growth had not changed very dramatically since the October meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0125416

It cited only "tentative" signs that housing might be stabilising and altered only slightly its description of how growth was likely to evolve this year.

The Fed said it expected the economy to expand at a "moderate pace over coming quarters" – the same phrase it used in October. This implies that policymakers think the pace of growth will slow from the fourth quarter to the first as the effect of lower oil prices, higher stock prices and mild weather in late 2006 fades.

Wednesday's figures showed gross domestic product rose 3.5 per cent in the last three months of 2006 after a gain of 2 per cent in the previous quarter, while the rate of increase in core prices slowed to 2.1 per cent from 2.2 per cent.

The expansion was led by a 4.4 per cent increase in personal consumption, which showed that Americans continued to spend, in spite of the slowdown in housing.

Exports were also exceptionally strong, rising 10 per cent, compared with an increase of 6.8 per cent in the third period.

Drew Mathus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The strong growth shows us that 2006 ended with a bang. It also tells us that the first quarter is not likely to be exceptionally weak."

Fed, Leaving Rate At 5.25%, Is Optimistic On Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — The Federal Reserve left interest rates unchanged on Wednesday, as it has since June, but it was more optimistic than in the past that inflationary pressures were ebbing.

The central bank left the federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks at 5.25 percent, as investors had expected. It also repeated its caution that "some inflation risks remain," a sign that it is likely to keep the benchmark rate at current levels for the foreseeable future.

But in its statement announcing the decision, the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee expressed growing confidence that inflation was running lower — even as growth was slightly stronger than officials had expected just a few months ago.

"Readings on core inflation have improved modestly, and inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time," the Fed's statement said. At the same time, it acknowledged signs of "somewhat firmer economic growth" and "tentative signs of stabilization" in the housing market.

That cheered stock and bond markets, elevating hopes that healthy economic growth would not prompt a resumption of rate increases. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 98.38 points yesterday, or 0.79 percent, to close at 12,621.69. Yields on Treasury debt declined, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note settling at 4.81 percent, down from 4.87 percent Tuesday, indicating that the market expected long-term interest rates to move slightly lower.

The Federal Reserve's announcement came hours after the Commerce Department reported that the economy grew at a surprisingly brisk annual pace of 3.5 percent in the fourth quarter of 2006.

Many investors have all but written off expectations that the Fed might actually cut interest rates soon, which it would do to offset an economic slump or rising unemployment, neither of which is occurring.

The Fed statement suggested that policy makers were increasingly confident about achieving an elusive "soft landing" — a mild slowdown in growth that would reduce inflation pressures but not set off a recession.

"What I don't think people were counting on was the Fed, in effect, upgrading their views on the outlook for inflation," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial in Pittsburgh. "The way they phrased it, they're really inching toward a balanced risk assessment of inflation versus slower growth."

While Mr. Hoffman still says that a Fed rate cut this summer is possible, most analysts no longer see any need for the central bank to ease rates.

"If there were need for stimulus, the consumer is clearly not asking for it," said Richard Yamarone at Argus Research in New York. "You have more than a handful of reasons to raise rates, but what are the reasons for a cut? There are none."

The Fed repeated verbatim the previous stance of remaining slightly more worried about rising inflation than about slowing growth.

Several governors, as well as the chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have said that their “comfort zone” for inflation is an annual rate of 1 to 2 percent, excluding food and energy.

By that measure of core inflation, consumer prices have risen 2.4 percent in the last year. But prices have climbed more slowly in recent months, partly because of pass-through effects from the drop in gasoline prices late last year.

And while the Commerce Department’s new estimate of economic growth last quarter provided additional evidence that the economy was expanding faster than many analysts had expected, it also showed that inflationary pressures remained surprisingly low.

Fed Holds Interest Rates Steady (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Federal Reserve policymakers held short-term interest rates steady today, but indicated they remain ready to raise borrowing costs if strong economic growth fuels inflation pressures.

The central bank's top policymaking committee voted unanimously to leave its benchmark federal funds rate unchanged at 5.25 percent, where it has been since June.

The Fed announced its decision a few hours after the Commerce Department reported that the economy expanded by a strong 3.4 percent last year, despite sharp declines in home building and auto production.

Fed policymakers, in a statement issued after their meeting, noted recent signs of "somewhat firmer economic growth, and some tentative signs of stabilization . . . in the housing market."

They repeated that they expect the economy to expand "at a moderate pace" in coming months.

The Fed raised the federal funds rate, the overnight rate charged on loans between banks, steadily through the first half of last year to keep the lid on inflation. The combination of rising interest rates, climbing fuel prices and the slumping housing market caused economic growth to slow at mid-year.

Inflation surged in the spring and summer as oil prices soared to above $77 a barrel in July. But oil prices tumbled through the end of the year, causing price pressures to ease as well.

Consumer prices rose 2.8 percent last year, a slightly smaller increase than the 2.9 percent gain recorded the year before, the Commerce Department said today.

Many economists seek a sense of underlying inflation by looking at so-called core inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices. Core prices rose 2.1 percent in 2006, after rising 2.2 percent in 2005.

The core inflation rate last year exceeded the Fed policymakers' unofficial comfort zone of 1 to 2 percent, but the decline was what they had hoped to engineer.

"Readings on core inflation have improved modestly in recent months, and inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time," the policymakers said in their statement. However, they added that the tightness in the labor market "has the potential to sustain inflation pressures."

Many analysts predict the rate will remain steady for the rest of this year.

As Fed Holds Steady, Bernanke Gains Praise (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

As he finishes his first year as Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke has dispelled early doubts about his ability to steer the world's largest economy. But his biggest challenge -- bringing the economy in for a soft landing -- lies ahead.

Dow Jones Online's Ed Crane interviews WSJ reporter Greg Ip about the Federal Reserve's decision to leave rates unchanged.Hours after the government reported the economy grew at a healthy 3.5% annual rate in the fourth quarter, the Fed yesterday left the target for short-term interest rates at 5.25% for the fifth consecutive meeting. In a post-meeting statement more upbeat about both growth and inflation than December's statement, the central bank said its predominant concern is inflation.

Stock and bond markets rallied. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 98.38 points, to end the day at 12621.69. (See markets roundup.)

DOJ_NMG_0125418

"Recent indicators have suggested somewhat firmer economic growth" -- in contrast to December's "mixed" showing, the Fed said. It added that it sees "some tentative signs of stabilization...in the housing market," a distinctly more optimistic view than the previous month's reference to "substantial cooling." Reaffirming its longstanding forecast, it said economic growth is likely to "moderate." (Read the full text of the Fed's statement.)

A decision on whether to raise rates again, the bank said, depends on "incoming data."

The Commerce Department yesterday reported the Fed's preferred inflation gauge -- prices for personal consumption, excluding food and energy -- was up 2.1% at an annual rate in the fourth quarter, only a bit above the 2% level with which many Fed officials are comfortable. "Inflation pressures seem likely to moderate," the Fed statement said, while warning that the nation's low unemployment rate "has the potential to sustain inflation pressures."

One year ago today, Mr. Bernanke took over from Alan Greenspan, who rose to almost superstar status during his 18 years as Fed chief. So far, Mr. Bernanke is getting high marks for his leadership; yesterday's snapshot of fourth-quarter growth added to his luster. "He's had good luck and good skill," said Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities. "Given that a bursting housing bubble that predated Ben is in the works, he's been engineering things relatively well. They've been consistent and right in their forecast."

The fourth quarter's 3.5% growth, much better than 2% in the third and 2.6% in the second, came as consumer purchasing offset a sharp drop in housing. Consumer spending rose at an annualized rate of 4.4.%, contributing 3.1 percentage points to fourth-quarter growth. Residential investment, meanwhile, plummeted an annualized 19.2% as home builders cut back on construction, shaving 1.2 percentage point from fourth-quarter growth.

Fourth-quarter growth might have been even stronger than official figures suggest. An anomalous drop in recorded light-truck prices boosted the government estimate of inflation-adjusted third-quarter auto output. Some of it unwound in the fourth quarter, contributing to an auto-output drop that shaved the growth rate by 1.2 percentage point.

For all of 2006, the economy grew at a rate of 3.4%, up from 3.2% in 2005 and well above its 20-year average of 3.1%.

But Mr. Bernanke's reputation depends less on what has happened than on what will happen in the next couple of years: whether growth slows below 3% in the first half of this year and unemployment moves up a bit, as the Fed expects, helping to bring inflation down to 2% or lower -- in short, the definition of a "soft landing." With unemployment yet to rise, there is a risk inflation could pick up, prompting the Fed to raise rates sharply, increasing the chance of recession.

In his first months on the job, Mr. Bernanke encountered doubts about his inflation-fighting credentials and his attempts to communicate with the markets, avoiding Mr. Greenspan's carefully chosen adjectives and instead specifying a forecast that would guide his interest-rate decisions.

In April, Mr. Bernanke indicated in congressional testimony that he would consider halting increases for a while to monitor the impact of previous rate increases, even as inflation was edging higher. That, and an unscripted comment a few days later that he had been misinterpreted, eroded investor confidence. One measure of the damage: The inflation forecast implicit in the trading of inflation-indexed bonds rose to 2.76% in early May from 2.57%, where it was on Mr. Bernanke's first day on the job. Alarmed by his perceived loss of credibility, Mr. Bernanke pushed the federal-funds rate to 5.25% in June -- then paused in August.

Even then, the decision to pause was contentious. Inflation was running higher than Fed officials were comfortable with. But Mr. Bernanke felt that if inflation didn't recede as he expected, he could resume raising rates later. If he kept raising rates, he reasoned, he risked transforming a nascent downturn in the housing market into a full-fledged collapse that could drag the entire economy into recession.

Five months later, the decision looks wise: The economy has cooled a bit, though not as much as Mr. Bernanke expected. Housing has contracted, but not collapsed. Inflation has edged down, though it is still too high for the Fed's comfort. The inflation forecast reflected in inflation-indexed bond prices is down to 2.46%.

Bruce Kasman, head of U.S. economic research at J.P. Morgan Chase, has argued that the Fed should raise rates further to quell inflation. Yet even he says Mr. Bernanke made the right decision in pausing in August, given the competing risks. "The most important thing for the Fed is to make sure the extremes on both growth and inflation aren't manifested," he says. But less benign outcomes will put Mr. Bernanke's decisions in a less flattering light, he says. "If we're sitting here with 3% to 3.5% inflation in a year's time, that will have been a bad policy."

Other analysts argue the housing market's recent stability is a temporary respite because of warm weather and lower mortgage rates. Housing will worsen soon, they say, and the spillover could yet hit consumer spending and raise the risk of recession. Such a result would be seen as evidence that Mr. Bernanke raised rates too far.

Some of Mr. Bernanke's accomplishments are less visible. He has made Fed discussions more freewheeling and collegial, colleagues say. But he has fallen short of his goal of innovating Fed communications. He has wanted to set a public, numeric inflation target, make more-frequent and more-detailed forecasts and issue more descriptive, less formulaic post-meeting statements. But sensitive to colleagues less enthusiastic about such changes, he has subjected debate to an internal review. That review is expected to wrap up this fall.

Dow Ends Up 98 On Fed Economic Comments (AP)

By Tim Paradis

AP, February 1, 2007

Stocks shot higher Wednesday after the Federal Reserve answered two of Wall Street's major concerns, indicating that the economy remains healthy and that inflation pressures are easing. The Dow Jones industrials climbed nearly 100 points to set another trading high, while the Russell 2000 index had its first close above 800.

The Fed, which issued its economic assessment as it decided to leave short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25 percent, said recent indicators "suggested somewhat firmer economic growth" and tentative signs of stabilization in the housing market. Investors also appeared pleased by the central bank's comments that readings on core inflation had "improved modestly" in recent months.

Wall Street had expected the Fed's Open Market Committee would leave short-term interest rates unchanged for the fifth straight meeting after a string of 17 straight increases that began in 2004. But investors had been uneasy about the central bank's economic assessment statement and whether it would indicate that policy makers were considering raising interest rates in the near future because the economy and/or inflation has been growing too fast.

"They coupled a firmer economic growth scenario with the expectation of moderate growth and they expect the inflation outlook to be improving," John Miller, head of fund management at Nuveen Investments, said of the Fed. "I don't think it makes it any more likely that they would feel compelled to raise rates."

The Dow rose 98.38, or 0.79 percent, to 12,621.69. The Dow came with a few decimal points of a week-old closing high and set a new trading high of 12,657.02. The previous trading high set Jan. 24 was 12,623.45; the Dow's record close remains 12,621.77.

Broader stock indicators also spurted higher. The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 9.42, or 0.66 percent, to 1,438.24 and the Nasdaq composite index gained 15.29, or 0.62 percent, to finish at 2,463.93.

The Fed's comments pushed the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies above the 800 mark to a record close; it finished up 2.37, or 0.30 percent, at 800.34. Its previous high was Tuesday.

For the first month of the year, the Dow rose 1.27 percent, while the S&P gained 1.41 percent and the tech-dominated Nasdaq added 2.01 percent. Some on Wall Street are fond of noting that as the S&P 500 goes in January, so goes the year. The so-called January barometer has had only five major errors since 1950, for an accuracy rate of 91.1 percent, according to the Stock Trader's Almanac.

Bond prices rose sharply following the Fed's statement, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.82 percent from 4.88 percent late Tuesday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices rose.

Light, sweet crude settled up $1.17 at $58.14 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"We knew the economy was producing better numbers over the past couple of months but they also acknowledged the improved outlook on inflation," Miller said. "I think the description does characterize a soft landing scenario, which appears to be unfolding."

DOJ_NMG_0125420

Stocks, which had been mixed on lighter-than-normal trading ahead of the rate decision, had found some support earlier Wednesday as the economy gave off fresh signs it could sidestep a sharp slowdown. The Commerce Department found the economy, as measured by gross domestic product, grew at 3.5 percent annual rate in the fourth quarter as consumers increased spending despite a pullback in the housing market. Wall Street expected an increase of 3 percent.

"The GDP number was very good for both the stock and the bond markets because it showed better growth and less inflation," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist for PNC Financial Services Group in Pittsburgh.

The Commerce Department also said spending on construction projects fell 0.4 percent in December after rising 0.1 percent in November.

In other economic news, the cost of hiring and retaining workers moderated in the fourth quarter, possibly easing some concern about wage inflation. Wages and benefits rose 0.8 percent in the fourth quarter, down from a 1 percent increase in the third quarter, the Labor Department reported.

A weaker report came from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago index of business conditions in the Midwest; it fell to 48.8 in January from 51.6 in December. A reading below 50 generally signals a pullback in the region's manufacturing, and this was the first time the reading had fallen below 50 since April 2003. The Chicago number is often viewed as an indicator of how the nation's overall manufacturing sector might be holding up. That report is due Thursday.

Hoffman said the Wednesday's data illustrated a dichotomy for the economy. "Manufacturing activity is still pretty weak, particularly for autos, whereas the service economy is still quite strong."

In corporate news, Boeing Co. rose $3.56, or 4.1 percent, to $89.56, giving a boost to the Dow industrials. The aerospace company's fourth-quarter profit more than doubled amid broad strength in its commercial airplane and defense system businesses. Revenue climbed 26 percent to $17.5 billion, coming in well ahead of the $16.5 billion in revenue Wall Street forecast.

SanDisk Corp., which makes flash memory products, fell $2.65 , or 6.2 percent, to $40.18 after it posted a fourth-quarter loss amid big charges related to its acquisition of Israeli flash memory maker M-Systems.

Time Warner Inc. slipped 17 cents to $21.87. The company's fourth-quarter profit jumped 34 percent, aided by the sale of Internet access businesses in Europe and an agreement that brought new subscribers to its cable TV unit.

Homebuilders rose following the Fed's comments on the housing market. Toll Brothers Inc. rose $1.40, or 4.3 percent, to $33.83, while KB Home jumped $2.55, or 4.9 percent to $54.22.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by about 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to 2.96 billion shares compared with 2.69 billion Tuesday.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed down 0.61 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 0.62 percent, Germany's DAX index finished up 0.01 percent, and France's CAC-40 was down 0.66 percent.

Stocks Go Higher With Fed's Outlook (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- Stocks shot higher yesterday after the Federal Reserve answered two of Wall Street's major concerns, indicating that the economy remains healthy and that inflation pressures are easing. The Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed nearly 100 points to set another trading high, while the Russell 2000 Index had its first close above 800.

The Dow rose 98.38, or 0.79 percent, to 12,621.69. The Dow came with a few decimal points of a week-old closing high and set a new trading high of 12,657.02.

The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 9.42, or 0.66 percent, to 1,438.24 and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 15.29, or 0.62 percent, to finish at 2,463.93.

DOJ_NMG_0125421

The Russell 2000 Index of smaller companies above the 800 mark to a record close; it finished up 2.37, or 0.30 percent, at 800.34.

For the first month of the year, the Dow rose 1.27 percent, while the S&P gained 1.41 percent and the tech-dominated Nasdaq added 2.01 percent. Some on Wall Street are fond of noting that as the S&P 500 goes in January, so goes the year. The so-called January barometer has had only five major errors since 1950, for an accuracy rate of 91.1 percent, according to the Stock Trader's Almanac.

Bond prices rose sharply after the Fed's statement, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.82 percent from 4.88 percent late Tuesday.

Light, sweet crude settled up $1.17 at $58.14 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"We knew the economy was producing better numbers over the past couple of months but they also acknowledged the improved outlook on inflation," Mr. Miller said. "I think the description does characterize a soft-landing scenario, which appears to be unfolding."

The Commerce Department also said spending on construction projects fell 0.4 percent in December after rising 0.01 percent in November.

In other economic news, the cost of hiring and retaining workers moderated in the fourth quarter, possibly easing some concern about wage inflation. Wages and benefits rose 0.8 percent in the fourth quarter, down from a 1 percent increase in the third quarter, the Labor Department reported.

A weaker report came from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago index of business conditions in the Midwest; it fell to 48.8 in January from 51.6 in December. A reading below 50 generally signals a pullback in the region's manufacturing, and this was the first time the reading had fallen below 50 since April 2003. The Chicago number is often viewed as an indicator of how the nation's overall manufacturing sector might be holding up.

Boeing rose $3.56, or 4.1 percent, to $89.56, giving a boost to the Dow. The aerospace giant's fourth-quarter profit more than doubled amid broad strength in its commercial airplane and defense system businesses. Revenue climbed 26 percent to $17.5 billion, ahead of estimates.

SanDisk Corp., which makes flash memory products, fell $2.65 , or 6.2 percent, to $40.18 after it posted a fourth-quarter loss amid big charges related to its acquisition of Israeli flash memory maker M-Systems.

Home builders rose after the Fed's comments on the housing market. Toll Brothers Inc. rose $1.40, or 4.3 percent, to $33.83, while KB Home jumped $2.55, or 4.9 percent to $54.22.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by about 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed down 0.61 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 0.62 percent, Germany's DAX finished up 0.01 percent and France's CAC-40 was down 0.66 percent.

Stocks Rally After Fed Keeps Rates Steady (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks ended January with a rally Wednesday, completing the longest stretch of monthly gains in more than a decade, after the Federal Reserve fortified perceptions that economic growth is accelerating without generating faster inflation (stories, 4B).

Shares of Boeing, DuPont and Caterpillar drove the Dow Jones industrial average to within less than a point of a record close. All 10 major industry groups in the Standard & Poor's 500 index advanced, led by retailers Home Depot and Target.

The Dow rose 98.38 points, or 0.8%, to 12,621.69. The S&P added 9.42 points, or 0.7%, to 1438.24. The Nasdaq composite index increased 15.29 points, or 0.6%, to 2463.93.

Fed policymakers left their benchmark lending rate at 5.25% and said the economy is picking up while the pace of price increases has slowed. The statement followed a government report showing gross domestic product rose more than economists forecast and reassured investors who are concerned about higher borrowing costs.

DOJ_NMG_0125422

"The Fed may do nothing here for some time and the market can tolerate that," says Ernie Ankrim, chief investment strategist at Russell Investment Group. "As long as the Fed continues to send signals that their bias is not toward an increase and the next move is perceived to be down, the market will treat that very well."

The market is already doing pretty well. The Dow gained for a seventh-consecutive month, the longest winning streak since 1995, and the S&P 500 rose an eighth month in a row, the best stretch since 1996.

Making the first presidential visit to the New York Stock Exchange during trading hours in more than two decades, President Bush expressed his own bullishness. Traders cheered as Bush walked the floor shaking hands and signing autographs. The stock market's four-year rally can continue "as long as we do the right things in Washington and keep taxes low," Bush said.

Highlights:

Boeing climbed $3.56 to $89.56 after the aerospace company reported fourth-quarter earnings above expectations. Elsewhere in the Dow average, DuPont, the No. 3 U.S. chemical producer, gained $1.18 to $49.56. Meanwhile, Caterpillar, the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, rose $1.19 to $64.07.

•Home Depot rose 57 cents to $40.74, and Target added 92 cents to $61.36.

Dow Nears Record As Fed Leaves Rates On Hold (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average came within a hair's breadth of a record, boosted by soothing words from the Federal Reserve and a report showing surprisingly strong economic growth.

After a two-day meeting, the Fed's policy committee issued a statement hailing steady economic expansion but cautioning about lingering inflation, sounding exactly the note that Wall Street wanted to hear. As widely expected, it left its interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25%.

"Today represented, in a microcosm, what we'd hoped to see for the whole year," said Mark Jordahl, chief investment officer at the asset-management firm FAF Advisors.

He added that the while the Fed's statement wasn't particularly surprising, it allowed for something of a "relief rally." Investors were glad that the central bank didn't sound a more aggressive note about fighting inflation, he said, which would mean higher borrowing costs throughout the economy.

The blue-chip Dow jumped 98.38 points, or 0.8%, to 12621.69, up 1.3% on the year and less than a tenth of a point away from a record. Among the average's 30 components, Boeing led the way, up 4.1% after the aircraft maker reported fourth-quarter profit more than doubled, handily beating analysts' expectations.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.7%, or 9.42 points, to 1438.24, up 1.4% on the year. The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rallied 0.6%, or 15.29 points, to 2463.93, up 2% on the year.

At the start of the day the Commerce Department released data showing that gross domestic product, a broad measure of U.S. economic output, rose 3.5% in the fourth quarter, better than the 3% reading expected by economists in a Dow Jones Newswires survey.

For all of 2006, GDP grew by 3.4%, faster than the 3.2% expansion in 2005.

That set the stage for the afternoon's Fed announcement. The U.S. central bank has held its rate target steady since June, and many on Wall Street remain antsy about whether the Fed can orchestrate a gradual slowdown in economic growth that still allows for solid corporate profits and consumer spending.

To do that, the Fed would have to avoid excessive rate increases that could choke off growth and perhaps even prompt a recession. At the same time, the bank can't have rates so low that runaway growth results, bringing with it inflation.

Wall Street's confidence that the Fed can pull off a so-called soft landing for the economy was bolstered by minor changes in yesterday's statement from the one issued after December's meeting. The December statement included qualifiers that some investors interpreted as doubt: "Although recent indicators have been mixed, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace on balance over coming quarters."

Yesterday's statement removed the qualifier, saying instead: "Overall, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace over coming quarters."

The stock rally came in spite of a jump in crude-oil prices to a four-week high. Colder weather in the U.S. Northeast and falling fuel inventories pushed crude contracts for March delivery up $1.17, or 2.1%, to $58.14 a barrel, off 4.8% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, dropped 0.1%, or 0.20 point, to 244.33.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.95 billion shares, as 2,243 stocks advanced and 1,079 fell.

Bond prices rose2. The 10-year note gained 13/32 point, or $4.06 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.824%. The 30-year bond rose 28/32 to yield 4.924%.

The dollar weakened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 120.67 yen, compared with 121.61 yen. The euro rose to $1.3034, compared with $1.2966.

Shares Rally As Fed Eases Fears On Growth And Inflation (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Stocks shot higher yesterday after the Federal Reserve answered two of Wall Street's major concerns, indicating that the economy remained healthy and that inflation pressures were easing.

The Dow Jones industrials climbed nearly 100 points and set another intraday trading high, while the Russell 2000 index had its first close above 800.

Wall Street had expected the Fed's Open Market Committee to leave short-term interest rates unchanged at 5.25 percent, as it did, but had been uneasy about whether it would indicate that policy makers were considering raising interest rates soon because the economy or inflation were growing too fast. The Fed's statement said that recent indicators suggested "somewhat firmer growth" and that inflation readings had "improved modestly" in recent months.

The Dow rose 98.38, to 12,621.69. It came within a few decimal points of a week-old closing high and set a new intraday high of 12,657.02.

Broader stock indicators also rose. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 9.42, to 1,438.24, and the Nasdaq composite index gained 15.29, to finish at 2,463.93.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies finished up 2.37, at 800.34.

For the first month of the year, the Dow rose 1.27 percent, while the S.& P. gained 1.41 percent and the tech-dominated Nasdaq added 2.01 percent. Some on Wall Street are fond of noting that as the S.& P. 500 goes in January, so goes the year. The so-called January barometer has had only five major errors since 1950, for an accuracy rate of 91.1 percent, according to The Stock Trader's Almanac.

Light crude settled up $1.17, at $58.14 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Stocks had been mixed on lighter-than-normal trading ahead of the rate decision, but found some support earlier yesterday when the Commerce Department reported that gross domestic product grew at a 3.5 percent annual rate in the fourth quarter as consumers increased spending.

A weaker report came from the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago index of business conditions in the Midwest; it fell to 48.8 in January, from 51.6 in December. A reading below 50 generally signals a pullback in the region's manufacturing, and this was the first time the reading had fallen below 50 since April 2003.

In corporate news, Boeing rose $3.56, to $89.56, giving a boost to the Dow industrials. The company's fourth-quarter profit more than doubled amid broad strength in its commercial airplane and military system businesses. Revenue climbed 26 percent, to $17.5 billion, coming in well ahead of the $16.5 billion Wall Street forecast.

SanDisk, which makes flash memory products, fell $2.65, to $40.18, after it posted a fourth-quarter loss amid big charges related to its acquisition of the Israeli flash memory maker M-Systems.

Time Warner slipped 17 cents, to $21.87. The company's fourth-quarter profit jumped 34 percent, aided by the sale of Internet access businesses in Europe and an agreement that brought new subscribers to its cable TV unit.

Home builders rose after the Fed commented that there appeared to be evidence of stabilization in the housing market. Toll Brothers rose $1.40, to $33.83, while KB Home jumped $2.55, to $54.22.

Bond prices rose sharply after the Fed's statement. The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was up 15/32, to 9818/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to 4.81 percent, from 4.87 percent.

'January Barometer' Bodes Well For 2007 (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK — If January lives up to its reputation as a good predictor of future stock market performance, then 2007 is likely to be another profitable year for stock investors.

Stocks rallied sharply on January's final day of trading Wednesday, bolstered by a statement released by the Federal Reserve that alleviated inflation fears and noted the economy was in solid shape.

The benchmark Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 9.42 points to 1438.24, finishing the month up 1.4%.

That positive return bodes well for stocks going forward. The so-called January Barometer, created by Yale Hirsch of the Stock Trader's Almanac, suggests that "as January goes, so goes the market" for the rest of the year. The Almanac says the barometer has registered only five major errors since 1950 and has a 91% accuracy rate.

More important, an analysis by Banc of America Securities shows that a positive return in January increases the odds that the S&P 500 will post gains in the final 11 months of the year. Since 1926, when the S&P 500 was up in January stocks have delivered gains in the February-through-December period 80% of the time.

"Now that the S&P 500 has posted a gain for the first month of 2007 … it may help fuel a trading rally for a few days," noted Tom McManus, strategist at Banc of America Securities.

The Fed's statement was viewed positively by traders because it jibed with Wall Street's preference for a not-too-hot, not-too-cold economy, often referred to as a "Goldilocks economy."

It also helped assuage fears that the central bank would need to start raising short-term interest rates again to cool the economy. In general, higher rates are bad for stocks because they result in higher borrowing costs for consumers and businesses, resulting in a drag on consumer spending and corporate earnings.

"The Fed calmed some fears," says Todd Leone, head of trading at Cowen & Co. "People were concerned that the Fed would have to raise rates again. But now it looks like going forward the Fed will stand pat. And that is a positive."

Investors who favor blue-chip stocks apparently liked what the Fed had to say. The Dow Jones industrial average rallied more than 98 points to 12,621.69. If it had closed just another 0.09 points higher, the Dow would have topped its all-time closing high a week earlier and notched its 27th record since the end of September.

The January Barometer has earned a strong following throughout the years due to its accuracy.

"Stock market historians love the statistics and seasonal patterns of historical returns because they believe the calendar cycles tend to repeat themselves in a predictable way based on factors such as politics, investor psychology, money flows and taxes," McManus wrote in a report to clients Wednesday.

But history aside, not everybody on Wall Street is convinced the market's performance in January has any bearing on what happens the rest of the year.

"It has little predictive power," writes Ken Fisher in his new book, The Only Three Questions That Count: Investing by Knowing What Others Don't.

What Could Bog Down The Bull (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125425

Stocks surged yesterday afternoon, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to within a hair of a new high, after the Federal Reserve pointed to strength in the economy and a moderation in inflation.

Investors may want to enjoy it while they can.

The road ahead promises to be a long, hard slog as corporate profits are starting to slow.

And while Wall Street focused yesterday on the signs that the Fed will not raise rates anytime soon, there is also the glum realization that no rate cut — a hope that had buoyed stocks as recently as December — is likely to materialize this year. The Fed noted that "some inflation risks remain," as it left short-term rates steady at 5.25 percent.

Earlier, the Commerce Department reported that the gross domestic product grew at a 3.5 percent annual pace in the fourth quarter, far faster than the 2 percent pace in the third quarter and the 3 percent most analysts had expected.

Yet even amid evidence that the economy remains healthy, corporate earnings, which have been growing at a double-digit pace for more than four years, are expected to slip into single digits in the coming months, if they did not already do so in the fourth quarter. As a result, investors are left with a quandary.

"Will there be an inflationary scare or will the economy get very weak?" said Marc D. Stern, the chief investment officer at Bessemer Trust, a money management firm based in New York. "At various times in the year, each side of that debate will look correct. That will lead to sharp rallies and corrections."

Sectors like energy, utilities and financials that had led the stock market on its run-up since the summer have now turned into laggards, and few contenders have emerged to take their place.

This bull market may indeed be weary. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has climbed at an average annual pace of 12.7 percent in the last four years — a run that has had no 10 percent correction, something that usually occurs at least once during most long-running bull markets.

But there was clearly life in the bull yesterday: The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed up 0.66 percent, or 9.42 points, to 1,438.24, and the Nasdaq composite index closed up 0.62 percent, or 15.29 points, to 2,463.93. The Dow rose 0.79 percent, or 98.38 points, to 12,621.69 — a fraction of a point less than its record high set last week. And more bullish market watchers point to a long string of hopeful signs and developments, including the continuing wave of acquisitions and buyouts, Microsoft's introduction of its Vista operating system and consumers who are still spending despite a slump in the housing market. Personal consumption increased 4.4 percent in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

Many forecasters on Wall Street say these factors, along with stronger growth in sectors like health care, give them confidence that the market will move higher, albeit at a slower and more volatile pace than last year's 13.6 percent advance.

"We are going to have an O.K. year," said Robert C. Doll, vice chairman at Black Rock. "But its not going to be as easy as last year."

The S.& P. 500 is up 1.41 percent for the year, with about half of that coming in yesterday's rally. The Dow Jones industrial average is up 1.27 percent and the Nasdaq composite index is up 2.01 percent. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies is up 1.61 percent.

Last year, virtually every sector of the market ended up, but the rally had a few strong and distinct leaders. Energy stocks led the way with a 22 percent advance, diversified financial institutions were close behind at 21 percent and utilities were up 17 percent. But as crude oil prices have fallen from a high of $77.03 a barrel and settled in a band from $50 to $60, profits at energy companies have slowed. Stocks in the sector are down about 1.9 percent so far in 2007; utilities are down 0.4 percent.

Many financial companies reported strong fourth-quarter earnings, but analysts expect them to come under increasing pressure from higher long-term rates and rising defaults. Stocks in the diversified financial sector ended January up 1.5 percent.

"The market is looking for new leadership," said Owen B. Fitzpatrick, a managing director at Deutsche Bank's private-wealth management division. "Everyone is watching to see what will lead the market higher."

So far this year, real estate stocks, which did well last year as well, have led the way, with an advance of 9.7 percent largely because of the bidding war over Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest manager of office buildings. But analysts say that surge is unlikely to continue once a deal is set.

The stocks of auto and parts makers, mining and materials companies, consumer services and health care companies are also doing well, but many market specialists are skeptical about the sustainability of the lift in sectors like cars and materials.

Specialists are more optimistic about consumer services and health care, but the sectors may not completely make up for the role played by last year's leaders.

"The leadership has been shifting by fits and starts," said John A. Carey, a portfolio manager and executive vice president at Pioneer Investments, a Boston-based mutual fund company.

Many forecasters including Mr. Carey say technology companies, which struggled for much of last year but had a good run in the second half, may finally be ready to lead the market again since the sector's bust in 2000. The optimism is pinned in large part to new products and services including Vista, which could prove to be a catalyst that pushes businesses and consumers to purchase computers and related gear.

"The product cycle is in the process of changing," said Jim T. Swanson, chief investment strategist with MFS Investments in Boston. "There is a lot of new software and old equipment."

But it remains to be seen how widely the spoils will be shared across the technology sector. Bellwethers like Dell and Intel are still facing significant competitive challenges, and analysts have been disappointed by their recent earnings reports and the companies' outlooks for the coming year.

Investors have also been forced to rethink their views on interest rates and the broader economy. As recently as the start of December, the futures markets predicted that the Federal Reserve would start lowering short-term rates by April. As of yesterday, investors were betting that the first rate cut would not come until November. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction from its price, has risen from 4.39 percent in early December to 4.81 percent yesterday.

"The Fed is on hold in the near term as they watch the data," said Dean M. Maki, chief United States economist at Barclays Bank, who expects the Fed to raise rates to 6 percent this year, beginning in June.

Until late last year, many investors appeared to have convinced themselves that the housing market would have slowed the economy enough to spur the Fed into action by the spring. Their recent shift in thinking seems to have little do with any new statements from Fed officials, who have repeatedly and consistently said they remained more worried about inflation than they were by the prospect for weaker economic growth, a clear indication that policy makers were not ready to lower rates.

Rather, investors have come around to the Fed's view after reports on employment and manufacturing showed that the economy remained resilient in the face of the weakness in housing. Also, falling energy prices and a spell of unseasonably warmer weather early this year bolstered consumer spending and nonresidential construction.

"We could argue that perhaps the market got ahead of itself in projecting rate cuts for early 2007," said Douglas M. Peta, a senior vice president and market strategist with J.& W. Seligman & Company.

Another force that may have restrained American stocks in the last year is investor apathy toward the shares of large domestic corporations relative to the markets for bonds, commodities and foreign stocks, all of which have risen. Investors poured $13.2 billion into funds specializing in domestic equities last year, compared with $138.9 billion in nondomestic stock funds and $75 billion in taxable bond funds, according to AMG Data Services. A far larger sum, $312.7 billion, has been parked in money market funds. Specialists note that the flows are odd given that equities in the United States are cheap on a price-to-earnings basis relative to other assets like commodities and stocks in other developed countries. It appears that at least some of the flow of investments into other areas is driven by a desire on the part of investors to ride more buoyant markets and to take advantage of the weakness in the dollar, which fell 11.4 percent against the euro in 2006. So far this year, the dollar is up 1.45 percent.

In a way, however, specialists say investors' ambivalence toward equities is a good sign that the market has not overextended itself. "It is a good sign to the contrarian," Mr. Peta said. "The market has room to run. It has not gotten out of hand."

Bush On The Record (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

President Bush came to Wall Street yesterday to tout the continuing good economic news (for more on that see "What Slowdown?1"), and afterward he sat down for 45 minutes with a few members of this newspaper's editorial board. If Mr. Bush is beaten down by the polls and his party's loss of Congress, he isn't showing it.

DOJ_NMG_0125427

The President talked about a wide range of subjects, from warrantless wiretaps, to the politics of immigration, to diplomacy with North Korea, and we reprint notable excerpts2. But Mr. Bush's biggest theme was pushing back against what he feared might be a national lurch away from engagement with the world.

"I'm concerned about protectionism, isolationism," Mr. Bush said as he sat down, and he proceeded to reflect on the oscillations of American policy that in the past produced the anti-immigration backlashes of the 1920s and the anti-free trade legislation of the 1930s. "How do you work with others to see that we don't become isolationist?" So in his speech yesterday he hit on the need for new trade promotion authority. And in his conversation with us he also stressed his familiar arguments about the stakes of failure in Iraq.

With only two years to go in his term, it's clear he's also thinking of how he can solidify his antiterror legacy. On that score, we've been critical of Mr. Bush, notably on his decision to abruptly change gears and subject his NSA warrantless wiretap program to judicial review. So we asked why he had made that decision after 13 months of insisting that those wiretaps were a Presidential prerogative?

"'Scrap the program' is not accurate," he insisted. "The program exists. And now we've had a program ratified by the judiciary which is going to make it easier for a future President to have this program in place. . . . It had nothing to do with diminution of Presidential authority. It had everything to do with getting a second branch of government to support that which I have done."

Well, what if a future President finds that the judges on the FISA court that supervises the wiretaps are less cooperative? "That's way too hypothetical a question. I am pleased with the ruling they made. The program is ongoing, giving me the tools and others in the government the tools necessary to protect us," Mr. Bush said.

It sounds to us as if the President believes he's made a tactical concession in order to achieve what he thinks is a larger strategic victory. Let's hope he's right. * * *

The President was also notably accommodative in conceding Congress's power of the purse to influence war decisions, even such things as where troops can be deployed. "I think they have the authority to defund, use their funding power," he said, even to influence "total deployments in Iraq."

The danger here is that Congress will take him up on this concession and start to micromanage the war. Would he veto such an attempt? "Well," Mr. Bush replied. "I have put forth a plan that will succeed and it needs to be given a chance. So I'll wait and see what they try to do. But I have said to the American people I've analyzed every plan and I think this one has the best chance of success. If you think failure is a disaster then you have an obligation to come up with a plan for success, and this is the one that I think will work."

By contrast, Mr. Bush is more tentative -- or perhaps cagey -- about how best to deal with Iran's nuclear weapons programs. We asked if he thought the deadline on the Iranian nuclear issue would come during his term. "We're watching very carefully," he replied, thus evading a direct reply but also not giving any comfort to the mullahs about the next two years.

As for American leverage with Tehran, the President said, "there are rational people in that country who believe that isolation is not in their interests," noting recent electoral reversals for President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Regarding North Korea, Mr. Bush clearly believes the sanctions on Pyongyang's sources of hard currency have been the key to both the six-party talks and getting the regime's attention. Asked why some in his own government -- that is, the State Department -- want to lift those sanctions, Mr. Bush replied, "Where'd you get that report?" The idea, he added "is to use the sanctions to get North Korea to give up on its weapons programs."

So we're not going to lift the sanctions? Mr. Bush: "They've got to give up their weapons programs."

Mr. Bush also wasn't backing down on his judgments about Russian President Vladimir Putin, whom he has gone out of his way to court over the past six years. The Russian president "has kept his word on everything he's said to me," Mr. Bush said, adding that "Putin is a person who's going to have to make a choice, as will his successors: Whether his interests lie with the West or not. . . . My objective is to convince him that his interests do lay West. But in order to do so, he's got to understand the values that make Western societies move."

One of our goals during the session was to see if Mr. Bush really is entertaining thoughts of raising taxes in order to strike a deal on Social Security reform with Democrats. "I want people to bring their best ideas to the table, and I'm bringing [mine], which is you don't have to raise taxes to solve [it]," he said. That's not a categorical rejection of tax increases, but then again it won't encourage Democrats who want Mr. Bush to sign up for new taxes before they even come to the table. * * *

As he weaves between comments both on and off the record, Mr. Bush betrays little doubt about the direction of his policies, regardless of the politics. "Getting hammered," he said, "is what happens when you take tough, principled positions." He used those words in the context of immigration reform, but it might as well apply to the challenge his entire agenda faces over the next two years. Judging from our meeting, he won't be dodging that challenge.

A Chat With The President (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

The following are excerpts from President George W. Bush's meeting yesterday with the Journal's editorial board: ***

On the new Iraq strategy:

WSJ: Was there a moment in the war when you said we have to make a major change in the way we're doing things in Iraq?

GWB: Yes, there was.

WSJ: When was that?

GWB: September/October.

WSJ: Why?

GWB: Violence. It looked like it was uncontrollable. A young democracy is not going to survive if its capital city is in sectarian violence. I thought for example after the Samarra bombing that we were going to be fine. I thought the Shias had looked into the abyss of a civil war and pulled back. We thought they had, and they didn't.

On congressional opposition:

WSJ: There's a lot of discussion in Congress about putting caps on troop levels or defunding or saying you can't deploy, as commander in chief, troops in Baghdad. Do you think Congress has the constitutional authority . . .

GWB: I think they have the authority to defund, use their funding power . . .

WSJ: You do?

GWB: Oh yeah, they can say 'We won't fund.' That is a constitutional authority of Congress. I find it interesting, however, that on the one hand the Senate listens to the testimony of David Petraeus, who said, send me over with some additional reinforcements and this is the best chance to succeed. And they vote for him 81 to nothing. In other words, they listened to his testimony, appreciated what he had to say, and then they forgot the part about how he said I need the help. There's a contradiction there. . . .

WSJ: Can they put caps on total deployments in Iraq?

GWB: They can . . . through the purse. In others, I don't know if they're going to. And I don't want to predict. But they have the right to try to use the power of the purse to determine policy.

WSJ: But can they put conditions on those funds? Can they say we're only gonna give you the money if you don't send troops to Anbar province?

GWB: They put conditions on funds all the time. Some of those are called earmarks.

WSJ: Would you veto . . .

GWB: Well, . . . I have put forth a plan that will succeed and it needs to be given a chance. So I'll wait and see what they try to do. But I have said [to] the American people I've analyzed every plan and I think this one has the best chance of success. If you think failure is a disaster, then you have an obligation to come up with a plan for success and this is the one that I think will work.

On Iran:

GWB: My theory all along has been to isolate the Iranian regime to determine whether or not there are people in their country who will worry about financial isolation, isolation from trade opportunities. One of the interesting things that we do know about Iran is that there is a large diaspora that is communicating inside Tehran, for example. There are rational people in that country who believe that isolation is not in their interests. And there is enough commerce that if it can be affected through international cooperation, it may cause people to say, 'Wait a minute. We'd better take a look to see who's running this deal.'

DOJ_NMG_0125429

And I can only tell you that I'm encouraged by the fact that others are beginning to question whether Ahmadinejad is capable of leading the country. . . . I happen to believe, and the focus of this administration is really to continue to rally the pressure on their nuclear weapons program. I have said that I believe that they should have a civilian nuclear power plant so long as the materials are provided by and collected by a consortium. . . .

I'm also concerned about Iranian influence into Iraq and have made it clear to the Iranians that if we catch them moving weapons they'll be dealt with. There is a temptation for people to take my comments and say, 'Really what he wants to do is escalate the conflict.' The answer to that is that we can solve this peacefully and we're going to need other partners to help us solve it peacefully. Anyway, that's where we are.

WSJ: Do you believe the deadline on the Iranian nuclear issue is during your term?

GWB: You know, I can't . . . we're watching very carefully is the best way for me to describe it. And I'll be pushing hard to solve this diplomatically.

On Social Security:

WSJ: Can I ask about Social Security? You mentioned it in your speech. You also talked about low taxes being important to the strength of the economy. Would you accept an increase in the Social Security tax income cap from present levels in order to get a [reform] deal?

GWB: I want people to bring their best idea to the table, and I'm bringing my best idea, which is you don't have to raise taxes to solve Social Security.

On immigration:

WSJ: How concerned are you about the issue of immigration dividing the Republican Party?

GWB: Getting hammered is what happens when you take tough, principled positions. I don't want our party to be viewed as anti-anybody. If you get labeled as anti-people, you can't win elections. I believe the philosophy of our party is the most hopeful philosophy. It says to any person from any country: 'You have a chance to succeed.' It relies upon individuals. It empowers individuals to be able to realize their potential, as opposed to saying the government is going to do it for you. I know that sounds trite, but that's how I view the difference of philosophy.

I hope I can get a bill through the Congress so that the issue is dealt with in a rational way, before the election process.

WSJ: Do you think that will be easier with a Democratic Congress?

GWB: I think it's going to be hard either way. I think it's going to be [a] hard bill to get through. And I'll tell you why. The ultimate question is what happens to 12 million people who are here. My view is that you can't kick them out, nor should you grant them automatic citizenship. And so there's got to be rational middle way.

WSJ: What is it about this issue that causes so many conservatives to abandon their free-market principles? Raiding businesses, becoming protectionists, etc.?

GWB: I think raiding a business is more about enforcing the law. And conservatives tend to want to enforce the law. . . . This is an emotional issue. It's interesting. There have been periods in our history where nativism has had a strong appeal. Sometimes nativism, isolationism and protectionism all run hand in hand. We've got to be careful about that in the United States. The 1920s was a period of high tariff, high tax, no immigration. And the lesson of the 1920s ought to be a reminder of what is possible for future presidents.

I'm going to work hard on this. I feel strongly about the issue. I gave a speech from the Oval Office on the issue. And I hope we can get something done. But it's going to be hard. This is an issue where you can distort words and label things. Amnesty. That's all you've got to say. He's for amnesty. Whether it's amnesty or not. So it's a tough debate for us all. We'll see how it goes.

On Vladimir Putin:

WSJ: Do you feel that you misjudged Putin?

GWB: Vladimir Putin has kept his word on everything he's said to me. And my relationship with him is such that I'm able to express our disappointment when for example he deals harshly with the Baltics. Vladimir Putin is a person who's going to have to make a choice, as will his successors: whether or not his interests lie with the West or not. And my objective is to convince him that his interests do lay West. But in order to do so, he's got to understand the values that make Western societies move.

EDITORIAL: What Slowdown? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

If the U.S. economy keeps growing like it is, Rodney Dangerfield is going to have to rise from the dead and file a patent claim. The expansion that gets no respect keeps cruising along -- past $70 oil, above rising interest rates, and now apparently around even the housing and auto slumps.

Yesterday's report that fourth quarter GDP rose a healthy 3.5% was merely the most recent repudiation of the media and Beltway bears who have predicted a recession in each of the past four years. The latest scare came last fall, as the decline in housing accelerated and many of Wall Street's Keynesian forecasters predicted the consumer would slump along with it. (We hope someone offered smelling salts to the economists at Goldman Sachs yesterday.)

To the contrary, the consumer remains confident, clocking in with a strong 4.4% spending growth rate in the quarter. Clearly the strong job market and rising wage levels are offsetting any fear among consumers that their home values have flattened or fallen. Without housing and autos, real GDP rose 5.8%.

At the same time, U.S. exports are booming, as growth elsewhere accelerates. Exports rose 10% in the quarter and a very robust 9.2% for the year, adding 1.64 percentage points to GDP growth. By the way, exports to China alone rose by more than 30% in the first 11 months of last year, even without a major change in China's policy to peg the yuan closely to the U.S. dollar. Members of Congress pounded Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson yesterday for not doing enough to get China to revalue the yuan, but maybe China's growing economy is more important for American exporters than devaluing the greenback. Just a thought.

The most bullish economists yesterday also hailed the GDP report's inflation signals, which were muted. But we're not convinced the current inflation cycle has played itself out -- not with gold back near $650 an ounce, commodities in general rising again and the dollar weak. For its part, the Federal Reserve held its target fed funds rate at 5.25% yesterday, but played inflation down the middle. "Inflation pressures seem likely to moderate over time, its statement said, but "some inflation risks remain." In other words, they have no idea.

Our own view -- which we noted at the time -- is that the Fed would have done better to keep raising rates last year. It's clear today that the economy was fundamentally healthy, and the question now is whether the Fed will decide it has no choice but to raise rates again later this year if inflation reaccelerates. We'd note that even yesterday's benign price data showed that so-called "core inflation," less food and energy, was up 2.1%. The core rate has risen by at least 2% for more than two years. Chairman Ben Bernanke may end up regretting that he hasn't run a tighter policy.

For now, though, the economy remains healthy, defying its many critics at home and abroad. As the chart above shows, growth since the Bush tax cuts passed in mid-2003 has averaged more than 3.6%, helping to drive prosperity around the world but without the U.S. getting any credit for this remarkable performance. By comparison, whenever growth reaches even 2% in Europe these days, they throw a party.

The biggest threats to this expansion aren't the trade deficit, or "global imbalances," or the savings rate, or the yuan-dollar peg, or any of the other bugbears we hear so much about. The threats are policy mistakes -- such as a tax increase or protectionism from the new Democratic Congress, or the discovery by the Fed that it still hasn't lassoed inflation expectations. Let's hope Democrats don't mess with a good thing.

Go Global (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

GEORGE W. BUSH has never worked harder to promote free trade. On Wednesday, he made a powerful case on Wall Street for extending his fast-track trade negotiating authority, though even more impressive was his effort the day before to explain to factory workers in East Peoria, Ill., why they should care about such off-the-radar topics as the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks.

Though much of President Bush's State of the Economy speech Wednesday was a rehash of the energy, healthcare and education proposals he made last month in his State of the Union address, he hit all the right notes in his discussion of trade. The Doha round, aimed at lowering global barriers to trade and creating fair competition for farm products, is important, he said, because it could "level the playing field for our goods and services … but it also is a great opportunity to lift millions of people out of poverty around the world."

Bush rightly asked for an extension of his fast-track authority, which allows him to submit to Congress negotiated trade pacts for a straight up-or-down vote, so he can reach a deal on Doha and on separate bilateral measures with countries such as South Korea and Malaysia. It expires June 30 unless Congress extends it.

The U.S. economy is as strong as it is because of, not in spite of, the world's increased openness. But this is a message the president has not done an effective job of selling in the past, and it's a message that plenty of Democrats in the new Congress do not embrace, given their ties to narrower interests adversely affected by competition. So Bush now has a tough fight ahead of him. In the wake of his speech, six Democratic senators signed a letter, written by Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, saying they wouldn't support extending his fast-track power because he has used it to push through deals without adequate labor or environmental protections. Among the signatories was California Sen. Barbara Boxer, who seems oblivious to the importance of trade to her home state's economy.

Other Democrats do seem nervous about endangering Doha, which if successful would lower prices for U.S. consumers, open markets to U.S. exports and help Third World farmers trade their way out of poverty. Key leaders, such as Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), chair of the House Ways and Means Committee, have signaled a willingness to cut a deal with the president on his trade authority, as long as he'll seek more assistance for U.S. workers and make other concessions. Trade expands the economy and creates more jobs overall but admittedly creates upheaval in concentrated areas and industries. There's plenty of room for compromise here in terms of bolstering assistance programs for workers displaced by global competition.

More voices within the Democratic leadership need to support the president's push to retain his trade promotion authority by rekindling the Clinton administration's belief that globalization is more of an opportunity than a threat.

Bush Seeks To Cut Farm Program Funds (AP)

By Libby Quaid

AP, February 1, 2007

Thousands of the richest farmers would lose their government subsidies under a Bush administration plan to curb spending.

Proposals released Wednesday would reduce agriculture spending by $18 billion over the next five years. They represent President Bush's vision of a new farm bill: a system of supports that would protect farm income and crop prices and keep food prices stable.

Anyone making more than $200,000 in adjusted gross income would be cut off from farm payments under Bush's plan. At that level, "you're the richest guy in the county," Deputy Agriculture Secretary Chuck Conner said.

These producers, about 80,000 in all, are among the top 2.3 percent of taxpayers, officials said. It is hard to know just who would be cut off, said Ken Cook, president of Environmental Working Group, which tracks subsidies. Cook said many high-profile recipients, such as media mogul and CNN founder Ted Turner, probably were cut off in 2002, when Congress imposed the current $2.5 million income cap.

"You end up eliminating absentee owners who have a lot of income they're trying to shelter in agriculture," Cook said. "It could be a small-town lawyer or a business executive in Memphis who's put some money into a cotton plantation."

For everyone else who is eligible, the ceiling on payments would still be $360,000 and there still would be ways some people could collect millions of dollars above the limits.

Most payments go to growers of five major crops — corn, soybeans, wheat, rice and cotton.

In all, the plan is not a radical departure from current farm programs, which Democratic leaders and major farm groups have pushed to maintain.

"I believe so strongly in what farmers said," Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said, describing forums he held in dozens of states. "They like the structure of this farm bill, but they have a big vision for the future."

Some proposals, such as payment limits for the wealthy, are touchy subjects on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0125432

So, too, could be Bush's idea to pay farmers when revenues drop rather than when prices are low, which the subsidy program does.

"This safety net will actually work better across commodities to provide a true safety net," Johanns said.

Corn growers like the concept. Many other farm groups want to keep things as they are.

Many changes are designed to fend off trade challenges from other countries. The World Trade Organization in 2005 ruled some cotton subsidies illegal, in a case filed by Brazil.

The administration proposes to:

_Reduce spending on loan programs, which are viewed as more vulnerable to trade challenges.

_Boost direct payments and offer additional money to farmers for conservation practices.

_Continue dairy and sugar programs that limit supplies to support prices.

_Eliminate a prohibition keeping fruits and vegetables from being grown on land eligible for subsidies.

_Double purchases of fruits and vegetables for school lunch and other nutrition programs.

_Provide $2.1 billion in loan guarantees for plants that make ethanol fuel from wood chips, grasses and feedstocks other than corn and provide $1.6 billion to research noncorn sources of ethanol.

Johanns promised changes to the Food Stamp program that would make it available to more working poor and elderly people. He said details must wait until Bush releases his budget plan next week.

A name change for the program is also in store: "Food and nutrition programs, or something other than food stamps," Johanns said.

The House Agriculture Committee chairman, Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., said he found some ideas interesting and he would like to pursue them. But, he added, "I don't agree with everything they are suggesting."

His Senate counterpart, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, said the proposal "takes significant steps in the right direction" but nonetheless "falls short of the investment levels needed to reach our nation's objectives."

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., applauded limiting payments but wants to see more focus on conservation programs.

Wheat, rice and dairy producers and nutrition groups said the ideas were not enough; cotton growers worried about limiting payments.

Groups that represent sugar growers, fruit and vegetable farmers, conservation groups and food companies said the plan was a good first step.

The biggest general interest farm group, American Farm Bureau Federation, said it would study the ideas. The National Corn Growers Association withheld judgment.

Johanns' plan would cost $87.3 billion over the next five years, not counting food stamps and other nutrition programs, compared with $105 billion spent on farm programs over the past five years.

The current farm bill, written in 2002, expires at the end of this year. Lawmakers are anticipating having fewer dollars for farm programs; Bush has promised to balance the budget within five years, and the Democratic-run Congress is insisting on budget cuts to pay for new spending.

Agriculture Dept. Urges Big Overhaul In Farm Policy (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday proposed legislation that would reduce payments to farmers by $10 billion over the next five years and cut off support for wealthy ones entirely.

The measure, which would succeed a five-year agricultural authorization expiring at the end of this year, was described by some critics of current policy as perhaps the most reform-minded farm bill in decades.

If approved by Congress, it would also reduce some trade-distorting payments that have gotten the United States into trouble with the World Trade Organization, and might put pressure on the European Union to reduce its own farm subsidies, steps that could restart stalled global trade talks.

DOJ_NMG_0125433

But aspects of the plan, especially the proposal to cut off payments to farmers earning more than $200,000 a year, are already rankling some farm groups. Mary Kay Thatcher, a lobbyist with the American Farm Bureau Federation, said farmers would have "serious concerns" about that provision.

"You have to get a bigger economy of scale these days to make it in farming," Ms. Thatcher said. "We are all for small farmers, but we are also for what makes economic sense."

She said the federation's figures showed that the provision would affect 75,000 of the 700,000 farmers who have been collecting farm payments.

At a news conference in Washington, Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the reduction in overall spending, to $87.8 billion over five years, reflected the administration's need to tighten the federal budget.

But the Agriculture Department was able to propose billions in increased spending on some programs because of expectations that prices for commodities like corn, soybeans and wheat would be much higher. That would reduce farm subsidies.

The proposal would increase conservation financing, for instance, by $7.8 billion and direct almost $5 billion to fruit, vegetable and other "specialty" growers, who have received little federal assistance in the past. It would also provide $1.6 billion for research and development on cellulosic ethanol, which comes from agricultural waste and nonfood crops.

The proposal would actually increase overall direct payments to farmers by $5.5 billion, or 10 percent, over 10 years.

But it would also reduce large loans that, Brazil and other countries have argued, distort global trade. The United States is already under pressure to respond to Brazil's successful challenge at the World Trade Organization to the American cotton program.

In addition, the proposal would save $3.7 billion over 10 years by adjusting cyclical payments that have been based on low commodity prices. Under the legislation, the payments would be based instead on low yields per acre, a system that could aid drought-afflicted farmers who wind up with little revenue.

The department noted that under the government's current policies, only 9 percent of all American farms collected 54 percent of all government commodity payments.

One critic of those policies, Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, said that "Secretary Johanns has really planted a flag for reform." Mr. Cook, who in pushing conservation has long been on the attack against federal subsidies to large farmers, said the measure was "the most detailed proposal I have seen in the 30 years I have been working on agriculture issues."

Other groups, including the antipoverty organization Oxfam America, also praised the bill for seeking to cut off the richest growers while emphasizing support for beginning and poor farmers.

But the department faces a tough fight in Congress this spring, with an especially stiff challenge to the provision eliminating payments to wealthy producers. Under the proposal, subsidies would go only to growers who make less than $200,000 in adjusted gross income, a restriction affecting 71,800 farmers of the two million who declared farm income in 2003.

The current income cap is far more — $2.5 million — and it disappears altogether if at least 75 percent of a grower's income is farm-related.

Europe has failed in its efforts to cap farm payments according to income. The European Commission proposed such limits in 2002 but withdrew the proposal when Germany and Britain indicated that they would not support it.

USDA Outlines A Plan To Cut Farm Subsidies (WP)

By Dan Morgan And Gilbert M. Gaul

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday proposed ending farm subsidies for an estimated 80,000 wealthy individuals as part of a broad plan that would close loopholes and cut traditional farm programs by $4.5 billion over the next 10 years.

The proposal unveiled by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns was the administration's opening move in what will be a lengthy tug of war with Congress over a new multi-year farm bill. The current bill, one of the most generous to farmers in history, expires Sept. 30.

Debate on the new legislation comes at a time of major changes in agriculture. Booming demand from new ethanol plants has pushed corn prices to near-record levels. At the same time, U.S. trade partners are threatening retaliation unless the United States curbs crop subsidies that are said to promote overproduction here and low prices for farmers abroad.

"Times have changed," Johanns said, adding that commodity prices are strong, exports are up and farmers have the lowest debt-to-asset ratio in history.

The administration proposal addressed a number of problems raised last year in a nine-part series in The Washington Post.

The Post found, for example, that wealthy commercial farmers were easily able to legally avoid the limits on government subsidy payments. The Johanns plan would save $1.5 billion over 10 years by eliminating subsidies to people with adjusted gross incomes of more than $200,000 -- income after subtracting farm expenses and certain deductions. Deputy Agriculture Secretary Charles F. Conner said that if a farmer is at that level "you're the richest guy in the county."

The administration also promised to tighten rules that have enabled distant relatives of a farmer or a friend in a far-off city to collect payments on the farmer's behalf while doing little or no work.

The plan would close a major loophole highlighted by The Post that in 2005 allowed corn farmers to receive $3.8 billion more than needed to ensure they got the government-guaranteed price. Farmers would no longer be able to collect these "loan deficiency payments" when prices are low and then sell later when prices rise.

Johanns also proposed changes in a program that since 2000 has enabled some landowners who do not farm to still collect $1.3 billion in "direct" farm payments. The Post detailed how some Texas homeowners were drawing these payments on back yards once used as rice fields and known as "cowboy starter kits." The new plan reduces the amount of land eligible for the direct payments after farmland is sold.

Offsetting the reductions in traditional subsidies is nearly $10 billion in new spending for conservation, wetlands restoration and the development of new biofuels.

The current farm programs, which favor large growers of a few crops in a handful of states, retain strong backing in the congressional agricultural committees.

"We've got a long way to go to the finish line," Johanns acknowledged.

Senate Agriculture Committee Chairman Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) said in a statement that there were "a number of good ideas" but also complained that the proposal shortchanged a key conservation program he had created as well as spending on biofuels.

The administration plan appeared to be a delicately balanced attempt to parry complaints from U.S. trading partners while at the same time broadening political support in Congress for reforms.

Under the proposal, the safety net for producers of traditional crops such as cotton and corn would be retooled. The new plan would work by increasing income supplements to farmers while reducing price guarantees, which are under attack by Brazil, Canada and other countries.

For example, cotton growers, a key political constituency in Southern states dominated by the Republican Party, would face a reduced price guarantee. But they would be compensated by a 66 percent increase in the annual "direct payment" income supplement from the Agriculture Department.

"This safety net will actually work better across commodities to provide a true safety net," Johanns said. He noted that even in some recent years of soaring farm income, government subsidy payouts were high. The new plan would change that.

At the same time, the plan would offer beefed-up benefits to growers of fruits and vegetables, including $5 billion more through stepped-up government purchases for the school lunch program, as well as more money for research and the development of new markets abroad.

Some voiced concerns about the plan. "It continues to deliver most of the funds to a handful of farmers in a handful of states," said Scott Faber of Environmental Defense.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense said he had "concerns that the federal government is in the business of providing revenue insurance to farmers."

DOJ_NMG_0125435

The administration's proposal also recommends key changes to the Federal Crop Insurance Corp., one of the largest pieces of the nation's sprawling farm-subsidy system, costing taxpayers more than $20 billion in premium subsidies and losses over the past two decades.

The Post reported that private insurance companies that help administer the program made $927 million in profit in 2005, a record, and received an additional $829 million in fees. In some years, the companies have collected hundreds of millions of dollars in profit even as the USDA lost hundreds of millions.

The proposal recommends giving the USDA authority to renegotiate contracts more frequently with the 16 companies, potentially allowing the government to recoup a larger share of profits when times are flush.

"Changes are necessary to ensure a balance of potential gains and losses," the proposal stated.

Bush Farm Proposal May Snag On Congressional Roadblocks (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration proposed to make U.S. farm programs more market-oriented, unveiling a package of changes that could give new momentum to the stalled Doha Round of global trade talks, but may face big hurdles on Capitol Hill.

The initiative would put total farm spending over the next five years at $87 billion, down $18 billion from what the U.S. spent in the past five years on basic programs and disaster relief. It would boost spending on conservation and put more emphasis on direct income payments to farmers. Such methods of support are more acceptable than subsidies of specific crops under the World Trade Organization, the body based in Geneva that is shepherding the Doha Round.

At the same time, the administration is proposing to scale back a program that effectively sets a price floor on basic commodities such as rice, wheat and soybeans. It would also trim a separate set of subsidies designed to encourage production of those commodities. Those kinds of subsidies are widely thought to distort the marketplace, at home and abroad, by encouraging American farmers to make business decisions based on the amount of government assistance they get.

The Doha Round was launched in 2001 with the goal of lowering trade barriers and integrating the developing world more closely into the global economy. It stalled last summer because of differences among major trading partners, including the U.S., Brazil and the European Union, over how deeply to cut farm supports. The U.S. has pushed for others to lower agricultural tariffs, in hopes of creating new markets abroad for American farmers. It has come under major pressure to scale back its own subsidy programs, which critics say give U.S. farm goods an unfair advantage in global markets.

The unveiling of the administration's new farm package came as WTO chief Pascal Lamy signaled that he intends to formally reconvene negotiations in the Doha Round.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said "the Doha Round is not going to write the farm bill." Ms. Schwab, who has been shuttling around Europe trying to revive the talks, said the changes outlined yesterday should send "a signal to our trading partners that we care about farm reforms."

Oxfam America, a trade advocacy group and frequent critic of the Bush administration, yesterday commended the administration for trying to move U.S. farm policy "in a new direction."

The initiative faces an uncertain future on Capitol Hill and could become a test of how much sway President Bush has over lawmakers in a Democratic Congress. In proposing to scale back farm subsidies, the White House is treading on dangerous political ground, risking a fight with the powerful farm lobby and its allies in the House and Senate.

Even before the Bush proposal came out, the chairmen of the House and Senate agriculture committees signaled their wariness of agreeing to big cuts in farm subsidies without gaining in return significant new market access abroad for American farm products. So far, that has been an elusive U.S. goal in the Doha Round.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, a trade group representing thousands of farmers across the country, vowed to keep "an open mind" on the Bush initiative, but cited concern over the president's proposals to trim commodity subsidies. A federation spokesman said the group would "do our best to make sure that those are not in the final package."

The Bush proposal would make it harder for farmers to qualify for production subsidies. Under current law, producers with adjusted gross incomes of as much as $2.5 million are eligible to receive subsidy payments. The administration is proposing to lower the income cap to $200,000 and set an annual limit on total subsidy payments of $360,000.

Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the changes would make U.S. subsidy programs "more equitable" and "better able to withstand challenge" within the WTO.

Critics said limiting payments could hurt farmers with much lower actual income. Soybean growers, for example, sometimes wait a year or more to sell part of their crop to get the best price for it, a practice that can artificially inflate income for a single year. "His income may look like it's $200,000 when it really isn't," said Richard Ostlie, president of the American Soybean Association.

Bush Seeks Farm Spending Cut (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

The Bush administration yesterday proposed to reduce farm spending by an estimated $18 billion over the next five years.

Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns is not seeking major changes in the nation's farm subsidy program, which major farm groups and lawmakers in Congress want to retain.

But the administration is seeking, among other things, to eliminate farm payments for wealthy producers, limiting subsidy payments to those making less than $200,000 in adjusted gross income annually. The current income cap is $2.5 million.

That would rule out payments for nearly 80,000 producers who currently are eligible, officials said. Those producers collect about 4.5 percent of overall farm payments. The limit on payments would save an estimated $1.5 billion over 10 years.

"I don't know if there is anywhere in the country you can go where $200,000 adjusted gross net income is not a lot of income," Deputy Secretary Chuck Connor said. "You're the richest guy in the county."

It's difficult to know just who would be cut off, said Ken Cook, president of Environmental Working Group, which tracks subsidies. Mr. Cook said many high-profile recipients, such as media mogul and CNN founder Ted Turner, probably were cut off in 2002, when Congress imposed the $2.5 million income cap.

"You end up eliminating absentee owners who have a lot of income they're trying to shelter in agriculture," Mr. Cook said. "It could be a small-town lawyer or a business executive in Memphis who's put some money into a cotton plantation."

Administration's Farm Bill Plan Quickly Attracts Critics (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 1, 2007

U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) Secretary Mike Johanns kicked off a potentially difficult fight with members of Congress on a 2007 farm bill yesterday by offering administration proposals that would alter all of the main support programs for U.S. crops.

Johanns said the proposals would be about $10 billion less than the cost so far of the 2002 farm bill, which has been heavily criticized internationally for raising U.S. farm subsidies. At the same time, he emphasized that USDA was keeping the basic concepts of the 2002 farm bill, which the administration at one time had threatened to veto.

In calling for changes to the main U.S. farm-support programs, the administration could be stepping into a fight not only with the new Democratic chairmen of the Senate and House agriculture committees, but with one of its longtime allies, the American Farm Bureau Federation (AFBF).

AFBF has adopted policy calling for concepts from the 2002 farm bill to be extended into a new farm bill. In a Jan. 31 statement, AFBF President Bob Stallman said the group would study the administration's proposal, which he said would add to the congressional debate. At the same time, Stallman reiterated that AFBF members from across the country have "repeatedly and strongly emphasized the need to keep the 2007 farm bill consistent and very similar to the concepts in [current law]."

AFBF also opposes payment limitation and income-means testing, which are key parts of the proposals unveiled by Johanns. Some of the $10 billion in savings would come from a proposal to eliminate subsidies for taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes of more than $200,000.

This is a reduction from the current limit of $2.5 million and would save about $1.5 billion, Johanns said at a press conference. He emphasized that the payment limit would only cut off support for the top 2.3 percent of U.S. taxpayers, according to data from the Internal Revenue Service. However, AFBF has estimated that 78,000 farmers would be affected.

The income limitation would be imposed on farm income and non-farm income, which would prevent subsidies from being granted to movie stars and others whose wealth primarily comes from non-farm sources.

Deputy USDA Secretary Chuck Connor acknowledged USDA will face difficulties in selling its proposals to commodity groups by stating that "change is always difficult." However, he insisted the administration's proposals overall would lead to a better, more equitable farm program.

"There is no practical means by which you can argue that this is not a better safety net," Connor said.

However, a veteran agriculture lobbyist predicted USDA's proposals would not have a major effect on the next farm bill. "I don't think it's dead on arrival, but everyone has said for months that Congress will write a farm bill, and [it] will," the lobbyist said.

Groups that support specific parts of USDA's proposal are likely to pick up those ideas and move forward, and in that way the proposals could have some impact on the next farm bill, the lobbyist said.

One of the most controversial parts of USDA's proposal is its call for lower marketing loan payments that are intended to provide a "safety net" for producers when prices drop. USDA's proposal said this is intended to prevent farmers from gaming the system by holding their crops when prices are low and selling them later in the year when prices rise in order to increase their marketing loan payments.

Johanns also proposed de-linking a second payment program from prices so that farmers would no longer receive greater payments simply because prices for their commodities fall far below target levels set in the farm bill. Johanns instead proposed linking so-called countercyclical payments to a farm's annual revenue, which is a concept that has been advanced by corn growers.

USDA's proposal said the current program overcompensated producers who had large yields but faced low prices, while under-compensating farmers who were not able to harvest crops because of poor weather conditions or other factors. Farmers can only receive counter-cyclical payments if they are able to sell their crops.

The changes to the marketing loan and counter-cyclical payments could also make it easier for the administration to conclude a World Trade Organization (WTO) agreement by giving it more flexibility to reduce limits on U.S. trade-distorting support.

With some of these savings, USDA proposes increases for the third main U.S. support program, known as direct payments. In its proposal, USDA emphasized that this could help U.S. cotton producers, who in contrast to producers of corn and other U.S. commodities are expected to see lower prices in coming years. Direct payments for cotton producers would rise by 66 percent in the first year of the program, a USDA official said.

USDA also proposed the elimination of a provision preventing producers of fruits and vegetables from receiving direct payments, which would help the U.S. comply with a WTO decision that found U.S. subsidies had injured Brazilian producers. The change would also give the U.S. more flexibility to accept subsidy reductions in the current round of WTO talks, since direct payments would not count toward U.S. limits on trade-distorting subsidies under WTO rules.

However, this policy would again run against the wishes of commodity groups and AFBF, which have argued that the U.S. should not change its farm-bill policies until a WTO agreement is reached. Doing otherwise reduces U.S. leverage in the talks, AFBF has argued.

Fruit and vegetable growers have opposed the elimination of the planting prohibition. However, Johanns also proposed significant increases in funding for growers of specialty crops intended to win their support. For example, he proposes a $500 million increase in funding to purchase fruits and vegetables for school meals. The plan also includes new programs intended to help exporters of those crops deal with trade barriers.

House Panel Convenes Hearings On Bush's 'Signing Statements' (POL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Politico, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125438

The House Judiciary Committee has launched an investigation challenging repeated assertions by President Bush that he need not enforce aspects of laws he deems unconstitutional.

Committee members clashed over the validity of the investigation, which began with a committee hearing on Wednesday. Democrats said Bush is overstepping his executive role and meddling with the legislative process. Republicans maintained the president's assertions are merely guiding interpretations and follow long-term precedent.

The investigation will cover Bush's commentary on bills approved by both congressional chambers that require presidential approval. In at least 148 cases, Bush has appended what are known as "signing statements" to his signature. The documents outline specific aspects of the law that he finds unconstitutional and might refuse to enforce.

Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr., D-Mich., said Bush's widespread use of the signings challenge at least 800 provisions in laws passed while he has been in office.

"The administration has engaged in these practices under a veil of secrecy," Conyers said during the hearing. "This is a constitutional issue that no self-respecting federal legislature should tolerate."

The signing statements amount to a line-item veto, according to critics, and frustrate the legislative branch by not giving lawmakers the opportunity to override a presidential veto. They also have said that Bush has failed repeatedly to notify Congress of his intentions and that a collection of his signing statements is not readily accessible to lawmakers or the public.

Conyers said he planned to meet with White House and Justice Department officials to discuss concerns about the statements. Staff members said Wednesday's hearing was part of a new Judiciary Committee investigative unit charged with oversight of alleged administration abuses, headed by Elliot Mincberg, former general counsel for People for the American Way.

Committee members heard from Karen Mathis, president of the American Bar Association, which last summer issued a report recommending the president communicate his concerns about pending bills before they pass and then outright veto those bills if his concerns aren't addressed.

"If a president issues a signing statement that nullifies a provision of a law without following constitutionally proscribed procedures, he or she is usurping the power of the legislative branch," Mathis said.

Bush's signing statements have covered a range of issues, from military rules and affirmative action requirements to immigration and federal research.

Bush supporters have said that he is by no means the first chief executive to issue signing statements. John Elwood, deputy assistant attorney general for the Department of Justice, told committee members that the statements date to the early 19th century and are commonly used by presidents to explain how they plan to enforce laws.

President Bill Clinton issued at least 100 signing statements during his eight years in office, and, according to Elwood, Bush's statements "do not appear to differ substantively from those issued by either presidents Reagan or Clinton."

Republicans said Bush is well within legal and ethical bounds, and ranking member Lamar Smith, R-Texas, said no court has ever considered that the statements hold the weight of law.

"Critics have launched a massive fishing expedition, but they have caught only the reddest of red herrings," he said.

However, opposition to Bush's statements has been bicameral and bipartisan. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said on the Senate floor earlier this year that he plans to reintroduce a bill that would give Congress power to sue a president over a signing statement. He specifically cited concerns with Bush's statements on the re-authorized Patriot Act and an anti-torture measure sponsored by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Note to Lamar Smith: am I confused or are you? If a signing statement expresses how the statute will be implemented and enforced then that is by definition 'the law' and carries the 'weight of law'. Unimplemented or unenforced it is moot. Can a citizen escape application of or enforcement of a statute one it is defined in one of these signing statements? If not, then it is 'the law'. Obfuscating this activity by the executive behind your 'doesn't hold the weight of law' claim creates an impossible layer of abstraction - and even worse - in this administration - secret abstraction.

If there is objection, then veto. Is the Constitutional foundation for a line-item 'interpretation' any more solid than for a line item veto?

House Panel Will Probe President's Use Of Bill-signing Statements (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - New House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers used his first oversight hearing Wednesday to say that he's launching an investigation into President Bush's possible abuse of presidential signing statements.

Democrats and some Republican lawmakers have accused Bush of conducting an imperial presidency by using bill signing statements to declare that he'll interpret legislative provisions his way and will feel free to ignore some terms.

"That conduct threatens to deprive the American people of one of the basic rights of democracy - the right to elect representatives who determine what the law is, subject only to the president's veto," Conyers said as he opened a hearing on signing statements. "That does not mean having a president sign those laws, but then say that he is free to carry them out or not, as only he sees fit."

Though some influential Republicans, such as Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., have railed against Bush's signing statements, several House Judiciary Committee Republicans balked Wednesday, describing Conyers' hearing and vow as political fishing expeditions.

"One has the distinct feeling that this is really a policy debate," said Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, the committee's ranking Republican. "If critics of signing statements agreed with the president on policy, we simply would not be here today."

Some legal experts disagree, saying that Bush's assertion of this arguable executive authority undercuts Congress and enhances the power of the president beyond the limits set by the Constitution.

"The potential for misuse in the issuance of presidential signing statements has reached the point where it poses a real threat to our system of checks and balances and the rule of law," said Karen J. Mathis, president of the American Bar Association. The ABA approved a resolution last August condemning the way Bush uses signing statements and their frequency.

Bush has issued 147 signing statements, according to Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Signing statements don't have the weight of law, but they can influence judicial interpretations of a statute. The statements also send a strong message to executive- branch agencies on how the White House wants them to carry out federal laws.

In written testimony, Assistant Attorney General John P. Elwood said that Bush has never used signing statements as an attempt to "override" enacted laws.

But several legal experts and lawmakers contend that some of the president's signing statements have that potential. Some point to a signing statement regarding the McCain amendment, which forbids U.S. torture of prisoners.

After he signed the amendment into law with fanfare in December 2005, Bush quietly issued a signing statement from his Texas ranch saying that he would view the law "in a manner consistent with the constitutional authority of the president . . . as commander in chief."

He added that his approach "will assist in achieving the shared objective of the Congress and the president . . . of protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks."

The Bush White House maintains that because the nation is in an indefinite war on terror, Bush's constitutional authority as commander in chief has virtually no boundary. His language in the signing statement on the McCain amendment was widely viewed as reserving himself the right to ignore it.

Still, Georgetown University law professor Nicholas Rosenkrantz told the committee that the "brouhaha over presidential signing statements is largely unwarranted." He said previous presidents have issued similar statements, although other scholars have said that none before Bush asserted the right to ignore terms in a law.

The White House rejects assertions that Bush is abusing his authority.

"President Bush's signing statements are consistent with prior administrations' signing statements," Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said in a written statement. "He is exercising a legitimate power in a legitimate way."

Former Rep. Mickey Edwards, R-Okla., urged Congress to fight the White House tooth and nail on the issue.

"Presidential signing statements may not sound like such a big deal, but they are declarations of the right of a president to be above the law, and that is a path that, once taken, will prove ultimately fatal to our democracy," he said.

Judiciary To Probe Signing Statements (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 1, 2007

Asserting that President Bush's frequent use of "signing statements" to interpret federal laws have allowed the executive branch to effectively thwart Congressional intent, House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers (D-Mich.) said Wednesday that his panel will launch a formal investigation into the practice.

The Michigan lawmaker said the investigation would include both Democratic and Republican staff and will focus on the approximately 150 signing statements issued by Bush, which the American Bar Association estimates have affected more than 1,100 provisions of federal law.

House Democrats have criticized the use of such statements, arguing that they not only undermine the separation of powers of the legislative and executive branches but also threaten legislative authority.

"All too often, the administration has engaged in these practices under a veil of secrecy. This is a constitutional issue that no self-respecting federal legislature should tolerate," Conyers said.

He announced the investigation at the outset of the committee's first oversight hearing of the 110th Congress, which also focused on signing statements.

For the inquiry, Conyers said the committee will seek cooperation from both the Justice Department and the White House to identify every statutory provision that has been the subject of a signing statement.

In addition, the investigation will focus on the consequences of those signing statements, including any related actions taken by the executive branch on laws it determines are unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0125441

"For example, if the president claims he is exempt from the McCain amendment ban on torture, I want to know whether and where he has permitted it," Conyers said, referring to an amendment sponsored last year by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that put restrictions on torture of detainees in U.S. custody.

Republicans at Wednesday's hearing largely defended the executive branch practice, arguing that federal courts have rarely cited the documents when determining a specific law's constitutionality.

"Presidential signing statements are a non-issue," said Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), the panel's ranking member. He later added: "One has the distinct feeling that this is simply a policy debate."

The Texas lawmaker said in a separate interview that he was unaware of the investigation until the Wednesday hearing, adding that he has yet to make any agreements with the Democratic majority about how the inquiry will go forward.

"If it's about getting some information, I think we did that at the hearing today," Smith said.

Although Conyers asserted the investigation would be aggressive, he declined to discuss in a separate interview whether the panel could issue subpoenas should the White House or the Justice Department prove uncooperative.

"To be blunt, we are not going to take no for an answer," Conyers said at the hearing. "We are a coequal branch of government, and if our system of checks and balances is going to operate, it is imperative that we understand how the executive branch is enforcing — or ignoring — the bills that are signed into law."

Following the hearing, Conyers said the committee may also seek legislation requiring that Congress receive official notice any time the president issues signing statements. Although the declarations are currently printed in the Federal Register, Conyers said that practice is not sufficient notification.

"Dropping it into the Federal Register, you may as well throw it out the window," he said.

Spending Bill Passes House, Goes To Senate (USAT)

USA Today, February 1, 2007

The House of Representatives passed a $463.5 billion spending bill Wednesday that covers about one-sixth of the federal budget. The vote was 286-140.

The bill would increase spending on education, veterans, health research and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies. The legislation would cut President Bush's budget requests for NASA, foreign aid and aid for communities affected by the latest round of military base closings. The measure heads to the Senate. Bush has signaled he will sign it.

Senators join forces against troop buildup

Two senators leading separate efforts to put Congress on record against President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq joined forces, agreeing on a non-binding resolution that would criticize the plan. Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., had been sponsoring competing measures opposing Bush's strategy of committing 21,500 more U.S. troops to the war zone.

The new resolution would vow to protect funding for troops while keeping Warner's language expressing the Senate's opposition to the troop buildup.

Senators to get spy program documents

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he was turning over secret documents outlining the government's domestic surveillance program to congressional leaders who have repeatedly questioned the legality of the operation. He said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and the panel's ranking Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, would get immediate access. The classified information will not be made public, Gonzales said. The material includes the court's rulings in cases involving the National Security Agency's program of eavesdropping on international calls and e-mails of people in the USA when one party may be linked to terrorists. — Kevin Johnson

House Approves Huge Spending Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125442

A must-pass bill covering about one-sixth of the federal budget swept through the House on Wednesday. A sizable chunk of Republicans joined virtually all Democrats in approving spending increases for education, veterans and the AIDS battle in Africa.

The 286-140 vote — with 57 Republicans voting in favor — was a pleasant surprise for Democrats who expected far less GOP support. The $463.5 billion spending bill had much to please the rank and file, including Republican moderates, even though it contained no pet projects for their districts.

"The content is a heck of a lot better than most expected we'd come up with," said the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David Obey, D-Wis. He worked with his Senate counterpart, Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., to add money for initiatives popular with both Democrats and Republicans.

The winning vote would have been even higher had there not been such hard feelings over how Democrats powered the bill through the House: just an hour of debate time, no amendments allowed.

Republicans also said the measure was not entirely free of parochial "earmarks," saying powerful senators such as Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, and Pete Domenici, R-N.M., received special treatment for home-state projects.

The White House has signaled that President Bush would sign the bill despite cuts to his requests for NASA, foreign aid and communities affected by the latest round of military base closings.

But numerous agencies are feeling the crunch from operating for four months at or below last year's levels. So the administration was eager for relief for the FBI, the Census Bureau and the Veterans Affairs Department and others.

Republicans also struggled to find unity. Conservatives pressed for a budget freeze to save about $6 billion.

Other lawmakers, including Reps. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., and Dave Weldon, R-Fla., complained about inadequate spending. Moran pushed in vain for $3.3 billion in more money for farm disaster aid. Weldon complained that a $545 million cut to NASA would jeopardize the agency's plans to send man back to the Moon and on to Mars.

Democrats were not entirely pleased with the bill.

It would grant remarkable flexibility to the administration in determining how to use money within agency accounts — and in awarding grants and other projects to lawmakers' districts and states.

Living within last year's budget cap set by Bush — before Democrats won control of Capitol Hill in the November elections — meant they could not be as generous as they would have liked.

Democrats, nonetheless, provided increases for underperforming schools, health research, and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies.

They were especially pleased with a $260 boost, to $4,310, in the maximum Pell Grant for low-income college students, and with a 40 percent increase, to $4.5 billion, for fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas.

Obey said $3 billion to put the 2005 base closing law in place would be added to an upcoming Iraq war spending bill; that made it easier to bulk up favored domestic accounts.

Republicans contended some money came from phantom savings from highway spending.

In a striking exchange, GOP Rep. David Hobson of Ohio said Democrats bowed to powerful Republicans needed to pass the bill in the Senate.

Hobson said the House wanted to cut $495 million from nuclear weapons accounts, but settled for just $95 million out of deference to Domenici and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., whose states are home to numerous Energy Department facilities.

Hobson said Democrats acceded to Senate demands to preserve some home-state projects such as $45 million for a much-ridiculed indoor rainforest research in central Iowa.

"If ever there was low-hanging fruit ... this was it," Hobson said.

Obey said that project, obtained two years ago by Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, originally was in a bill that Hobson personally negotiated.

The tally for the measure may have been inflated. It contains a provision blocking lawmakers from receiving their annual cost of living pay raise; some members may have been reluctant to appear to cast a vote that could be interpreted of voting themselves more money.

Agencies winning budget relief in the bill include:

DOJ_NMG_0125443

_Veterans Affairs, which would get a $3.6 billion increase for the rapidly growing veterans medical care program.

_The National Institutes of Health, which would receive a $620 million increase for health research grants.

_Amtrak, whose budget would be frozen at $1.3 billion instead of absorbing a $400 million cut proposed by Bush.

_The Census Bureau, which would get money for new computers for field workers conducting the 2010 census.

House Democrats Show Strength In Passage Of Spending Measure (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- House Democrats, in the strongest showing yet of their new legislative muscle, pushed through a $463.5 billion spending resolution to fill the gap left by the collapse of the budget process under Republican rule last fall.

With funding for the government running out Feb. 15, both parties and the White House are eager to resolve the fiscal crisis. But the new majority brought the bill to the floor with remarkable speed and no apologies to Republicans for denying them the chance to offer individual amendments.

"You forfeited any right to squawk about how we cleaned up your mess," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.). "Somebody had to make the decisions, because you didn't."

Less than a week before Mr. Bush submits his 2008 budget, the action set a clear marker for the new Congress and spending battles ahead. Total funding conforms to caps set by the White House but tilts now toward Democratic priorities in education, health care and law enforcement.

WASHINGTON WIRE

See the expanded online Washington Wire2. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire each weekday with political news, analysis and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway.

No pay raise is permitted for lawmakers, and a moratorium is imposed on spending earmarks for home state projects, a practice that has become a symbol of congressional abuse.

"This turns the page on a past that was broken and failed," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D., Ill.), chairman of the party caucus. As many as 57 Republicans broke ranks to join in the final 286-140 vote, a showing that surprised many Democrats on the floor and should help expedite action in the Senate.

There the spending bill will inevitably be paired with Senate debate on Mr. Bush's Iraq policy and his decision to add another 21,500 troops to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Here also Republican divisions, combined with the relative unity among Democrats, could be decisive. Last evening, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) predicted his caucus would overwhelmingly support a bipartisan resolution crafted by Sen. John Warner (R., Va.) challenging the troop surge.

The former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Mr. Warner won the public backing of the new Democratic chairman, Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, and changes made last evening could potentially win the backing of Sen. Judd Gregg. The influential New Hampshire Republican and White House ally said in an interview that he was "considering" supporting Mr. Warner.

The mood of frustration over Iraq among Republicans is striking. Indiana Sen. Richard Lugar, the ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has argued that the country must begin to prepare for the likelihood that the troop "surge" will fail. Even Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a White House ally on the war, has found himself hamstrung when writing a proposed alternative to Sen. Warner that would set out benchmarks that the Iraqi government forces must meet.

Asked if there would be any consequence, if the government failed, Mr. McCain said he was reluctant to put any in writing. "I don't know any good option; otherwise, I would suggest it," he said.

Mr. Reid's challenge now is to navigate both through the Iraq and spending debate in the space of two weeks. Since fiscal 2007 began last Oct. 1, most of the government has operated under an interim funding resolution, the latest extension of which expires Feb. 15. Mr. Reid is warning that he can't afford to be "Mr. Nice Guy" but if he treads too heavily, he could lose the Republican support he needs.

DOJ_NMG_0125444

To deny all amendments would be "unfortunate," said Mississippi Sen. Thad Cochran, the ranking Republican on the Senate Appropriations Committee. "I might vote against the bill for that reason."

Nonetheless, the House bill has been negotiated with influential Republican senators in hopes of avoiding conflict, and Mr. Obey pledged that the biggest bone of contention -- funding for scheduled military-base closings -- will be addressed as part of an emergency spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan this spring.

House Passes $463 Billion Spending Bill After Deleting Earmarks (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The House passed a $463 billion spending measure yesterday that would keep the government operating for the remainder of the fiscal year, an austere plan stripped of billions of dollars worth of special-interest provisions.

The bill, approved 286 to 140, maintains funding for most federal agencies at 2006 levels, but it adds about $16 billion for Democratic priorities, including veterans' health care and Pell grants for higher education. The Senate must pass the continuing resolution by Feb. 15 to avert a partial government shutdown. The White House has indicated that President Bush will sign the measure.

Republicans protested that the bill was not entirely stripped of special-interest funding, or earmarks, as the Democratic leaders asserted, and that they were denied the opportunity to offer amendments.

Rep. Dave Weldon (R-Fla.) complained that funding for NASA would be significantly below the levels requested by Bush and initially approved by the House last year. Under the resolution approved yesterday, the 2007 NASA budget would be $16.2 billion -- about the same as its 2006 budget.

Weldon said that funding for the manned-exploration budget, in particular, would be less than what was expected and that the program to launch a new manned spaceship by 2014 would be delayed as a result.

But more than a quarter of GOP House members supported the resolution, which contains spending provisions for politically popular items, including an additional $1.3 billion for the fight against HIV/AIDS and other diseases. Moreover, half of the House GOP's leadership team in the past two Congresses sided with the Democrats, including Reps. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.).

The Senate is expected to take up the measure after it debates and votes on a resolution of disapproval over Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to the war in Iraq.

The measure had to be cobbled together because Congress did not finish its work last year and failed to pass nine of 11 spending bills. "Four months into fiscal 2007, we are cleaning up the Republican Party's budget mess," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said during the floor debate.

For students, the extra funds for Pell grants would mean an increase of $260 per year, up to $4,310, according to congressional estimates. The National Institutes of Health would have an additional 500 research grants to administer because of almost $620 million in additional funding for the remainder of fiscal 2007, which will end on Sept. 30.

The chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) and Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W. Va.), respectively, announced in early December that they would push to combine and approve all the remaining spending bills but would strip out thousands of earmarks. That decision came after the recent corruption scandals in Congress, which almost all involved earmarks tucked into spending bills, usually with no legislative oversight.

In removing all the earmarks, however, Democrats gave up their ability to direct how government agencies spend billions of dollars.

House Republicans contended that the bill contains nearly $500 million in what amount to earmarks, but Democrats argued that those spending provisions -- including almost $50 million for rain forests in Iowa -- were supported by Republicans or are continuations of projects that had already been allotted millions of dollars in federal funds.

The spending bill does not include the standard cost-of-living adjustment in congressional pay, leaving a rank-and-file member's salary at $165,800.

DOJ_NMG_0125445

Unlike in past years, when both parties adhered to a cease-fire in the use of pay increases as a political issue, many Democratic challengers in last year's election campaign pointed to the many salary boosts incumbents received under GOP rule over the past decade while the minimum wage stayed at $5.15 per hour.

GOP Criticizes Pork In House Spending Bill (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

House Democrats yesterday broke a pledge to strip pork spending from a massive funding resolution that contained about $500 million in what Republicans called questionable projects, including $44.6 million for a rainforest biosphere in Iowa and $50 million for the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

"We may have made some wrong choices; we undoubtedly did," said Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and Appropriations Committee chairman. "At least, in contrast to last year, we made the hard choices."

He said the projects authorized in the bill were not pork or earmarks -- hidden spending provisions for lawmakers' home districts or states -- but legitimate budget items left in the lurch when Republicans failed to pass appropriations bills last year.

The resolution passed 286-140, with 57 Republicans joining the majority.

Critics said Democrats rammed through the $463.5 billion spending package without a committee hearing, without a committee mark-up process and without accepting amendments on the House floor.

"It is unfortunate that we are going to see a return to the days when you have decisions about how money is appropriated made by bureaucrats and made in smoke-filled rooms," said Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican. "That's the kind of change [Americans] did not vote for when they went to the polls in November."

What's more, Republicans said, the legislation was fraught with accounting gimmicks to disguise higher spending. It actually increased spending, and therefore the budget deficit, by more than $6 billion from the last fiscal year, they said.

An aide to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the Republicans were asking for "flat funding" at last year's levels, which could be accomplished only with a $6 billion budget cut.

"There would be no funding for the veterans program," said the aide, referring to the $3.6 billion appropriated for veterans health benefits.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said the resolution completed the Republican Congress' unfinished business and cleared the way for Democrats to fulfill promises to ban earmarks and reduce the deficit.

"We are doing this so we can move on to that process," the Maryland Democrat said.

Earmarks in the spending package included $94 million to deliver federal services to remote Alaskan communities, $80 million for a canceled program to extend the life of W80 warheads for cruise missiles, and $49.7 million for oil and gas research already funded under the 2005 Energy Policy Act.

Democrats refused to consider a Republican amendment that would have cut the earmarks and used the money for deficit reduction and increased spending on military housing and drug enforcement.

Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said he remained eager to work with Democrats, but he vowed to hold them accountable.

"Democrats promised this massive spending bill would be earmark-free but then gave us a bill that includes hundreds of millions of dollars worth of funding for earmarked pork projects," he said.

Democratic leaders insisted the bill "cleaned up" a Republican budget mess and boosted funding for vital programs, including $620 million for medical research to cure cancer and other diseases, $216 million for the FBI and $104 million for Head Start preschools.

"There is nothing new about these Democrats," said Rep. John Campbell, California Republican. "They are the same tax-and-spend Democrats of old, just with a new slogan."

House Dems Pass $464 Billion Spending Bill, Criticized By GOP (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125446

House Democrats successfully passed a continuing resolution yesterday to keep the government running until the end of September, despite Republican attempts to force the bill back to committee.

"Now that we are in the majority we are left with unfinished business," Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said in a floor statement yesterday before the passage of the legislation. "We need to complete last year's undone business … We need to fund the priorities of the American people."

The $463.5 billion bill, which passed 286-140, provides money in lieu of the nine appropriations bills for the 2007 fiscal year that were not enacted as they should have been by the 109th Congress.

Without any action, funding of the federal government would expire Feb. 15 and cause a partial shutdown. Fifty-seven Republicans voted with Democrats on the measure, while only two Democrats, Reps. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) and Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.) joined Republicans in opposing the continuing resolution.

The Democratic motion to recommit keeps funding levels at much the same level as in the 2006 fiscal year, but allows individual adjustments within the spending bill. Hoyer said the resolution would increase funding for veterans' healthcare, law enforcement, Pell Grants for students, and health-research programs. President Bush's requested funding levels for programs such as NASA space exploration and aid for communities affected by the closure of military bases last year were cut.

The pay increase that members of Congress usually receive yearly in spending bills was excluded this time, freezing the salary of rank-and-file members at $165,200 for fiscal 2007.

Republicans argued that the continuing resolution violated House rules because of the inclusion of what they characterized as earmarks. The GOP dubbed the bill a "CR-omnibus," implying that the Democratic measure broke early promises to ban earmarks for the year.

"It's a CR-omnibus," said Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.) during a GOP press conference yesterday. "It's a hooker dressed up as a nun."

Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said, "This $463.5 billion bill contains earmarks, breaking the Democrats' pledge for no earmarks."

GOP members again took issue with the way the bill was pushed through the House, saying they had been "shut out of the process." Republicans used parliamentary stalling procedures to slow down the process but were ultimately unsuccessful in preventing passage.

Their motion to recommit, which would have sent the bill back to committees, failed by a vote of 228–198, largely along partisan lines.

Debate over the bill became raucous as Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) and ranking member Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) traded barbs.

"I'm very concerned about the volume of staff direction [on the resolution]," Lewis said.

"We can't correct all of your mistakes," Obey snapped back.

House Leaders Eye Outside Ethics Panel (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, February 1, 2007

House leaders on Wednesday announced a task force to examine whether an outside panel should investigate ethics problems involving House members.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said in a statement that she and the House Republican leader, Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, had agreed that the task force would report by May 1.

Rep. Michael Capuano, D-Mass., will lead the eight-member task force, which has four lawmakers from each party.

Both the House and Senate over the past year have struggled over whether Congress should keep policing itself through the ethics committees in the two chambers or whether an outside office should oversee ethics investigations.

The Senate, in passing an ethics and lobbying overhaul two weeks ago, rejected for a second straight year a proposal to create an Office of Public Integrity. It would have handled some of the investigative functions of the Senate ethics committee.

The vote was 71-27 against creating the office, with senators arguing that the ethics committee has a good record of pursuing charges against members.

House Democrats cited the ethical legal lapses of the Republican majority in their successful election campaign last November. Now in the majority, Democrats made tighter ethics and lobbying rules their first order of business when the new session began in early January.

The question of an outside office, however, was put aside. The task force will see how similar offices have worked in state legislatures and private entities.

Other Democrats on the panel Reps. Marty Meehan of Massachusetts, Bobby Scott of Virginia and Betty McCollum of Minnesota. The Republicans are Reps. Lamar Smith of Texas, Dave Camp of Michigan, Dave Hobson of Ohio and Todd Tiahrt of Kansas.

Full Disclosure Of Back Scratching (NYT)

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Now that House Democrats are beyond the spotlight of their ballyhooed first 100 hours, there are signs of foot-dragging on the keystone of their promised lobbying reform: forcing disclosure of the huge sums in campaign donations that lobbyists package to grease privileged access in the Capitol. This practice — called bundling — has lobbyists mass hundreds of donations of a few thousand dollars each into special-interest piñatas of hundreds of thousands. Full disclosure of bundling is the sine qua non of lobbying reform. Speaker Nancy Pelosi cannot let the new House majority backslide.

Senate Democrats have already passed bundling disclosure, but Roll Call, the Capitol newspaper, reports that House colleagues are raising questions about whether they really want to go along. The Senate bill requires quarterly reports from lobbyists detailing their own donations and fund-raising events, plus the mega-sums they solicit, bundle and grandly submit to candidates. According to Roll Call, this provision is stalled by Congressional doubters and K Street lobbyists. Opponents also want to hobble a provision barring Congressional alumni from lobbying for two years, and another forcing disclosure of how lobbyists concoct “grass roots” campaigns to create pressure in Washington.

A bill matching the Senate’s disclosure mandate has been submitted by the Democrats Chris Van Hollen of Maryland and Marty Meehan of Massachusetts. Hesitant Democrats should bear in mind that Mr. Van Hollen, as chairman of their re-election drive, is well aware of how the easy-money culture helped sweep the Republicans from power. The new majority cannot afford to be tagged as hypocrites.

Speaker Pursues Military Flights (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

The office of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is pressing the Bush administration for routine access to military aircraft for domestic flights, such as trips back to her San Francisco district, according to sources familiar with the discussions.

The sources, who include those in Congress and in the administration, said the Democrat is seeking regular military flights not only for herself and her staff, but also for relatives and for other members of the California delegation. A knowledgeable source called the request "carte blanche for an aircraft any time."

"They are pressing the point of her succession and that the [Department of Defense] needs to play ball with the speaker's needs," one source said. The request originally went to the Pentagon, which then asked the White House to weigh in.

Mrs. Pelosi's request is not new for a speaker, who is second-in-line in presidential succession. A defense source said the speaker's regular access to a military plane began after the September 11, 2001, attacks. Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, who was speaker at the time, started using U.S. Air Force planes for domestic travel to and from his district for security reasons. A former Hastert aide said the congressman did not use military planes for political trips or regularly transport his family.

The defense source said Mr. Hastert requested a plane with good communications so he could conduct legislative business. The military flights increased to the point the speaker used a military plane for many, if not all, flights to his Illinois district, the former aide said.

DOJ_NMG_0125448

Sources said Mrs. Pelosi's request goes beyond what Mr. Hastert received. The speaker's legal counsel is spearheading the talks.

An aide to Mrs. Pelosi, who asked not to be named, confirmed yesterday that discussions are ongoing with the administration. "It would be done for security reasons," said the aide, adding that the speaker has used military aircraft for at least one trip back to San Francisco.

The aide asserted that the administration was using a Washington Times reporter, in effect, to negotiate with the speaker's office by leaking information about Mrs. Pelosi's request. Asked if the speaker was seeking increased access to military planes, the aide took the question, but did not call back.

A Pentagon spokesman referred questions to Mrs. Pelosi's office. A White House spokeswoman said last night she had no information on the request.

The rules for congressional travel on military aircraft are contained in Defense Department Directive 4515.12.

Congressional access to military passenger jets is generally restricted to official trips abroad, or for domestic flights to military bases or events to which the Pentagon invited the lawmaker. Al Qaeda attacks on the U.S. changed the procedure in the case of the speaker.

U.S. Air Force travel for VIPs such as members of Congress is first-rate. The planes are staffed with stewards who serve meals and tend an open bar. Communications suites allow members to conduct business while traveling.

Such flights are one of Congress' cherished perquisites, providing lawmakers a chance to visit foreign lands at government expense. Official duties are often mixed with sightseeing and fine dining.

But trips to war zones are not junkets. Since the September 11 attacks, the Air Force has flown hundreds of congressional delegations, or "co-dels," to various war theaters. Mrs. Pelosi just completed a fact-finding trip to Afghanistan and Iraq.

Upon her return, she repeated her demand that President Bush not send more troops to Iraq.

GOP To Focus On Home Front (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 1, 2007

When GOP Senators go behind closed doors Friday to plot a unifying strategy for the 110th Congress, they likely will sidestep the one issue occupying most Members' attention: the Iraq War.

Instead, Senate Republicans plan to focus on producing a domestic-heavy agenda, message and game plan for the next two years that positions them to reclaim the Senate majority in 2008. And even though their long-planned retreat lands right in the middle of a Senate debate over Iraq policy, GOP Senators and aides say they are optimistic they will find more togetherness than divisiveness.

"We're fighting an unpopular war with a president [whose approval rating is] in the 30s — so yeah, it's not ideal," acknowledged a well-placed Senate GOP aide. "But our guys are going to have to come together. We have to look for ways we can come together."

Senators will meet at the Library of Congress on Friday to brainstorm over legislative priorities and agree on the makings of a GOP agenda they hope will serve as a strong alternative to the Democrats. Republicans believe that one reason they lost so handily in 2006 is because they lost sight of their defining party principles and didn't effectively lay out their vision to the electorate.

Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) is coordinating the session, which is set to include broad discussions of party principles such as fiscal discipline, national security and personal responsibility. Members also are expected to begin setting their two-year legislative goals on issues such as energy, health care, tax policy, immigration reform and judicial nominations.

Kyl said Wednesday that while Iraq is at the forefront of Senators' minds this week, he doesn't expect it to trump Friday's largely domestic-related retreat. He said Senators have "an agenda to talk about" and will operate under a set time frame for their discussions.

"We can have a healthy debate [on Iraq] and still be together as a Conference on the bulk of the issues," Kyl said.

Kyl said one of the features of the Senate is that there always will be issues on which Members differ, but ultimately Senators respect one another's positions and find ways to work together. Kyl said he didn't know whether the retreat would provide a forum for Senators to come together on Iraq , but he said, "the more we talk with each other, the more likely we are to find common ground and mute our differences."

The backdrop to the retreat, however, is the Senate's ongoing debate over President Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq by 21,500. The proposal has brought some Senate support and scores of critics — including from within the Republican ranks, where several competing nonbinding resolutions criticizing the plan have emerged.

The president's Iraq policy will take an even higher profile next week when Senators take to the floor to formally debate the proposal.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) predicted the topic of Iraq will come up at the Friday meeting, as it has "in all meetings." But he agreed the issue should not become the main focus of the agenda-setting session.

"It's an unusual issue because it is the elephant in the room," Thune said. "On the other hand, we all know Friday is designed to come up with our legislative priorities."

"The timing is what it is," added a senior Republican Senate aide. "But we do have to have a game plan, a blueprint for how we are going to handle this next year."

Republicans say they don't want to waste any time putting together a policy agenda for the year, considering that they must defend 21 GOP-held Senate seats and capture two more to take the majority in 2008.

"Really, there's no better time to chart a course for where we stand on policy," said another senior GOP aide. "For the folks who are up in 2008, we need to show this party's positions on policies that matter to people."

The retreat will span the better part of the day, culminating with a trip by the GOP Senators to the White House for a meeting and reception with President Bush and first lady Laura Bush. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow will make an appearance during the day's events and is expected to talk about GOP communications strategy.

Sen. John Cornyn (Texas), who is leading efforts to rally support among Republicans for Bush's Iraq War plans, acknowledged his party isn't in unison on the proposed surge policy. But he discounted suggestions that Republicans' differences could ultimately hurt them politically.

"We are a diverse party," Cornyn, the GOP Conference vice chairman, said. "People are very independent-minded. That's the way it is."

Cornyn joked, however, that if the president's plan were to succeed, it would be interesting to see how the landscape would shake out, saying: "Success has 1,000 fathers, and failure is an orphan."

Food Safety Makes List Of Flawed Federal Programs (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Government Accountability Office on Wednesday added food safety to its list of critically flawed federal programs, saying that splintered jurisdiction among 15 agencies has left the nation vulnerable to outbreaks of food-borne illness or, worse, a terrorist attack.

Meanwhile, a senior administration official said President Bush would seek an increase of about $11 million for food safety in the fiscal 2008 budget he is scheduled to release Monday. Much of the funding would be aimed at reducing the risk from produce outbreaks, such as the E. coli-contaminated California spinach that caused three deaths and sickened more than 200 last fall.

Consumer and industry groups, however, said the increase would not stop the continued reduction of the Food and Drug Administration's inspection staff. The FDA's budget has not kept pace with the rising cost of federal salaries and benefits, so the agency has had to eliminate hundreds of field inspector jobs, along with scientific and technical positions.

"We are at a critical moment for the nation's food safety," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee. "I could not agree more with GAO's conclusion that we are in need of a fundamental reexamination of our food safety system."

DOJ_NMG_0125450

The GAO, the nonpartisan investigative arm of Congress, said it added food safety to its so-called high-risk list of federal programs because the system is out-of-date, often unscientific and lacks accountability. The list, created in 1990, serves as a kind of tip sheet for Congress, alerting lawmakers and their staffs to problems simmering below the surface of the federal bureaucracy. One agency just off the list: the U.S. Postal Service.

It may be stretching it to refer to a federal food safety "system," a senior GAO official said.

"It is a collection of 15 agencies trying to administer some 30 laws, and that results in inefficient use of resources, inconsistent oversight, and overlap and duplication," said Lisa Shames, director of food and agriculture issues, urging that a solution "be approached system-wide."

The FDA and the Agriculture Department split most of the responsibility for food safety, with the USDA overseeing meat, poultry and processed egg products and the FDA overseeing just about everything else. But each operates under a different set of laws. While the USDA is required to continually inspect slaughterhouses, FDA inspections are infrequent.

Bush administration officials disputed the conclusion that the system is broken, pointing to research from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention showing a decline in the incidence of food-borne illness since the late 1990s. But most of the progress occurred before 2005, the statistics indicate, and the CDC has concluded that further measures are needed.

Each year about 76 million people contract a food-borne illness; most get better on their own, but about 325,000 are hospitalized and 5,000 die.

The senior administration official said the $11 million in new funding would mainly go to the FDA.

It would be used to bolster the ability to trace the source of outbreaks, develop scientifically sound preventive measures, improve computer systems to keep track of imported produce inspections, and for research.

The funding "will strengthen the FDA's ability to respond to possible food-borne outbreaks, and assist industry to mitigate the risk of increased outbreaks, especially those attributed to fresh produce," said the official, who asked not to be identified because the budget had not been officially released.

But consumer and industry groups say much more money is needed — and it's unclear where that will come from in a tight budget.

"This is a huge food supply system, and $11 million doesn't go very far when it's spread across the entire need," said Pat Verduin, chief science officer for the Grocery Manufacturers Assn., the trade group for the food, beverage and consumer products industry. The FDA's entire food safety budget is about $450 million.

Sanchez Accuses Democrat Of Calling Her A 'Whore,' Resigns From Hispanic Group (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 1, 2007

Rep. Loretta Sanchez has quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, accusing the chairman, Rep. Joe Baca, of telling people she's a "whore."

Baca denied the charge.

In an interview with The Politico Wednesday, Sanchez, a California Democrat as is Baca, also cited concerns about whether Baca was properly elected Hispanic Caucus chairman in November and about his general attitude toward female lawmakers. The caucus represents 21 Hispanic Democrats in Congress.

"I'm not going to be a part of the CHC as long as Mr. Baca illegally holds the chair … I told them no. There's a big rift here," Sanchez said. "You treat the women like shit. I have no use for him."

In a statement to The Politico, Baca said Sanchez "has decided to resign from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC), and has chosen to air baseless statements. Let me be clear; her comments are categorically untrue."

The last time lawmakers withdrew from the Hispanic caucus was in the late 1990s when the group's Republican members left over partisan differences.

Sanchez said she had been approached earlier this year to contribute funds from her office budget to support the CHC's shared staff, a requirement for all its members. She refused.

"I told them to take me off the list, take me off the Web site, take me off everything," Sanchez said.

DOJ_NMG_0125451

She said she was surprised and insulted when she learned that Baca had made the disparaging personal comment about her to California Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez and other legislators last year.

Nunez "is a friend of mine. Did he think he wouldn't tell me?" Sanchez asked.

Sanchez voted against Baca in the election for chairman in November. Four other female lawmakers abstained from the vote, raising concerns about whether the election followed proper procedures.

The Sanchez withdrawal is a blow to Baca and his allies who have been trying to bring the caucus back together after a series of internal spats last year. Many of the more junior members and the women have butted heads with him and senior lawmakers.

Last February, six members withdrew from the group's political action committee after Baca and his allies authorized political contributions to family members who were running for state and local offices.

Sanchez was among that group of defectors, which also included her sister, Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., and Democratic Reps. Dennis Cardoza of California, Jim Costa of California, Raul M. Grijalva of Arizona and Hilda L. Solis of California.

In recent weeks, Rep. Xavier Becerra, Calif., a CHC member who serves in House leadership as assistant to the speaker, had been trying to persuade the six members to rejoin the political action committee, which is known as the Committee for Hispanic Causes/Building Our Leadership Diversity. So far, it appears those efforts have not succeeded. An invitation for a PAC fundraiser to be held Wednesday night continues to omit the six.

Earlier this month, four female lawmakers wrote Baca asking that the caucus repeat his election as chairman because the earlier vote failed to use secret ballots, as required in the group's bylaws.

Sanchez and other female CHC members have repeatedly complained that Baca and some of his male colleagues do not accord them a high level of respect.

"There is a big rift. Hello? Do they not get this?" Sanchez said.

What a racist organization....once again...multiculturlizm has reared its ugly head....F the hypen crap...either you are an American or not....look at what is happening in Englandstan right now..and Francestanboo...that's what happens when you let other people's culture to run amok....time to get rid of the Black this, the Hispanic that, Asian this, Anglo this and that...all those crappy labels and just try being AMERICANS!!!!!!!!!!!!!

by El Pasoan on 02.01.2007 at 12:16 AM

Regardless of who is right or wrong on this issue, Sanchez/Baca/the "Hispanic Caucus", what a waste of taxpayer's money. If all Congressmen and Congresswomen, and Senators too, were doing their job without politicizing the issues, they wouldn't need a Hispanic, Black, White, Orange, or Green Caucus. Our government is a big monster that we now have to keep feeding it. Term limits does not sound too bad.

by spacerace on 02.01.2007 at 12:14 AM

Well if the shoe fits..... Loretta's married name is Brixey, Sanchez is her maiden name. Loretta had to change from a Republican and change her last name to win her seat against Bob Dornan. She also has a boatload of non citizens who vote for her and her sister everytime. I have witnesses this every election, but noting is ever done at the OC Registars Office. Congress knows this too, but they say that not enough non citizens are voting to change things. Go ahead Loretta change you name back to Brixey and see if you still get those votes. Oh! Do your remember that Camero that you raffled off for latino votes?

by Billy Boy on 02.01.2007 at 12:01 AM

Simple facts..Bob Dornan was screwed out of his seat. Ms. Sanchez is illigetimate. Racists come in all colors. Try being real Americans instead of hyphenated Americans.

Let the games begin! We knew it was only a matter of time before the misrable and disgusting dems would start to screw up their kingdom. Honestly didn't think it would be this quickly. But then again, look at her... What a sorry excuse for a politician. It is comforting though that she was allowed to count all of the illegals who cast votes in her election... The Republicans let that one slip through the cracks!

by aibo on 01.31.2007 at 11:34 PM

Yo ... Politico forum managers ... can you please stop Tancredo's staff - who knows, maybe the man himself - from logging in under different names to post the same tired message on race caucuses?

Thankfully, we've stopped talking about Loretta and her yet unsubstantiated accusation. Wait, now that I think about it ... keep on spewing ignoramus.

So, not only a racist organization, but also sexist?! Should we be surprised?

by VoiceOfReason on 01.31.2007 at 11:11 PM

To this very day, Glenn, the Democrats favor treating people differently on account of race. The preferred colors have changed, but they still don't get it: skin color doesn't mean squat.

by GlennH on 01.31.2007 at 11:05 PM

Doesnt surprise me one bit that democrats perpetuating racism. They were always against equal rights and for segregation back in the day. Just ask Sen. Robert (KKK) Byrd (D) W.V.

"Get a clue - the reason there are minority group caucuses is because minority groups have a tendency in society, govt, work, to be abused, marginalized, murdered. The constitution protects minority rights from the abuses of the majority, hence the term "minority group" without having any power."

Yeah, that's why the Congressional Black Caucus recently decided to deny admission to Rep. Cohen, right? I mean, he represents a majority-black district, he pledged to seek membership as a campaign promise, surely his constituents have the same interests as Rep. Clay's, don't they?

Or don't they? Come to think of it, why should commonality of skin color imply commonality of interests? Aren't we supposed to be getting past that whole skin-color thing?

by user1234 on 01.31.2007 at 10:51 PM

I think there actually is a "White Christian Male" caucus, its called the majority of the House of Representatives.

This is too funny...how come we haven't heard about this corruption?

by TrueLiberal on 01.31.2007 at 10:41 PM

Wow, democrats acting out as name-calling sexist bores while belonging to racist organizations and using government funds to support family members to latch on the the government teet.

Sanchez and her sister are idiots and they represent their districts very well. If you think I'm being critical, exercise your status as a citizen and observe them during a hearing. You wouldn't pay anyone to provide that type of service for you at a Hospital, Police Department, et al...

by rdcrisp on 01.31.2007 at 10:20 PM

Why is there a hispanic caucus or for that matter a black caucus? If membership eligibility is in any way tied to the race of the member then it is nothing more than a racist organization.

It surprises me to see democrats perpetuating racism, particularly among our lawmakers.

I'd like to either see these cauci abolished with prejudice or I'd like to see a congressional white caucus formed. What: that would be racist? Yes, that's exactly the point; they are all racist organizations and have no place in a "color blind" society.

Loretta Sanchez did the right thing to resign but for the wrong reason.

by Dave in Sacramento on 01.31.2007 at 10:09 PM

Baca's right. She is a whore.

by Gabriel on 01.31.2007 at 10:03 PM

I'm with Loretta. As far as I'm concerned SHE represents the interests of este Latino, not Mr. Baca.

by twaccb on 01.31.2007 at 09:59 PM

Loretta Sanchez really has incredible nerve, asking if someone was "properly elected" or not. Why don't we call in Bob Dornan to referee?

As far as the other charge is concerned, is it possible to act like a thing without becoming that thing?

Sen. Barack Obama Tries To Flesh Out His Record With An Election-fraud Bill (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 1, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) yesterday added election fraud to the spectrum of weighty issues he has covered since informally launching his presidential bid, further fleshing out a legislative record that could be an inviting target in the intensifying 2008 campaign.

Obama sought to stay focused on his bill criminalizing voter suppression and deceptive electoral tactics, his third momentum-building effort in two weeks, even as the Republican National Committee drove a wedge through the Democratic field by circulating critical comments made by Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) about his fellow White House hopefuls.

“I don’t spend too much time worrying about what folks talk about during campaign season,” Obama said yesterday.

Yet he has embraced several politically charged debates this winter, signaling his readiness to compete in the media glare of the primary trail and his ability to project presidential gravitas while displaying Democratic bona fides.

Yesterday’s voter-deception bill, which would allow injunctive relief for individuals targeted by fraudulent flyers and automated phone calls during the run-up to Election Day, earned plaudits from civil-rights groups and the co-sponsorship of Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), the Democratic Caucus’s No. 3 and a backer of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) in 2008.

Obama acknowledged the greater megaphone he commands as a presidential contender, observing that the Democrats’ new majority status also allows him to expand his legislative reach with some confidence of floor time and success.

Having openly declared for 2008 makes “you guys [in the media] pay more attention to what we’re dropping,” Obama said, “but it’s gratifying that we can pay attention to critical issues.”

Obama weighed in late Tuesday with an Iraq measure that would require a start to troop withdrawal by May and an end to the process by March 31, 2008 — mere weeks after the presidential showdown of the “Super Tuesday” primaries. That hard date for drawdown goes a step beyond Clinton's rhetoric on the war, while matching one of her goals by allowing for troops to move out of Iraq and into Afghanistan.

Obama's Iraq bill is an outgrowth of his November speech at the Chicago Council on Global Affairs, where he called for a timetable to begin pulling out troops but stressed that flexibility to suspend redeployment would be crucial if Congress and the Iraqi government certified that a U.S. presence was still needed. Obama's opening for postponement of troop withdrawal did not stop liberal stalwarts from hailing his bill yesterday.

"His proposal to set a deadline for withdrawal is an important distinction from other proposals that include an open-ended commitment," Tom Mattzie, political director of MoveOn.org, said in a statement. "Without a deadline, it is hard to get out of Iraq."

Civil-rights lions at the People for the American Way (PFAW), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights (LCCR) also marshaled behind Obama's election-fraud remedy. PFAW will partner with Obama for a voter-suppression event next week, and LCCR executive director Barbara Anwine was glowing in her praise for Obama.

"There are a thousand issues he could highlight, but to really hammer this one will make it at the forefront of the presidential debate," said Anwine, whose passionate call for an end to intimidation tactics that target minority voters earned an "amen" from Obama.

One source close to the Obama campaign said the senator's full plate, topped by Senate testimony Tuesday on global warming, shows voters what is important to him.

"There's an old saying in Chicago politics: Good policy is good politics," the source said.

House Democrats have responded in their own way to Obama's candidacy. Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) has agreed to serve as a House liaison for Obama, said Brian Herman, her communications director. That role could cover formal events, such as fundraisers and meetings with House Democrats, or focus largely on private outreach.

Another natural House emissary is Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), a close ally of House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) who applauded Obama's exploratory rollout Jan. 16 with a promise to join the effort. Both Bean and Davis are leaders in the centrist wing of their caucus, which one House Democratic aide said would be invaluable to Obama.

"[Bean] has a great deal of credibility when it comes to certain issues, in terms of knowing what will appeal to the center, and independents in particular," the aide said.

An Illinoisan with strong liberal credentials, Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D), said she is planning a social event in the coming days to introduce Obama to House Democrats whom he may not yet know personally. Schakowsky, who has a large in-state grassroots network, said she wants the gathering to be free of pressure to make a formal endorsement.

"The highlight of the invitation is going to be, 'Meet Barack Obama,'" said Schakowsky, who will co-host with Rep. Jerry Costello (D-Ill.), another longtime Obama supporter. "There may be some people from New York, for example, who have commitments but who would like to get a sense of what he is about."

Obama's busy week, which began with a speech last Thursday calling for universal healthcare by 2012, ended yesterday with a phone call from Biden apologizing if his comments, printed in the New York Observer, came across as disparaging.

"I mean, you got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Biden was quoted as saying. "I mean, that's a storybook, man."

Obama replied to Biden that there was no need for contrition, Biden told reporters on an afternoon conference call.

Yet Obama will have to determine eventually whether to directly or subtly parry skeptical questions about his legislative experience, such as Biden's judging him "a one-term" in the Observer this week or Dick Morris's false charge in December that Obama "has never introduced a bill."

Obama served as lead sponsor on 66 bills and 86 amendments during the 109th Congress, according to the Library of Congress.

Senators Ask FDA To Keep Regional Labs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125455

The Food and Drug Administration should suspend plans to close as many as nine of 13 laboratories that test the safety and effectiveness of food, drugs, cosmetics and medical equipment, a bipartisan group of senators said this week.

The network of labs, run by the agency's Office of Regulatory Affairs, "could prove particularly vital in rapidly responding to public health crises" during national emergencies, the lawmakers wrote Tuesday to FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach.

Any proposed consolidation plan should be reviewed by Congress, wrote the lawmakers, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

"We recognize that FDA faces serious budget constraints that force difficult choices, but it is far from clear that consolidating ORA labs is a reasonable response to these difficult constraints," they wrote.

The 13 labs are in or near Atlanta, Boston, Cincinnati, Denver, Detroit, Kansas City, Little Rock, Los Angeles, New York City, Philadelphia, San Francisco, San Juan and Seattle. The consolidation plan was first disclosed in December by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, a nonprofit advocacy group that obtained a Dec. 6 internal e-mail by Margaret Glavin, associate commissioner for regulatory affairs, that mentioned the FDA's plans.

The FDA has not made public which labs it intends to shutter. Jeff Ruch, executive director of the advocacy group, said FDA employees have told his organization that the Cincinnati, Denver, Detroit, Kansas City, Philadelphia, San Francisco and Seattle labs have been mentioned as candidates for closure.

Among the duties of such labs is investigating food-borne illness such as the recent outbreaks of E. coli in lettuce and spinach. Ruch said closing labs would be a mistake at a time of heightened fears that terrorists may try to tamper with drugs or the food supply.

"You compromise capability when you have laboratories removed from the areas of need, such as large food-distribution centers or ports of entry," he said.

FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza said the agency would respond to the lawmakers' letter soon.

"FDA needs to make important changes to meet the new challenges we face," she said. "We are very much aware that our field operations are essential to ensuring public safety and to preserving public confidence. As we continue our efforts to optimize the effectiveness of our field force, we remain committed to public safety and to maintaining a state of readiness for potential emergencies."

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which represents 600 of the lab workers, said the consolidation plan was "shortsighted" because many lab scientists would leave federal service rather than relocate.

"They would lose all that expertise and then have to rebuild it," said Kelley, whose union met with FDA officials in November. "The FDA has never made any kind of a business case that this consolidation would lead to better protection for the public and of public health. . . . They just said 'consolidation,' which is code for budget. They think if they have fewer labs they'd save money."

The FDA told the union it planned to close an undetermined number of the labs by April, she said.

Members' Legal Bills Continued To Mount In '06 (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, February 1, 2007

As 2006 came to a close, lawyers' bills continued to pile high for a half-dozen or more House Members widely named in ongoing criminal investigations.

Year-end fundraising reports, which were due to be filed with the Federal Election Commission by Wednesday, showed that at least five Members previously cited as subjects of investigations wrote checks or listed debts to firms with substantial criminal defense practices worth a combined total of more than $200,000 from Nov. 28 to Dec. 31.

That's in addition to ex-Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who received the FEC's blessing last week to use leftover campaign cash to fend off Justice Department scrutiny.

The campaign of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who currently is under investigation by federal law enforcement for allegedly inappropriate contact with Congressional pages, paid the Washington, D.C.-based law firm of Zuckerman Spaeder nearly $50,000 in mid-December. According to the firm's Web site, its lawyers specialize in cases "where the government is adversarial to our clients."

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), who was banished from the ethics panel in 2006 amid a federal probe into earmarks he steered to his home state, doled out $70,000 during the reporting period to Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, an area law firm specializing in white-collar criminal defense. Mollohan reported that he owes the same firm another $20,000.

In late October 2006, media reports indicated the U.S. attorney's office was looking into Rep. Rick Renzi's (R-Ariz.) alleged involvement in an illegal property swap and declined to comment. At the time, Renzi declined comment and directed reporters to his attorney, Grant Woods.

On Dec. 6, Renzi's campaign wrote a check to Woods for $10,000.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, an international firm with offices in Washington, D.C., Los Angeles and San Francisco, received about $75,000 in December from two prominent House Members: California Reps. Jane Harman (D) and Jerry Lewis (R). Harman, whose office declined comment for this story, paid the firm $25,000 on Dec. 11. About six weeks earlier, Time magazine reported that Harman allegedly asked a lobbyist for help in securing the top spot on the House Intelligence panel.

As previously reported in Roll Call, Lewis had paid Gibson Dunn the bulk of $820,000 in legal bills he accrued during in a four-month period last year. Lewis's disclosure late Wednesday now brings his total legal spending for the year to roughly $870,000.

Although some lawmakers start digging into their campaign coffers after investigators arrive on the scene, the largest year-end legal payment — more than $115,000 — was paid to a law firm by Rep. Michael Turner (R-Ohio) to dig up dirt on himself, just to make sure no legal questions went unanswered in an election year when Republicans nationwide were dogged by claims of ethics lapses.

"We worked to ensure that his opponents could not distort or misrepresent his nearly two-decade record of public service," said spokesman Andy Bloom.

As an FEC decision confirmed last week, Senators and House Members may raid their campaign war chests to pay legal fees when the feds come snooping, so long as it's somehow tied to their official duties. Agency lawyers have argued in the past that it is OK to use excess campaign funds, provided that "legal expenses are for ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in connection with duties of the individual as a holder of federal office."

"Members of Congress can use their campaign funds that are associated with their campaign activities, as well as their duties as office holders," said Michael Toner, a Republican-nominated FEC commissioner. "However, the FEC does require that their be a clear nexis between the legal expense and the Members' campaign or office-holder activities."

The Aide Who Wrote The Question (POL)

By Christian Lowe

The Politico, February 1, 2007

Daniel J. Cox Jr. doesn't look like a troublemaker, but the Senate Armed Services Committee aide knows how to stir things up.

The committee's principal staff member for Iraq issues, Cox ignited a firestorm when he fed his boss a simple but profound question to ask Gen. Eric Shinseki, the former Army chief of staff, at a 2003 pre-Iraq war hearing.

"General Shinseki," asked Sen. Carl Levin, Mich., then senior Democrat on the panel, "could you give us some idea as to the magnitude of the Army's force requirement for an occupation of Iraq following a successful completion of the war?"

Shinseki's candid answer -- that it would take "several hundred thousand soldiers" to pacify Iraq -- still reverberates.

It became powerful ammunition for those who see the U.S. occupation as a tableau of preventable blunders. It stoked criticism that the Bush administration low-balled Iraq war needs. And, many believe, it eventually cost Shinseki his job, particularly since his assessment was so publicly dismissed by the Bush administration.

"That was a question I wrote for Levin," said Cox, a 28-year Army veteran, who acknowledged in an interview that it was probably the best -- and most famous -- question he had ever recommended to Levin, who now chairs the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0125457

The incident marked a turning point in Cox's career, catapulting him into the center of one of the most controversial conflicts in U.S. history. An unassuming career armor officer and former helicopter pilot, Cox had patiently worked behind the scenes in the committee's Democratic office since joining the staff in 1997.

Cox said he provides professional insight and a "muddy-boots perspective" on billion-dollar weapons and military policy.

"I've always been interested in coming to Capitol Hill. To me it was the more interesting, more fascinating of the branches of government," Cox said. "The role that it plays in oversight of the executive branch and the checks and balances of the constitutional system was fascinating."

With his experience as a senior Army trainer during Operation Desert Storm, as a West Point professor and as a United Nations peacekeeper in Sarajevo, Cox seemed the perfect choice to become one of Levin's most trusted advisers when the Bush administration was gearing up for a war to topple Saddam Hussein in late 2002.

Throughout the run-up to the Iraq war, the budget and policy battles during the invasion, and the domestic political brawls that have punctuated the violent occupation, Cox has helped his boss shape the debate over a war that Cox feels has tarnished America's image. Though he previously leaned Republican, Cox said the Iraq war soured his view of the GOP and left him frustrated with an administration that he believes "has flat out failed."

"Our position in the world is a lot less than it was before," Cox said. "I think the last six years have damaged our relations with the rest of the world ... At least in my lifetime, I do not think it is going to recover fully."

Now Cox plays a key role in strengthening the intellectual underpinnings of Levin's Iraq strategy, in which he calls for the withdrawal of U.S. troops within months to demonstrate to the Iraqi government that the United States will not remain there indefinitely. Cox also believes that President Bush's troop "surge" won't do much good. And he is worried that the burden of the "war on terrorism" falls disproportionately on the small segment of the population that makes up the volunteer military.

"This country is not mobilized like it could be," Cox said. "There's a lot of the U.S. population that doesn't even know we're at war and doesn't even care."

When he's not working on Iraq issues, Cox focuses on the ground equipment needs of the Army and the Marine Corps, dealing with budget requests and program oversight, and assists the Airland Subcommittee chairman, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, I-Conn.

Bruce Hock, a Republican aide who has worked with Cox on Army and Iraq issues for five years, described his counterpart as fiercely protective of soldiers and Marines, particularly in making certain they are well equipped.

But the two have had major differences over the administration's Iraq policy. "When you're on the opposite side, there's a little bit of a distrust there," Hock said.

Soon, Cox will have to shift his focus from the high-profile Iraq hearings to the Pentagon budget, which will likely result in more contentious hearings.

Though he's an avid downhill skier who likes to take at least one trip to the Rocky Mountains each year, the committee schedule may keep Cox from his favorite slopes.

"There's no doubt in my mind that Levin will do everything he possibly can to take a bipartisan approach" to military issues, Cox said. "There will be differences, and they will be debated. But they will be heartfelt debates."

Senate Chaplain Nixes Appearance (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, February 1, 2007

Senate Chaplain Barry Black informed Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) Wednesday that he was canceling a planned appearance at a religious conference set for next month after a left-leaning civil liberties organization urged him to pull out due to the organizer's controversial political and religious beliefs, a spokesman said Wednesday.

According to the chaplain's spokeswoman, Meg Saunders, Reclaim America originally invited Black to attend in the fall of 2005 and billed the conference as a generic religious meeting. Saunders explained that Black, who attends a number of conferences each year, agreed to participate because it would not conflict with the traditional nonpartisan, nonsectarian role of the Senate chaplain.

DOJ_NMG_0125458

But following a review of the group's Web site Wednesday, Black determined it was, in fact, both a political and highly sectarian event and quickly informed the organization and Senate leaders that he was not attending.

"He was not happy, particularly in light of the fact that in the beginning ... we were not given the full information," Saunders said, explaining that the original invitation was "very vanilla."

A spokesman for Reclaim America declined to comment.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State Executive Director Barry Lynn, who first questioned Black's decision to attend the Reclaiming America for Christ event in a letter to Black delivered Wednesday, praised the chaplain's speedy decision. "I'm delighted that he's made this decision," Lynn said, adding that "[Black's] office is uniquely designed to provide spiritual guidance across the board" to the Senate community and that Reclaim America is "about as contentious and controversial and extreme as you can get."

Founded by Dr. D. James Kennedy, Reclaim America is an offshoot of Coral Ridge Ministries, one of the largest evangelical organizations in the United States.

According to the group's Web site, which at press time still listed Black as a speaker, the bulk of the speakers are luminaries of the conservative Christian movement, including author Ann Coulter, anti-abortion activist and Catholic priest Frank Pavone, Focus on the Family's Tony Perkins and Eagle Forum Founder Phyllis Schlafly, among others.

Topics to be discussed at the two-day conference include "making America safe for the unborn," "America's Christian moral heritage," "Reclaiming America through evangelism," "How to recruit and mobilize your pastor and church," "Communicating with grassroots" and "Islam and 'future Jihad,'" according to the site.

A brochure for the event extols Christians to attend by warning that "the only thing evil requires for its triumph is for Christians to say and do nothing. ... Once-silent Christians are standing up, speaking out, and rolling up their sleeves to get involved in the civic life of the nation," and describes the conference as a way to become "informed and equipped in the campaign to return America to her godly heritage."

Kennedy's flagship organization, Coral Ridge Ministries, has long been at the center of the so-called culture wars. For instance, the organization last year produced a video that claimed to show proof that Darwin's theory of evolution was responsible for the rise of Adolph Hitler and the Holocaust.

In his letter to Black, Lynn notes that "the Senate chaplain's job is to provide a variety of religious services that recognize the broad diversity of faith in America. Dr. Kennedy's ministry does not recognize or value this diversity. Rather, he argues that certain types of Christians — those who agree with his interpretation of the Bible — are the rightful owners of the country and that the nation must be 'reclaimed.'"

Saunders said that Black was upset that conference organizers had not "revealed" the intent behind the event in their original invitation and said he has been very careful during his tenure as Chaplain to be involved in anything that even hints at partisanship or sectarianism.

After reading the Web site, Black quickly decided to reject the invitation, Saunders added, explaining that because of the "political nature of the [conference], it definitely would jeopardize his standing in the Senate community."

HUD, Postal Service Shed 'High Risk' Label (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

They are the ugly ducklings of the government -- programs so vulnerable to waste, fraud and mismanagement that they are dubbed "high risk" by the Government Accountability Office.

But transformation, as in the Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale, can happen.

Yesterday, the GAO announced that two large agencies, the Housing and Urban Development Department and the U.S. Postal Service, had shed their troublesome feathers.

For the first time in 13 years, no HUD program appears on the GAO risk list, which David M. Walker, the head of the GAO, called a "historic achievement."

DOJ_NMG_0125459

HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson said the announcement reflects the progress that HUD has made "to ensure taxpayer dollars are spent wisely and well."

For much of the 1980s, HUD was buffeted by allegations of corruption and influence-peddling that often masked systemic problems caused by poor financial management, inadequate record-keeping and staff shortages.

HUD worked through its problems, and, by 2001, had only two programs left on the GAO list -- single-family-housing mortgage insurance and rental-housing assistance. The GAO said the department has significantly improved its oversight of lenders, appraisers and property management contractors and does a better job of estimating subsidy costs and defaults by borrowers. Walker noted that HUD had cut the amount of improper rent subsidies by 58 percent between 2000 and 2005.

The GAO put the Postal Service on the high-risk list in 2001 because of a bleak financial outlook that included cash-flow problems and heavy debt. But the post office has increased employee productivity while reducing staff -- and saved $5 billion since 2001, the GAO said. A new law, the GAO said, will help the Postal Service address pension and retiree health-care liabilities and should create a more predictable process for setting mail rates for magazine, catalogue, credit card and other companies.

"It's a great day," Postmaster General John E. Potter said. "Going forward, it is incumbent upon us to continue to provide high levels of service" and "make sure every dollar we spend is a dollar that we need to spend."

Still, as a Capitol Hill briefing made clear yesterday, too many ugly ducks in government remain on the high-risk list, which is updated every two years. Even as Walker took HUD and the Postal Service off the list, he added three problem areas, for a total of 27.

The new risk areas are:

Â· Federal oversight of food safety. Fifteen agencies administer at least 30 food-safety laws, and the patchwork nature of such oversight calls into question how the government inspects and responds to outbreaks of contaminated food, the GAO said.

Â· Financing the nation's transportation system. Revenue to support the highway and aviation trust funds are eroding as investment is needed to relieve congestion and keep up with increasing passenger and freight travel, the GAO said.

Â· Protecting technology critical to national security. High-tech weapons and products are targets for theft, espionage and illegal export, and the threats facing the nation have been redefined since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Multiple agencies oversee the transfer and sale of critical technologies for use overseas but often fail to coordinate on security issues, the GAO said.

Walker was joined at the briefing by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and three other senior committee members, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine), Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) and George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio). Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the ranking minority committee member, also spoke.

They pointed out that too many programs at the Defense and Homeland Security departments remain on the GAO list. "The first responsibility of our government is to protect the security of our people. It is just unacceptable that so many items on this high-risk list reflect mismanagement in the pursuit of that top priority," Lieberman said.

He said he was especially disappointed that the entire Department of Homeland Security continues to be considered high risk and planned to explore this with Secretary Michael Chertoff at a Feb. 13 hearing.

Lieberman, Collins and Waxman said they were troubled by wasteful practices in federal contracting highlighted by the GAO list. Waxman has scheduled a hearing on contract mismanagement at Homeland Security next week, and Collins said she is drafting legislation to address waste in government contracting, including Iraq war and reconstruction contract problems.

The GAO has posted "High-Risk Series: An Update," on its Web site,http://www.gao.gov. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Don't Kill The Golden Goose (USAT)

By Todd Stottlemyer

USA Today, February 1, 2007

If you ask them, you'll learn that most entrepreneurs hold dear a fundamental, philosophical belief in the power of the free market, and that government shouldn't interfere by artificially setting wages or prices.

DOJ_NMG_0125460

Small-business owners also recognize that increasing the minimum wage has real, proven impact on every facet of the economy, including lost jobs. And no group has consistently demonstrated that it can create jobs better than small business can.

Unlike many large businesses, most small businesses operate on razor-thin profit margins. The proposed increase of $2.10 in the minimum wage is a 40% hike over the current $5.15. All small businesses operate in a highly competitive, global marketplace and can ill-afford to raise prices on their customers by 40% and stay competitive.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., and ranking member Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, recognize that the bill passed by the House of Representatives fails to address the very real implications for small businesses of a 40% minimum-wage hike. It simply does not reflect the economic realities faced by these entrepreneurs.

That's why members of the Senate Finance Committee worked together in true bipartisan fashion to craft a package of proven ways to lessen the impact of a minimum-wage increase on small businesses. These proposals provide an incentive for small-business owners to invest in the growth of their business, to create more jobs and further strengthen our economy.

The committee vote was a unanimous, bipartisan endorsement of an approach that recognizes the need to link legislatively what we already know economically — government-mandated wage increases have consequences. The Senate bill is fair. It is balanced. The full Senate should pass it, and the House should follow its example.

Todd Stottlemyer is president and CEO of the National Federation of Independent Business, the nation's leading small-business advocacy group.

Poorest Americans Have Waited Too Long For A Raise (USAT)

USA Today, February 1, 2007

Voters who thought Democrats were now the unchallenged masters of Capitol Hill got a quick reality check this week as the Senate lurched toward the end of a debate on the minimum wage.

In the House, the Democrats had the political muscle to pass a long overdue increase in the minimum wage, which has been stuck at $5.15 an hour for a decade and is now badly eroded by inflation.

In the Senate, though, the Democrats' margin is too narrow to overcome a filibuster by Republicans determined to hold the minimum wage hostage to tax cuts.

Today the Senate is expected to approve a hybrid bill that raises the minimum wage at last — but ties it to an $8.3 billion package of unnecessary tax cuts for small business.

The aggressive tax-cutting that the GOP-led Congress indulged in over the last decade without matching spending cuts has already weakened the Treasury and enriched many who needed little enriching. Last year, GOP leaders tried unsuccessfully to tie a minimum wage increase to cuts in the estate tax, which affects a tiny sliver of the wealthiest Americans.

That was outrageous, but what the newly Democratic Senate is doing is only slightly less unseemly. In the same decade that the poorest working Americans have gone without a raise in the minimum wage, Congress approved an estimated $312 billion in business tax cuts, a substantial chunk of which were for small businesses. The argument that they need more relief now is weak.

Further, while some of the Senate's tax provisions are directed at restaurants and other small businesses that might hire minimum-wage workers, there's little attempt to target tax cuts to those who pay the lowest wages. And — shocking! — some of the tax cuts seem to have little or nothing to do with the minimum wage: capital gains tax treatment for S corporations, tax treatment of bank directors' stock, and so on.

The increase in the minimum wage is already designed to go lightly on businesses that would have to pay it. It would raise the minimum from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 in three 70-cent steps over two years — plenty of time to adjust. Minimum wage workers — at least 5 million by some counts — wouldn't get the full raise until the spring of 2009.

The arguments against the minimum wage are familiar and unpersuasive. Critics argue that it will cost jobs, but the economic literature suggests job losses are a minimal threat. The last increase in 1997 was followed by a surge in low-wage employment.

Some opponents argue that wages should be decided exclusively by the free market.

DOJ_NMG_0125461

But the nation decided otherwise in 1938, when Congress created the minimum wage so the poorest workers would have a chance at a decent living. And it's hard to recall similar free-market complaints about the tax code, which is all about picking winners and losers — homeowners over renters, for example, or investors over workers.

As is usual when there's paralysis at the federal level, states have moved ahead on their own, and more than half now have minimums higher than the federal level — including six whose voters approved the hikes in ballot measures last November.

It's long past time for Congress to do the same and to do it without wasteful tax benefits for the unneedy.

Eventually, the House and Senate will have to agree on a final bill. Democrats, along with the five Republican senators and 82 GOP representatives who voted for a clean wage increase — should hold their ground.

Deficit Day Of Reckoning? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Next Monday is the real day of reckoning for President Bush and this new Democratic Congress. That is the day the president sends his budget for next year up to Capitol Hill, and you really will be able to judge by the reaction what will happen in Washington in the next nine months.

Last year, when the budget came out, Democrats hooted in skepticism and many conservative Republicans expressed dismay at the size of the projected deficits. In the end, the House and Senate could not agree on a budget resolution, and the government went on autopilot in terms of domestic spending, continuing at the same level as the year before.

This year, as I learned from conversations with two senior White House officials last week, the president hopes his budget will become a starting point for serious negotiation -- not a partisan football or simple laughingstock.

That hope was encouraged by a letter to the president last week from the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, Rep. Nancy Pelosi and Sen. Harry M. Reid, and the chairmen of the two budget committees, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. and Sen. Kent Conrad.

The first sentence said, "We are writing to express our strong interest in working cooperatively with you to address our nation's fiscal challenges." It acknowledged that as the process unfolds, "Democrats and Republicans will disagree about particular priorities, and we will need to negotiate our differences in deciding how to allocate scarce resources."

But it put forward four principles that could lead to a successful budget outcome this year.

? "The budget should account realistically for projected federal costs," including the billions needed for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the adjustments needed in the alternative minimum tax, which otherwise would punish millions of middle-class families.

? "The budget should realistically project short- and long-term deficits," as objectively as the calculations of the Congressional Budget Office, which show the prospect of very large deficits if current tax and spending policies are unchanged.

? "The budget should provide detail throughout the entire budget period," making clear the hard choices that lie ahead.

? "The budget should be based on fiscal discipline that is sustained over the long term," underlining the fact that it will take years of effort to repair the damage done to our fiscal condition in the past six years.

The House took an important first step in repairing our fiscal health last month by reimposing the "pay-go" rule, requiring any increase in entitlements or tax relief to be balanced with tax increases or spending cuts.

While not endorsing these specific principles, the White House officials with whom I met certainly pledged to make visible the costs of the war and to be specific about the trade-offs needed to maintain budget discipline, both in the short term and the long term.

They said that the economic assumptions underlying the president's budget are modest -- if anything, an underestimate of the revenue likely to be produced by a growing economy. And the officials indicated that the president will recommend that, for a second year in a row, overall growth in discretionary domestic spending -- the part separate from Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security -- be held close to zero.

If Monday's budget fulfills those promises, the stage could be set for a serious effort to put the federal fiscal house in order.

DOJ_NMG_0125462

But the warning voiced in an interview by Rep. David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, must be borne in mind. Obey recalled that when the late Rep. Richard Bolling of Missouri invented the congressional budget process, he said, "It will work only if all the key players -- in Congress and the administration -- use honest figures and make a genuine effort to live within its discipline. Otherwise, the budget process will become a barrier to action."

If the congressional budget process breaks down, two Republicans, Rep. Frank R. Wolf of Virginia and Sen. George V. Voinovich of Ohio, have proposed a commission of legislators and experts to tackle the long-term budget challenges and bring back a plan that Congress would have to vote up or down, or substitute an equally effective blueprint.

One way or the other, this problem must be faced. Monday's budget message could be the first step.

Indefinitely Grounded (NYT)

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Travelers and airlines have a deal. In exchange for transporting them safely, passengers agree to give up a great deal of freedom of movement. Once aboard a plane, there's no getting off until the crew says so. People have to sit when they're told, buckle up and raise their seatbacks on command. In return, passengers expect the airlines to take care of them.

But several high-profile failures this past holiday travel season suggest that Congress needs to intervene and set some ground rules to enforce this deal for people unreasonably stranded on aircraft. Delays at the gate are a hassle, but extraordinary delays on planes can be dangerous for the handicapped, chronically ill, elderly or small children.

Take the passengers of American Airlines Flight 1348, whose flight from San Francisco to Dallas was diverted by bad weather to Austin, Tex. Obviously, weather is out of human control, and airlines rightly err on the side of safety rather than haste when it comes to bad weather or mechanical difficulties. Flying, particularly around the holidays, invariably entails a risk of delay.

But there is delay, and then there is detention. The passengers on Flight 1348 were trapped on the plane after it landed for another eight hours. They say there was nothing to eat but a box of pretzels, and the toilets began to stink. Passengers say they overflowed. The airline says they didn't. The difference is not worth debating.

Passengers from that flight have revived the idea of a Passengers' Bill of Rights, posting their ideas at www.strandedpassengers.blogspot.com. Among the common-sense notions are procedures to get passengers back to a gate when a plane has been sitting on the tarmac for more than three hours. When delays are that long, passengers' essential needs — food, water, medical attention and sanitation — must be met. These proposals are a good starting point for eventual legislation.

Following a similar incident in 1999, the airlines managed to avoid this sort of law through a voluntary customer service commitment. Congress should hold hearings to revisit their promises — and replace them with some requirements.

Judge Halts Holocaust Hearing After Objections To Settlement (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

A federal judge abruptly adjourned a hearing yesterday on the settlement of a dispute over unpaid life insurance policies of Holocaust victims after a Miami lawyer and a survivor of a Nazi concentration camp raised objections.

Judge George B. Daniels of Federal District Court in Manhattan gave no explanation for ending the session that he had convened to determine the fairness of a settlement in which an Italian insurance company agreed to provide several million dollars to Holocaust victims. The company, Assicurazioni Generali, has repeatedly denied allegations that it systematically refused to pay billions of dollars in claims on insurance policies of Holocaust victims.

Lawyers for Generali and others who worked on the settlement said Judge Daniels called them into his chambers during a brief recess to express new concerns. They would not say what was discussed, but said he asked them to try to resolve the concerns over the next week.

DOJ_NMG_0125463

One lawyer for the Holocaust survivors, Robert A. Swift, said Judge Daniels asked him and the others "to renegotiate one provision in the settlement."

Earlier, Sam J. Dubbin, a Miami lawyer opposing the settlement, had argued that it would prevent tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors from ever knowing whether they were owed money by Generali.

Mr. Dubbin said the insurance company reported paying more than 5,000 claims. But he said that left 105,000 Holocaust-era policies on the lives of Jews unaccounted for.

"History requires a much more thorough examination of the company's conduct," he said.

Both Mr. Swift and Marco E. Schnabl, a lawyer for Generali, disputed Mr. Dubbin's calculations.

Mr. Dubbin told the court that steps were being taken to open long-sealed German warehouses filled with documents that might shed light on the dispute, and he urged Judge Daniels to postpone a decision for up to six months.

The courtroom in Lower Manhattan was crowded with Holocaust survivors and relatives who had hoped to speak against the settlement. But Judge Daniels said he wanted to hear only from the lawyers.

Even so, Alice Burger Fischer, who was imprisoned at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp as a teenager, rose to say that she had learned about the proposed settlement only on Tuesday despite efforts by Generali to publicize it.

"I don't understand anything about the settlement," she said. Her father bought a Generali policy that has been in dispute for decades. She said he died as he was being marched from a concentration camp.

Democrats Want To Rise With The Middle Class (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Meet Joe and Eileen Bailey, a politically independent couple from Long Island with three kids in public school, mounting financial anxieties and a flock of Democratic lawmakers clamoring to feel their pain.

The Baileys are fictional -- the creation of Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who used the family's worries to help Democrats chart a course to victory in last year's election and claim control of the Senate. Now Schumer wants to transform a sleepy congressional committee into a high-profile platform for examining the troubles of real people like the Baileys. His goal: to come up with a cure for middle-class angst that will carry Democrats into the White House.

"We have big plans," said Schumer, who is betting that economic insecurity will replace the Iraq war as the most important issue in the 2008 elections. "The party that can create a model paradigm, a platform that can answer some of these questions, will not only win in 2008 but could create a long-term majority."

As the third-ranking Democrat in the Senate, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the author of a new book on the middle class, Schumer is emerging as a key figure in that effort. But he is hardly alone.

Yesterday, as Schumer convened his first hearing as chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, two House panels were also taking testimony on the travails of the middle class. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) did the same two weeks ago in the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. And economists, academics and think tanks -- not to mention presidential candidates -- are grappling with the problem.

What, exactly, is the problem?

In testimony yesterday, there were almost as many answers as experts. But they cited some common themes, ranging from stagnant wages to rising costs for college and health care.

As President Bush traveled to New York to tout a robust economy with a low jobless rate, low interest rates and low inflation, "this is not what's generally felt out there in America," said Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which yesterday wrapped up a four-part inquiry into economic conditions with a hearing on "economic challenges of the middle class."

"To me, even though you got more compassion for the poor, you've got to pay attention to the middle class. Because they vote," Rangel said. And right now, "the middle class are scared to death they could become poor."

By any measure, the middle class is not becoming poor. But it has stopped getting ahead quite so rapidly. Over the 15 years ending in 2004, median household net worth grew by 35 percent in the United States, with all income groups showing increases, according to a recent report by the Council on Competitiveness.

But wages in the vast majority of households rose by less than 15 percent when adjusted for inflation, while the top 20 percent had increases twice that large in the 20-year period ending in 2005. For the top 5 percent of earners, the report shows wages jumped by nearly 50 percent, as their average annual salary rose to $281,155.

Rising inequality -- the growing gap between the rich and everyone else -- is often cited as a primary cause of middle-class angst. Republicans yesterday disputed the notion that income inequality has widened during President Bush's years in office, citing Census statistics that show it has been relatively static since 2001.

In testimony before the Joint Economic Committee, Richard Vedder, a visiting scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, argued that income, at any rate, is the wrong measure. Spending is far more important to economic well-being, Vedder said, and "we know that, in any given year, consumer spending is far more equally distributed than income."

That view met with skepticism from other witnesses, who included two former Clinton administration Treasury secretaries, Robert E. Rubin and Lawrence H. Summers, and Princeton University economist Alan S. Blinder, a former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. All are involved with the Hamilton Project, an initiative at the Brookings Institution that aims to rebuild the social safety net without interfering with international trade and the free market.

"The basic story is very clear," Blinder said. "Inequality was mostly falling for 30 or 35 years or so until the late 1970s and has been mostly rising since then." He offered a vivid example: In 1979, the average taxpayer in the top one-tenth of 1 percent earned about as much as 44 average taxpayers in the bottom half. In 2001, the rich taxpayer earned as much as nearly 160 less affluent people.

So far, Democrats have offered a modest agenda for economically challenged families, pushing bills to raise the federal minimum wage, slash interest rates on college loans and reduce the price of prescription drugs for Medicare recipients.

Schumer and others are pushing for a broader response. In his book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle Class Majority One Family at a Time," Schumer acknowledges that he does not know "the eight words that will save the Democratic party." The book proposes to help the fictional Baileys by pursuing such goals as higher federal funding for public schools, a $15,000 tax deduction for college tuition and reduced dependence on foreign oil.

As chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, Schumer plans to look for ways to help Americans become more flexible in their work lives, in part by making it less traumatic to change jobs. Witnesses yesterday proposed making health insurance and pensions more portable, and more closely targeting job retraining programs. Summers also urged the committee to consider "wage insurance that would enable increasingly inevitable economic mobility to take place without significant and painful dislocation."

As for trade, Schumer said in an interview that, "deep in their gut, the average middle-class person knows that protectionism is throwing in the towel. Protectionism doesn't work. But the all-out, total-free-trade model isn't working, either."

Keeping Up With Schumer's Baileys (HILL)

By Emily Heil

The Hill, February 1, 2007

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) devotes much of his new book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time," to an imaginary family, the Baileys. According to the tome, he runs every policy decision he makes by the average, middle-class, swing-voting family.

But the Baileys are unlike many American families in one regard: They've changed their name. When Schumer discussed his imaginary, sounding-board family to The Hill's Jonathan E. Kaplan in June of last year, they were named the O'Reillys.

A Schumer spokeswoman said the senator decided to rename his fictional friends when writing the book to make them appeal to a national audience. "He wanted a name that sounded more national … as opposed to more of a New York name," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0125465

And she denied one reason for the name-switcha former Schumer aide had posited. The aide told a Hill reporter that the book's publisher had ruled O'Reilly "too ethnic" for mass consumption.

"Not true," the Schumer spokeswoman said. "It was the senator's decision."

Fellow lawmakers, gathered at a book bash in Schumer's honor hosted by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y), seemed to think an (Irish) rose by any other name smells just as sweet. The crowd gathered at the Hill's Hunan Dynasty on Tuesday, which included Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), and Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine), noshed on spring rolls and sushi while toasting Schumer.

New Englanders trot to Globe party

The accents in the air were as thick as chowdah, as the New England congressional delegations mingled at a "welcome-to-Congress" meet-and-greet at the Boston Globe's D.C. bureau Tuesday night.

Northern lights in attendance included Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), who was spotted yukking it up with Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), plus a veritable roll call of House folks like Reps. Edward Markey (D-Mass.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), James McGovern (D-Mass.), John Tierney (D-Mass.), Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), Richard Neal (D-Mass.), Bill Delahunt (D-Mass.), Peter Welch (D-Vt.), Joe Courtney (D-Conn.), Paul Hodes (D-N.H.) and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.).

"Politics is sort of a regional industry — and really an obsession — in New England," bureau chief Peter Canellos said of the gathering. "So it was great to get the whole crowd under one roof."

Aside from the Globe's D.C. staff, media types in attendance included Globe Editor in Chief Marty Baron and PBS commentator and columnist Mark Shields.

To our southern gal's ears, all those Massachusetts accents floating around the Globe's Connecticut Avenue offices sounded the same, although Markey assured us that there are subtle but definite variations. He was overheard telling guests that he was "tri-lingual" because of his mastery of three of them.

Security warning raises no alarm

It was just another lovely day on Capitol Hill last week: Snow flurries were picturesquely floating past windows, and inside the Dirksen Cafeteria, a packed crowd of serious-minded suits and skirts were eating lunch. The idyllic moment was shattered when suddenly, a woman's voice came on the loud speaker declaring police had discovered an unusual package in the Senate Hart Building.

Staffers and lawmakers were instructed to stay away from the area.

Despite the alarm, no one flinched. Such interruptions are par for the course on Capitol Hill. And as it usually turns out, the package contained nothing dangerous. "It was cleared with negative results," e-mailed Capitol Police Public Information Officer Sgt. Kimberly Schneider. "[It] was a backpack left unattended … nothing hazardous found."

Talk about blasé. One Senate Democratic staffer appeared unmoved during the lunchtime ordeal. "We get those almost once a week," he yawned. "Everyone was unfazed because they are so routine. They never amount to anything significant."

Partying with Heather Graham all in a day's work

Members of Congress may be famous, but even they switch into fan mode when they encounter genuine celebrities of the Hollywood kind. Wednesday night, the Creative Coalition imported some glam left-coasters to lobby members on the groups' issues, including boosting arts funding and thwarting movie piracy.

As of Wednesday, more than 30 members had signed on to be on the "host committee" of a Hollywood-Hill mixer slated to be held at B. Smith's restaurant in Union Station, organizers said. The Creative Coalition's lobbying lineup included starlet of the small and big screen Heather Graham, one of the group's newer additions. She joined old Hill hands like Fran Drescher, Morgan Fairchild, and Joe Pantoliano.

But, lest readers get fooled into thinking that members and aides frolicking with the beautiful people are all play and no work, Creative Coalition Executive Director Robin Bronk says the event is as much about business as it is pleasure. "We call it partying with a purpose," she says. "But it's Washington, so those things get all tangled up."

Ford pulled no punches

That plodding, mild-mannered everyman described in eulogies of President Gerald Ford last month? Forget him.

New York Daily News Washington bureau chief Tom DeFrank is set to reveal some of Ford's reflections on the Clintons, the Iraq war, Richard Nixon and other topics, and let's just say the former prez can dish, particularly when it comes to Hill and Bill.

DeFrank just inked a deal to publish a book based on private interviews he conducted with Ford over the last 16 years, with the understanding that they would not be made public until after Ford's death. "Ford's comments about the Clintons are juicy, for sure," a source familiar with the interviews tells us.

Biden Fields Questions About '08 Rivals (SFC)

By Beth Fouhy

San Francisco Chronicle, February 1, 2007

Sen. Joe Biden spent his first day as an official presidential candidate regretting his description of Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama as "clean," and explaining why he had dissed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and John Edwards.

The six-term Delaware lawmaker, who has said for months he'd be a candidate in 2008, formally establish his presidential committee Wednesday and launched a campaign Web site. It's the second presidential bid for Biden, who pursued the White House in 1988.

But the talkative Biden spent the better part of the day trying to quell the furor over his remarks. He was peppered with questions from reporters in an afternoon conference call, and late in the day, issued a terse statement, saying: "I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama."

In the weekly newspaper's article, published Wednesday, Biden harshly criticized Clinton and Edwards for their proposals to end the Iraq war. He also questioned the credentials of another leading candidate, Obama, a first-term-senator, while calling him "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

Biden told reporters that he'd used the word "clean" to describe Obama as "fresh and new," and that the choice of words was not meant to disparage other black candidates who'd run for president in the past, such as civil rights leaders Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton.

Obama, Biden said, "is probably the most exciting candidate the Democratic or Republican parties have produced since I've been around. He's fresh, new, smart, insightful. Lightning in a jar."

Biden also said he'd called Obama after the controversy to patch things up.

"He said, 'Joe, I knew what you meant,'" Biden said.

Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor confirmed the two men had talked. Later, Obama released a statement saying Biden's remarks seemed to undercut past black presidential candidates.

"I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," Obama said. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns."

For his part, Jackson said he believed Biden's remark was "a gaffe."

"I know Joe Biden is a smart, decent guy," Jackson said in an interview. "I hope this doesn't diminish the light he brings to future debates."

But, he added, "Next time he should use the words 'fresh and new.' It's subject to less interpretation."

Biden was also grilled about comments he made regarding proposals offered by Clinton and Edwards to stabilize the situation in Iraq.

A 34-year Senate veteran known for his foreign policy expertise, Biden called Clinton's proposal — which would cap American troops and threatens to cut funding to Iraqi security forces — "nothing but disaster." He also criticized Edwards, who has proposed immediately removing 40,000-50,000 U.S. troops from Iraq.

"I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about," Biden said.

Pressed to explain, Biden reiterated his claim that his rivals' Iraq plans were a mistake. He also said that while the Democratic field has a number of well-qualified contenders, he was the best qualified to serve as president.

DOJ_NMG_0125467

"I believe I'm the best prepared of all the candidates," he said. "That I can say someone is qualified but can't take issue with their ideas is a strange phenomenon."

Known for his windy oratory and habit of thinking out loud, Biden's mouth has gotten him into trouble before. Last July, he defended his remark that "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." Biden said his words had been taken out of context.

And as a candidate for the 1988 Democratic presidential nomination, Biden withdrew from the race in 1987 amid accusations that he had plagiarized passages in a campaign speech from former British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock.

Asked whether his verbosity would be a handicap on the campaign trail, Biden demurred.

"That's for voters to decide. I don't see it as a problem," he said.

In a video message posted on his new campaign Web site, , Biden criticized President Bush's conduct of the Iraq war and warned that his successor would have no margin for error in resolving the conflict.

"This administration's mishandling of the war in Iraq may be the greatest foreign policy disaster of our times," Biden said. "The next president ... is going to have to be prepared to immediately step in and act without hesitation to end our involvement in Iraq."

Biden voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq but has since become a vocal critic of the conflict. He's also proposed a plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

Biden also spoke of a number of domestic challenges he hoped to tackle as president, including health care, boosting job and retirement security, and tackling the threat of global warming.

Biden will transfer $3 million from his Senate account to his presidential campaign, and said he believed he needed to raise $20 million total to be competitive in next year's early primaries. Analysts believe Clinton and Obama are likely to raise $100 million each this year.

A Biden Problem: Foot In Mouth (ABC News)

By Jake Tapper

ABC News, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31, 2007 — Senator Joe Biden, D-Del., the loquacious chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee who launched his presidential campaign today, may be experiencing an ailment not entirely unknown to him: foot in mouth disease.

Biden is taking some heat for comments he made to the New York Observer, in which he said of Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a rival for the nomination: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy. I mean, that's a storybook, man."

Immediately the conservative media establishment — Rush Limbaugh, the Drudge Report, bloggers — publicly pounced. At Townhall.com, Mary Katherine Ham wrote: "A clean black man? The first black guy on the American political scene who can both shower regularly and speak properly? Is that really what Biden thinks? If a Republican had said this, we'd have a national outpouring of grief over the residual ignorance and racial insensitivity in our country, and the guy would be in sensitivity training until around about the time John Kerry is elected president."

"'He is a clean African-American'?" Limbaugh asked. "If Biden thinks that Obama is clean then he has to think that others are not clean. Does he mean that he knows that Jesse Jackson is not clean? Does he mean that he knows that Reverend Sharpton is not clean? … See, folks, this is the problem for the libs. Once they get off script they expose their idiocy, they expose their prejudice."

But it wasn't just conservatives.

"When I heard his comments I thought Joe Biden was referring to a bygone era," said Donna Brazile, the former campaign manager for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign and a prominent African-American political consultant. "Years ago when white folks referred to black people with education they often used words like articulate. To suggest they were different, they were acceptable. That they were OK as compared to rest of African-Americans. So I think it came across that Joe Biden was referring to Sen. Obama as if he was a candidate running in the 1960s, not in the 21st century."

DOJ_NMG_0125468

"They are loaded words," Rev. Jesse Jackson told ABC News. "And that's why he should interpret what he meant by those loaded words. It was an attempt I thought to diminish Barack's attributes and dismissive of our previous campaigns that made Barack's candidacy possible."

Jackson said Biden's remarks "could be divisive."

Obama Responds

And notably, Obama himself didn't do much to knock the story down.

Asked about the comments at a press conference this afternoon, Obama said, "you'd have to ask Senator Clinton, uh, Senator Biden what he was thinking," initially stumbling by mentioning the name of the Democratic front-runner for the nomination, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York. "I don't spend too much time worrying about what folks are talking about during a campaign season."

Biden Ignites Furor With Remark On Obama (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, February 1, 2007

Senator Biden of Delaware launched his White House bid with a vivid demonstration of how his loose tongue could liven up the Democratic field, or perhaps drive him out of it altogether.

Mr. Biden ignited a furor with comments he made discussing the appeal of another likely candidate for the Democratic nomination, Senator Obama of Illinois.

"You got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," Mr. Biden said in an interview published online yesterday by the New York Observer. "I mean, that's a storybook, man."

Mr. Biden's remarks, and in particular his use of the word "clean," prompted debate on television news programs and the Internet about his meaning, and whether he was insulting Mr. Obama or other blacks who have run for president.

Mr. Biden said in a conference call with reporters yesterday that he had telephoned Mr. Obama to make sure no offense was taken.

Biden Burned By 'Clean' Language (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden spent his first official day as a 2008 presidential candidate defending his description of likely Democratic competitor Barack Obama as the "first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

Biden said he regretted the misunderstanding over his use of the word "clean" in an interview published Wednesday in The New York Observer.

"I really regret that some have taken totally out of context my use of the word 'clean,' " Biden said in an afternoon call with reporters several hours after formally joining the Democratic field.

He said he did not mean to offend the Illinois senator or other African-Americans who have sought the presidency. Obama "understood exactly what I meant, and I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader, Al Sharpton and the rest, will know exactly what I meant," Biden said.

Obama replied in a written statement. "I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally," the statement said, "but obviously they were historically inaccurate. African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

Late in the day, Biden released an apology. "I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent and I expressed that to Sen. Obama," he said.

Biden is a 34-year veteran of the Senate whose 1988 presidential candidacy ended amid allegations that he plagiarized portions of his speeches.

Others also criticized Biden's remarks. Biden "definitely misspoke and stepped on his announcement," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who ran Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. Biden has a strong civil rights record, she said, but his comments "reflect some old-school thinking."

Jackson said he had called Biden to ask what he meant but had not yet spoken with him. Jackson sought the Democratic nomination in 1984 and 1988. He described Biden's comments as a "diversion from the substantive issues of our time" and said it could be interpreted as attempting to "diminish" the role of his campaigns in the 1980s or to cast Obama as "all style over substance."

Comments by Biden have sparked controversy in the past. During a 2006 trip to New Hampshire, for instance, he said about his state's growing population of Indian immigrants: "You cannot go into a Dunkin' Donuts or a 7-Eleven unless you have a slight Indian accent."

The dustup over Biden's remarks came the same day President Bush also described Obama as "articulate" in an interview on Fox News.

Asked what he thinks troops would feel about a President Obama, Bush said: " He's an attractive guy. He's articulate. I've been impressed with him when I've seen him in person, but he's got a long way to go to be president."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "It's silly to compare the comments. What the president said requires no apology or explanation. He issued a compliment — not in code, but in plain English."

Obama spokesman Tommy Vietor said he had no comment on Bush's remarks.

Ron Walters, a University of Maryland political scientist, said Obama is "not the first articulate African-American to come on the scene by any stretch of the imagination."

Other politicians "are trying to account for his sudden rise on the scene," he said, "and they are doing it very badly."

Biden Unwraps His Bid For '08 With An Oops! (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — In an era of meticulous political choreography, the staging of the kickoff for this presidential candidacy could hardly have gone worse.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, who announced his candidacy on Wednesday with the hope that he could ride his foreign policy expertise into contention for the Democratic nomination, instead spent the day struggling to explain his description of Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat running for president, as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

The remark, published Wednesday in The New York Observer, left Mr. Biden's campaign struggling to survive its first hours and injected race more directly into the presidential contest. The day ended, appropriately enough for the way politics is practiced now, with Mr. Biden explaining himself to Jon Stewart on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show."

Earlier, in a decidedly nonpresidential afternoon conference call with reporters that had been intended to announce his candidacy, Mr. Biden, speaking over loud echoes and a blaring television set, said that he had been "quoted accurately." He volunteered that he had called Mr. Obama to express regret that his remarks had been taken "out of context," and that Mr. Obama had assured him he had nothing to explain.

"Barack Obama is probably the most exciting candidate that the Democratic or Republican party has produced at least since I've been around," he said, adding: "Call Senator Obama. He knew what I meant by it. The idea was very straightforward and simple. This guy is something brand new that nobody has seen before."

Asked about Mr. Biden's comments, Mr. Obama said in an interview, "I didn't take it personally and I don't think he intended to offend." Mr. Obama, who serves with Mr. Biden on the Foreign Relations Committee, added, "But the way he constructed the statement was probably a little unfortunate."

But later in the day, with Mr. Biden coming under fire from some black leaders, Mr. Obama issued a statement that approached a condemnation. "I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," he said. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

For Mr. Biden, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, it was an inauspicious beginning to his first presidential campaign since 1988, when he dropped out after acknowledging using without attribution portions of a speech from a British politician. By the end of the day on Wednesday, Democrats were asking only half-jokingly whether Mr. Biden might be remembered for having the shortest-lived presidential campaign in the history of the Republic.

Shortly after 6 p.m., Mr. Biden issued a written statement. "I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone," he said. "That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama."

Under questioning from reporters at his announcement conference call, Mr. Biden was pressed on what he meant in his description of Mr. Obama, particularly in his use of the word clean.

"He understood exactly what I meant," Mr. Biden said. "And I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader — Al Sharpton and the rest — will know exactly what I meant."

When he was asked, again, what he meant, Mr. Biden — known in Washington for his long-winded ways and his love of the microphone and the spotlight — bristled as he struggled over the squawk of feedback and echoes.

"I'm not going to repeat everything I just said," he said. "There is a vote that starts at 2:30, it takes 11 minutes to get to the floor. I can take one more question but not on the subject I have already spoken to."

And after taking one more question, Mr. Biden did something entirely out of character: He announced he was done talking.

Mr. Biden's assurances notwithstanding, both Mr. Jackson and Mr. Sharpton — African-Americans who have run for president — said they had no idea what Mr. Biden meant. And both suggested they felt at least a little offended by the remarks.

Mr. Jackson described Mr. Biden's remarks to the Observer, which also included critical statements about the Iraq positions of two of his Democratic opponents — Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina — as "blabbering bluster."

A wounded note to his voice, Mr. Jackson pointed out that he had run against Mr. Biden for the 1988 Democratic nomination, and had lasted far longer and drawn more votes than did Mr. Biden. Mr. Biden was forced out in September 1987.

"I am not sure what he means — ask him to explain what he meant," Mr. Jackson said. "I don't know whether it was an attempt to diminish what I had done in '88, or to say Barack is all style and no substance."

Mr. Sharpton said that when Mr. Biden called him to apologize, Mr. Sharpton started off the conversation reassuring Mr. Biden about his hygienic practices. "I told him I take a bath every day," Mr. Sharpton said.

No stranger to electoral intrigue, Mr. Sharpton was quick to offer a political motive: That Mr. Biden was drawing distinctions between Mr. Obama and African-American leaders like Mr. Sharpton and Mr. Jackson, to "discredit Mr. Obama with his base."

At the very least, Mr. Biden's remarks obscured a campaign roll-out in which he said that Mr. Bush had "dug America into a very big hole" with the war in Iraq and that the nation would need a leader experienced in foreign policy to take over during dangerous times. More than that, it seemed sure to harden Mr. Biden's image in political circles as politically undisciplined, an image he had been working scrupulously to change in what has emerged as a long-term political rehabilitation project for him.

In his conference call, Mr. Biden quoted his mother in trying to explain what he meant about Mr. Obama. "My mother has an expression: Clean as a whistle and sharp as a tack," Mr. Biden said, showering more praise on one of his biggest opponents for the nomination.

On Comedy Central, he told Mr. Stewart: "What got me in trouble was using the world clean. I should have said fresh. What I meant was he's got new ideas."

Mr. Biden's comments also focused new attention on remarks he made about Indians last year, when he said, "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent. I'm not joking."

Before he went on television, Mr. Biden found himself sharing a stage with Mr. Obama at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on Iraq, where he was noticeably solicitous to his new presidential rival as members of the committee questioned Henry Kissinger, the former secretary of state. Mr. Biden chastised Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat, to keep his comments short ("just one minute, Senator, or we will have everybody else").

But he could not have been more accommodating to Mr. Obama as the senator from Illinois began wrapping up: "I know I'm out of time."

Mr. Biden would have none of that. "That's O.K.," he told Mr. Obama. "You're making a very salient point."

Biden Enters Race Playing Defense (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, a foreign policy expert and Iraq war critic with a propensity for long-winded oratory, entered the Democratic race for president Wednesday with a clumsy comment about Illinois Sen. Barack Obama that was taken by some to be racially insensitive.

Though he touted his foreign affairs experience during a press conference with reporters, Biden was forced to explain why he had described Obama, a rival for the Democratic presidential nomination, as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

Biden made the comments to the New York Observer and said his use of the word "clean" to describe the African American politician was "taken totally out of context."

Obama initially told reporters that they would have to ask Biden what he was thinking when he made the comment: "I don't spend too much time worrying about what folks are talking about during a campaign season."

But by day's end, the senator took a sharper tone, issuing a public rebuke to his more senior colleague.

"I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," Obama said. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

Biden called Obama to explain his comments and Obama told him directly that he did not take the comments personally, aides to the Illinois senator said.

"This guy is a superstar," Biden said, effusively praising Obama's attributes in what was supposed to be his own presidential debut. "He is probably the most exciting candidate this party has had in a long time."

Even so, Biden released a separate statement last night as he tried to tamp down the spiraling controversy.

"I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama," he said.

Biden told reporters that he has long enjoyed the support of the African-American community in Delaware and did not intend to cause offense. He also said he did not believe that Sharpton, Jackson or other black leaders would misunderstand his remarks.

"My mom has an expression, 'clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack.' He is crisp and clear. I think a lot of him," said Biden, describing Obama as "lightning in a bottle" and adding that Obama had captured the imagination of the country like no other politician.

In an interview, Jackson called Biden "a decent man" who had made a verbal gaffe while trying to slight the competition.

"He was saying in effect that Barack is more style than substance, that he is just coming onto the scene," Jackson said. "In doing so, he seemed to be dismissive of our 1988 campaign and diminishing Barack's potential campaign."

Jackson, who spoke with both Obama and Biden by telephone Wednesday, said he would not characterize Biden's comments as racially motivated.

"That is my interpretation and Barack's interpretation," he said, adding that he hoped Biden's campaign would not be harmed by the poor choice of words.

As he kicked off his candidacy, Biden, 64, said he believes he would be a better president than Obama or Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), two of the top candidates in the race.

DOJ_NMG_0125472

"I make no apologies for saying I believe I am the best prepared of all the candidates," said Biden, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee who has served in the Senate for the last 34 years.

"The next president, left with the debacle this president will leave us, will have no margin for error and will need a fully thought out, comprehensive notion of what he or she will do with the problems in the world," Biden said.

In some ways, Biden's entry into the race signals the preeminent role that the war in Iraq will play in the 2008 election. The issue dominated the midterm elections as Democrats swept to power in Congress. Now, each of the presidential candidates has detailed positions on how to approach the conflict and the region.

Biden criticized both Clinton's and Obama's positions on Iraq, singling out Clinton's ideas as "incorrect for how to proceed." Clinton would cap American troop levels and has threatened to cut off funding for Iraqi troops.

"From the part of Hillary's proposal, the part that really baffles me is, 'We're going to teach the Iraqis a lesson,'" Biden said. "We're not going to equip them? O.K. Cap our troops and withdraw support from the Iraqis? That's a real good idea," he added sarcasitcally.

The Clinton campaign had no comment on Biden's criticism.

Like Clinton, Biden voted in 2002 to authorize President Bush to use force if necessary in Iraq. Since that time, however, Biden has become an ardent critic of the administration and the war, complaining about poor preparation and field intelligence, as well as insufficient troop levels. His proposal would divide the nation along ethnic lines in order to put an end to the civil strife.

Asked whether his verbosity would hinder his candidacy, Biden was unusually terse: "I'll leave that to the voters to decide."

As a presidential candidate and as a public figure, Biden has a compelling personal story. In 1972, while a young 29-year-old county councilman, he challenged a sitting Republican senator with an anti-Vietnam War platform, winning by a little more than 3,000 votes.

But just five weeks later, his wife and baby daughter were killed in a car accident and his two sons were badly injured. Biden was reluctantly sworn into office by the side of one son's bed. From his first day in the Senate, he has made it a point to commute home by train every day.

Biden Stumbles At The Starting Gate (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) joined the 2008 race for the White House yesterday, declaring that he has the right skills and experience to extricate the United States from Iraq without destabilizing the Middle East. But he spent much of the day extricating himself from a controversy over his comments about Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), and he eventually issued a statement of regret.

Biden, who unsuccessfully sought the Democratic nomination in 1988, is staking his presidential hopes on more than three decades of experience in the Senate, where he has risen to become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and one of the Democratic Party's leading spokesmen on national security and foreign policy.

Biden said he believes he has the unique set of attributes to get the United States out of the most divisive conflict since the Vietnam War without further damaging U.S. interests around the world. "The next president of the United States, because of the policies of this president, is going to have no margin for error," he said on ABC's "Good Morning America," adding, "I think I have the most experience there."

He is a co-sponsor of one of the Senate resolutions opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, but also has been critical of other Democrats who have called for what he believes would be a precipitous withdrawal of U.S. forces from the conflict. Last fall, Biden proposed a plan that called for a political settlement in Iraq and for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to be given responsibility over specific regions of the country.

Biden sought to highlight his experience on the day he declared his candidacy, but an interview he gave to the New York Observer, a weekly newspaper, overshadowed his announcement.

In the interview, Biden described Obama as "the first mainstream African American [presidential candidate] who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy. I mean, that's a storybook, man."

DOJ_NMG_0125473

Asked during an afternoon conference call with reporters to explain his choice of words, Biden said he meant no offense in describing Obama the way he did, then lavished praise on the Illinois senator as a "very special guy" who has caught "lightning in a jar" like no politician he has seen before. "This guy is a superstar," he added.

Biden also said that he had called Obama after the remarks became public and that Obama had taken no offense from them.

Obama later issued a statement that absolved Biden only in part. "I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally," he said, "but obviously they were historically inaccurate. African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

After Obama's statement, Biden issued a statement further backtracking. "I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone," he said. "That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama."

It was the second time in months that Biden has been forced to explain a comment that some interpreted as racially insensitive. In a videotaped exchange with a supporter last June, he said, "You cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts [in Delaware] unless you have a slight Indian accent. I'm not joking."

In the Observer interview and in a television interview, Biden also criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's proposal to cut funding for Iraqi security forces if the Iraqi government fails to meet a series of benchmarks.

"I think it would be a disaster, if that is her plan," he said of the New York senator on "Good Morning America." "They're the people we're supposed to be training so that we can rely on them to aid us in the efforts that we undertake."

Biden called Clinton "clearly qualified" to be president but told the Observer the fact that so many Democrats do not support her gave him hope that he could win the nomination. "My point was she's known by 100 percent of the people and has had the legitimate and understandable support from her husband, and there are still 60 percent of the people up for grabs," he told reporters.

Biden was also critical of another presidential rival, former North Carolina senator John Edwards. "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about" on Iraq, he said.

With his remarks about Obama, Biden began his second campaign for the White House much as the first one ended, arguing that his public comments were being misinterpreted. He quit the 1988 campaign after being captured on videotape adopting the rhetoric and in some cases the life story of British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock. The video was sent by the campaign of Michael S. Dukakis to the New York Times and eventually led to Biden's withdrawal.

Biden won election to the Senate in 1972 when he was 29 years old. He turned 30 in time to be sworn in the following January. Tragedy struck almost immediately after the election when his wife and daughter were killed in an automobile accident, leaving Biden with two young sons. He later remarried and still commutes daily between his home in Delaware and the capital.

A gifted orator, Biden has been plagued by a reputation for being windy and verbose, whether while chairing a Senate hearing or speaking at political gatherings around the country.

"I think one of the reasons we're in trouble is we reduce the political discussion to sound bites," he told ABC's Diane Sawyer. "The American public's a lot more sophisticated than we all give them credit for. And on complicated issues, I'm going to give them straight answers. And if it takes more than three minutes, I'm going to do it."

Biden Enters Race For Democratic Nomination (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., announced his candidacy for the presidency Wednesday, arguing that when the media buzz fades from candidates such as Senate colleagues Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and Barak Obama, D-Ill., voters will rally around Biden's foreign policy expertise.

"The issue is not whether I can raise as much money or go ahead in the polls," the six-term senator said in a conference call with reporters. "It's my ideas. That's what this campaign is going to get to."

But Biden, whose 1988 campaign ended in a plagiarism dispute, immediately found himself at the center of a new controversy, having to explain comments he made this week in which he criticized his rivals in the Democratic presidential field.

In an interview with the New York Observer, published Wednesday, Biden sharply attacked Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., for their plans for Iraq. He drew even more scrutiny for calling Obama "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

By using the word "clean," Biden later explained, he meant only that Obama was "fresh" and "new." But the comment drew calls for an explanation.

"I do not think he meant to say anything intentional that was off-color, but it certainly is highly suggestive," the Rev. Jesse Jackson, himself a former Democratic presidential candidate, said on CNN.

Obama put out a statement challenging another part of Biden's comments.

"I didn't take Senator Biden's comments personally, but obviously they were historically inaccurate," Obama said. "African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate."

By the end of the day, Biden had called Obama "a superstar, the most exciting candidate this party has had in a long time." In a written statement, Biden said that "I deeply regret any offense my remark in the New York Observer might have caused anyone. That was not my intent, and I expressed that to Senator Obama."

Biden, 64, first won election to the Senate in 1972, at the age of 29. A month after his election, his wife and young daughter were killed in a car crash when a tractor-trailer broadsided their car.

Biden, who was in Washington at the time, considered withdrawing from the Senate to take care of his two sons, who were injured in the crash. To this day, he does not drive the 80 miles from Delaware to Washington but commutes by train. He has since remarried.

In the Senate, Biden has built a reputation as a foreign policy specialist. He is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and is the author of a Senate resolution opposing President Bush's escalation of troops in Iraq.

Biden ran for the 1988 presidential nomination but withdrew amid accusations that he had plagiarized portions of speeches by a British politician. Asked Wednesday what he learned from the experience, Biden said: "I took a real gut punch. I learned how to take it, and I got back up."

Last year, he was forced to defend a remark that "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." He said his words had not been fairly portrayed.

In the New York Observer interview, Biden challenged the foreign policy prescriptions of other Democratic candidates in the 2008 race.

Asked about Edwards's call to immediately withdraw a portion of the U.S. force from Iraq, Biden said: "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about."

He said Clinton's plan to cap the number of U.S. troops and to threaten to cut funds to Iraqi leaders would be "nothing but disaster."

"This administration's mishandling of the war in Iraq may be the greatest foreign policy disaster of our time," Biden said in a video statement on his campaign Web site Wednesday. "Above all else, that's why I'm running for president."

Biden Kicks Off His Presidential Campaign (KCS)

By Steven Thomma And Margaret Talev

The Kansas City Star, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware found the first day of his bid for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination overshadowed Wednesday by his remarks describing presidential candidate Barack Obama as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

Biden made the comments in an interview with the New York Observer published hours before he declared his candidacy.

DOJ_NMG_0125475

Biden said Wednesday that he meant no insult to the Illinois senator or to other black politicians who might've been slighted by comparison as inarticulate or unclean. Among those who've run for president are the late Shirley Chisholm in 1972, Jesse Jackson in 1984 and 1988, Alan Keyes in 1996 and 2000, and Al Sharpton and Carol Moseley-Braun in 2004.

Biden, who was first elected to the Senate in 1972, on Wednesday called Obama "probably the most exciting candidate the Democratic or Republican parties have produced since I've been around. He's fresh, new, smart, insightful. Lightning in a jar."

He added in a conference call: "I really regret some have taken totally out of context my use of the word `clean.'

"My mother has a saying, `clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack.' That is the context. He is crisp and clear."

Biden said he called Obama to assure him he meant no insult.

"I took no offense," Obama said later. "I think Joe was just making news, being Joe. Joe, I think, certainly didn't intend to offend and I'll leave it at that. He called me. I told him it wasn't necessary. We have more important things to think about. We've got Iraq. We've got health care. We've got energy. This is low on the list. He was very gracious and I have no problems with Joe Biden."

Some other prominent African-Americans were less forgiving.

"It's certainly highly suggestive," Jackson told CNN.

"It came across as a very insensitive thing to say," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who ran Al Gore's campaign and advised Jesse Jackson's.

"I take him at his word that he meant no harm. But if he didn't have a 100 percent record on civil rights, it would be easy to infer something different. It was almost as though he were thinking of another era, when people thought of smart, articulate African-Americans as different from other African-Americans."

The statement drowned out Biden's hope to launch his long-shot campaign with a focus on his experience in the Senate and familiarity with foreign policy. He's chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and is trying to use that position to grab the spotlight away from such rivals as Obama and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and to remind voters that he's got more government experience than they do.

Yet Biden's Obama comment also served as a reminder of his tendency to talk too much and get himself in trouble - such as the time he was forced to drop his bid for the 1988 nomination after he was caught plagiarizing British Labour Party leader Neil Kinnock. Last year he said his that "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent."

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, dismissed Biden's comment - and candidacy - with a thinly veiled slap at his forced withdrawal from his last presidential campaign.

"I didn't even know he was a candidate, so I don't see how he could have hurt himself," Rangel deadpanned. "It probably was something someone else said and he picked it up and used it himself," he said, adding with emphasis, "by mistake."

Freshman Rep. Steve Cohen, D-Tenn., a white lawmaker who represents a largely black district, said Biden "was trying to pay Obama a compliment," but that his word choice was all wrong.

"Shirley Chisholm was obviously clean; Jesse Jackson was clean," Cohen said. But Cohen predicted that Biden's self-inflicted damage would be small because he doesn't have the standing among black voters to lose. "I think in my community, Senator Obama and Senator Clinton will be out in front," he said.

Nothing Clean Or Bright In Biden's '08 Opener (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware yesterday made it official that he will seek the Democratic presidential nomination, but stumbled out of the gate with a memorable gaffe that became the focus of his day.

In a critique of the Democratic field, he said of Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," he told the New York Observer, a weekly. "I mean, that's a storybook, man."

DOJ_NMG_0125476

The senator, serving his sixth term, tried to highlight his strong foreign-policy credentials, saying he is best equipped to fix the situation in Iraq.

Taking the remark as a slur against Mr. Obama or other black men who have sought the presidency is taking it "totally out of context," Mr. Biden told reporters after the remark was posted on the Drudge Report, a popular Internet site. He said he called Mr. Obama to explain the context. He issued a formal statement saying he deeply regretted if anyone was offended.

"He understood exactly what I meant, and I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton and every other black leader will know exactly what I meant," Mr. Biden said.

Mr. Biden told the Observer interviewer that New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's plan for Iraq is "a serious mistake," but said she "is clearly qualified to be president." He jabbed at former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina: "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about."

Talk-show hosts and bloggers seized on the Obama comment, but they also invoked criticism from a leading liberal blogger. "Really, if we live in a just world, this will be the end of Joe Biden's political career," read a post on DailyKos.com "It's clear his career has dragged on one election cycle too many."

Mr. Biden, 64, discussed his second presidential bid on a conference call, an event sandwiched between hearings on Iraq as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a television appearance on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show."

In 1988, Mr. Biden withdrew from the presidential race before the nominating contests. Now, he polls in the single digits, well below the Democratic front-runner, Mrs. Clinton, and her two top rivals, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards.

Reporters on the conference call peppered Mr. Biden with questions about the Obama remarks, and he said the "clean" word probably came from an old saying his mother used: "Clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack." He described Mr. Obama as "crisp and clear."

Mr. Obama dismissed the remarks as the Delaware senator just "being Joe."

"He certainly didn't intend to offend, and I'll leave it at that," he told reporters who asked whether Mr. Biden had apologized.

"He called me; I told him it wasn't necessary. We have more important things to think about. We've got Iraq; we've got health care; we've got energy," Mr. Obama said. "He was very gracious. I have no problem with Joe Biden."

But later he issued another statement saying the comment was "historically inaccurate."

"African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns, and no one would call them inarticulate," he said.

Mr. Biden yesterday lavished Mr. Obama with compliments, calling him a "superstar," the "most exciting candidate" from either party in decades and giving what sounded like several reasons why he thinks the Illinois senator should be the next president.

"He's fresh, he's new, he's smart, he's insightful," he said. "This guy has touched the nerve and the imagination of the people of this country." He later offered another amendment of remarks. "This is a very special guy. This is like catching lightning in a jar. That was the point of everything I was saying. I think he's great. I think they are all great. I think I'm better."

Even the president said nice things about Mr. Obama. Appearing on Fox News yesterday, President Bush said he is "impressed" by Mr. Obama, whom he finds "attractive" and "articulate."

"But he's got a long way to go to be president."

Mr. Biden said his legislative experience -- more than that of Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards combined -- will help him convince voters he can replace Mr. Bush.

He said the president's foreign and domestic policies have put the nation at risk. "I make no apologies for saying I believe I am the best prepared of all the candidates," Mr. Biden said. "President Bush will leave the next president with no margin for error."

A lawyer and professor, Mr. Biden has become a prominent Democratic voice on Iraq policy. As the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he has held extensive hearings about the best way forward and is a chief critic of Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

His nonbinding resolution denouncing the plan as "not in the national interest" will soon be introduced in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0125477

Yesterday, Mr. Biden acknowledged mistakes in his first run, including accusations that he plagiarized stump speeches from other politicians, and said it was his "own fault."

He said he has since learned to take punches. On Sunday's "This Week," host George Stephanopoulos asked Mr. Biden to sum up why he is running in 25 words or less. He required 45.

Democrat Biden Makes It Official For Presidential Run (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, February 1, 2007

Jan. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Senator Joe Biden officially joined the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination today, saying he was spurred to run by President George W. Bush's policy failures in Iraq.

``This administration's mishandling of the war in Iraq may be the greatest foreign policy disaster of our time," the Delaware senator said in an announcement on his campaign Web site. ``Above all else, that's why I'm running for president."

Biden, 64, enters a field crowded with Democrats who have declared candidacies or set up exploratory committees: Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Barack Obama of Illinois and Chris Dodd of Connecticut; former North Carolina Senator John Edwards; former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack; New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson and Ohio Representative Dennis Kucinich.

Biden sought to sharpen differences with his rivals, criticizing the Iraq policies of Clinton, Obama and Edwards. ``You didn't hear any of them get in this debate at all until they announced for president," he said in an interview with the New York Observer.

Biden said Clinton's Iraq plan would be ``nothing but disaster," and Edwards didn't know ``what the heck he is talking about." As for Obama, ``I don't recall hearing a word" about Iraq from him, Biden said.

Obama's Candidacy

The Observer also quoted Biden as saying of Obama's presidential candidacy: ``You got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

Late today, Biden said he ``deeply" regretted ``any offense" that remark might have caused anyone. ``That was not my intent and I expressed that to Senator Obama," Biden said in an e-mailed statement.

Obama said he didn't take Biden's remarks personally. ``But obviously they were historically inaccurate," Obama said in a statement. ``African-American presidential candidates like Jesse Jackson, Shirley Chisholm, Carol Moseley Braun and Al Sharpton gave a voice to many important issues through their campaigns and no one would call them inarticulate."

Officials at the Edwards and Clinton campaigns declined to comment on Biden's remarks.

First elected to the Senate in 1972, Biden sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1988 and withdrew after being accused of failing to credit part of a speech that he had adapted from the British Labor Party's then-leader Neil Kinnock.

Biden's announcement today that he filed papers with the Federal Election Commission to seek the presidency in 2008 and begin raising money followed months of saying he planned to run.

Currently chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Biden backs a proposal to divide Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims and the Kurds.

``There is no possibility of a solution in Iraq that is military," Biden said today in a conference call. ``We should be backing the constitution, which calls for regional autonomy over security and local laws. We should be insisting on a constitutional amendment that shares the oil revenue."

A Gallup Organization poll last month showed Clinton leading among Democratic voters. She got support from 33 percent, followed by Obama with 20 percent and former Vice President Al Gore with 12 percent. Biden was favored by 3 percent.

Republicans who have formed exploratory committees include Senators John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas; former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani; former Governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Tommy Thompson of Wisconsin, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Jim Gilmore of Virginia; and Representatives Duncan Hunter of California and Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

You can watch the Biden announcement video here. It leads with his expertise in Iraq.

Biden, unlike the other Democrats, has a distinct, clear plan not only for withdrawal, but also for Iraq. You've got to think that will amplify his voice this year, even if it doesn't get him votes.

Best line of the video: On Iraq, Biden has been "trying my little best."

Update On Boston Security Breach; Iraq Prime Minister Speaks Out; Nancy Pelosi Response To Iraq Trip; Joe Biden Kicks Off Presidential Campaign (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 1, 2007

And it is happening now. We're going to have more on this security scare that was happening in Boston. We're expecting to hear from the mayor of Boston. Coming up, we're going to be bringing you his remarks and letting you know what he has to say.

Also this hour, a CNN exclusive -- Iraq's prime minister tells the United States and Iran -- keep your fight with one another out of my country.

Is Nouri Al-Maliki thumbing his nose at President Bush right now?

You're going to want to hear what he told our Michael Ware in Baghdad just a little while ago.

Plus, Mr. Bush is getting an earful from Speaker Nancy Pelosi about her trip to Iraq. She calls the war catastrophic.

Could the same be said about the Democrats' relationship with the White House?

And Senator Joe Biden kicks off his presidential campaign with what his critics are saying is foot and mouth disease.

Did he insult fellow Democrat Barack Obama with a back-handed complement that some are actually seeing as racist?

Stay right here to find out what Biden said and what Senator Obama's response is.

I'm Wolf Blitzer and you're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

We're going to update you on that bomb scare that has been happening over the past few hours in Boston. Several suspicious packages triggered fear, a traffic nightmare.

We're standing by for a news conference. Top city officials, including the mayor of Boston, will detail what's going on. We're going to have that coming up.

Right now, authorities have determined it looks like the whole thing may have been a hoax. All of the devices that were found, for all practical purposes, turned out not, not to be explosives.

Let's -- we'll update you on that as we get more information. But let's turn now to our CNN exclusive.

The Iraqi prime minister's stern message to the United States and Iran to simply keep their would-be war out of his backyard. Nouri Al- Maliki's very, very strong comments today are driving home fears of a wider war in the region.

CNN's Michael Ware is joining us from Baghdad with more on his xvii -- Michael.

MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, in an xvii today with Prime Minister Nouri Al-Maliki, the Iraqi leader said that Iranian forces had been targeting American troops. And he now worries that his country is becoming a proxy battleground between Tehran and Washington.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

WARE: Is American intelligence wrong when it says Iran is working to kill American soldiers in your country?

NOURI AL-MALIKI, IRAQI PRIME MINISTER (THROUGH TRANSLATOR): I didn't say it does not exist and the Americans, when they say that their intelligence is saying that Iranians are killing their soldiers, it means their intelligence is based on information that they got. And this is not an obscure thing.

DOJ_NMG_0125479

There is a struggle between Iran and America and we have told the Iranians and the Americans, we know that you have a problem with each other, but we're asking you, please, solve your problems outside of Iraq.

We do not want the American forces to take Iraq as a field to attack Iran or Syria. And we will not accept Iran to use Iraq to attack the American forces.

But does this not exist?

It exists and I assure you it exists. But it's based on the struggle between the two countries. And from our side, we're trying to stop the effort to have a struggle in Iraq. We are always encouraging the two sides to negotiate and to try to find an agreement away from Iraq.

Iran and America -- we are ready to pay efforts to solve the problems between them, if it is possible. But not on the account of Iraq. Iraq has nothing to do with the American-Iranian struggle. And we will not let Iran play a role against the American Army and we will not allow America to play a role against the Iranian Army and everyone should respect the sovereignty of Iraq.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

WARE: Wolf, indeed, the prime minister said that all of Iraq's neighbors -- from Turkey to Syria to Jordan to Saudi Arabia -- want to interfere in Iraq's internal affairs. BLITZER: Michael, were you surprised that the prime minister, Nouri Al-Maliki, was effectively equating the Iranian president, Ahmadinejad, with the U.S. president, George W. Bush?

WARE: Well, the prime minister is certainly a man caught in the middle between these two powers, represented by Washington and Tehran; by two presidents.

He's struggling a very difficult divide. His government exists only through the intervention of the United States. He is propped up by U.S. forces and Washington's support, yet he shares a very important border with Iran.

Iran has enormous strategic interest in this country. And in the past, during Saddam's regime, when the prime minister was in opposition, Iran supported his party and many other Shia opposition parties.

BLITZER: Because, you know, so much of this new U.S. strategy depends on Nouri Al-Maliki cooperating with the U.S. And when so many people here in Washington, including the president's own Republican supporters, hear Nouri Al-Maliki basically say to the United States and to Iran, keep your proxy war out of Iraq. They're going to say why is the United States supporting this guy if, effectively, he's aligning himself, at least in part, with Iran?

WARE: Well, to some degree. I mean this is real politick -- what choice does Prime Minister Maliki have?

And certainly U.S. officials and American commanders here on the ground have been saying since the beginning, since the invasion in 2003, that they recognize that, yes, Iran does have interests in Iraq, given its shared border and the cross-pollination of the Shia people over that border, and that also they would like to foster a healthy relationship between Baghdad and Tehran.

However, what we've seen is this fierce competition for influence being waged between Washington and Tehran. And we're actually seeing it being fought out militarily. So this relationship is veering into very dangerous waters -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Michael Ware reporting for us from Baghdad.

Michael, thanks very much.

And over at the White House right now, President Bush is meeting face-to-face with some of his toughest Democratic critics on Iraq. They include the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and Congressman John Murtha.

They're just back from a visit to Baghdad.

At the same time on Capitol Hill, Republicans are fighting among themselves over various resolutions opposing a troop build-up in Iraq.

Our Congressional correspondent, Dana Bash, is standing by. But let's go to Ed Henry at the White House with the latest from there -- Ed.

ED HENRY, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, today the president was on Wall Street talking up the economy. He got a rock star reception when he walked on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. It's sort of a novelty for traders to see him there. It's a rare appearance.

But no such luxury for the president back here at the White House. A much more hostile reception from Democrats and Republicans alike. A lot of pressure, obviously, still on Iraq, even as the president tries to talk about the domestic agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0125480

As you noted, right now, the president huddled here at the White House behind closed doors with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Democrat John Murtha, other lawmakers who were just on this bipartisan delegation fact finding mission to both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Speaker Pelosi has already called the situation and what she saw on the ground catastrophic. Senior Democratic aides saying that Speaker Pelosi planning to be "blunt but polite to the president" about exactly what she saw.

So he's clearly going to get an earful -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Do we expect the president to be reaching out to Democrats a little bit more assertively in the coming days and weeks?

HENRY: Yes. As we first reported last night, the president finally agreed last night, after a lot of back and forth with Democratic leaders, that he's going to create this sort of bipartisan, informal panel that's going to do more consultation. That had come after the president said he wanted to do more of that but after Democrats said look, there have been meetings here at the White House, but they don't really feel like they're being listened to.

They feel like the president already had his policy to send more troops to Iraq and he wasn't really hearing criticism.

I think given the fact that he's on the defensive now, Democrats are expecting a lot more consultation -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Ed, stand by.

I want to go to Dana Bash up on Capitol Hill.

Republicans seem to be fighting amongst themselves emotionally -- Dana.

DANA BASH, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Very much so.

You know, before November's election, the story line here on Capitol Hill was about Democrats divided over Iraq. Now it is Republicans divided. And the intensity of that disagreement has been pretty much behind closed doors. But, Wolf, today it spilled out into the open.

(BEGIN VIDEO TAPE)

BASH (voice-over): President Bush's allies are so worried that resolutions opposing his Iraq plan could pass, they are not waiting for next week's formal debate to start slamming them.

SEN. DAVID VITTER (R), LOUISIANA: Do you not throw mere words out that have no concrete effect except undermining our troops and emboldening the enemy?

SEN. JIM DEMINT (R), SOUTH CAROLINA: Our responsibility is to sell it to the American people, not just to criticize, not to come up with resolutions that don't mean anything, intended to embarrass the president.

BASH: Preemptive strikes not just aimed at Democrats, but at fellow Republicans, meant to pressure GOP senators not to vote against the president.

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS (R), MAINE: Comments like that are really inappropriate.

BASH: Instead, it is intensifying the deepening discord within the Republican Party.

Susan Collins is one of four GOP senators co-sponsoring a resolution that opposes sending more troops to Iraq.

COLLINS: The vast majority of those of us serving and in leadership roles on this debate feel very strongly, are not motivated by political purposes.

BASH: But when GOP Senator Jim Demint was asked if he thinks fellow Republicans, including former Armed Services Chairman John Warner, are really trying to embarrass the president, he said: "It's clearly not an act of leadership."

Bush allies admit there is less pressure on GOP lawmakers to stand with the president.

SEN. JOHN CORNYN (R), TEXAS: The president has the bully pulpit of the office of president of the United States. But I think in many ways, the American people have sort of chosen up sides on this issue and are not listening.

BASH: Texas Senator John Cornyn has proposed one of several measures supporting a troop increase, as long as Iraqis meet their commitments. John McCain is authoring another intended to lure skeptical Republicans away from condemning the president, a resolution establishing a series of benchmarks for the Iraqis.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

BASH: And while Senator McCain's resolution will lay out benchmarks, it will not provide any introduction of what would happen if the Iraqis don't comply or consequences if they don't, as well.

Now, many Republicans say that they're very, very skeptical of the Iraqi government, therefore they don't think that resolution will have that kind of impact.

But, Wolf, Senator McCain told us today that he is reluctant to put any consequences in his resolution, saying it's too complicated. But he says he's confident he'll be able to assess whether Iraqis would comply with the benchmarks that he intends to lay out -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Dana, thank you for that.

We're going to check back with you, as well.

Lots of commotion up on Capitol Hill right now.

And Dana, by the way, and Ed Henry, as you know, are part of the best political team on television.

And remember, for the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker at cnn.com/ticker.

Let's go to Jack Cafferty.

He's part of the best political team on television, as well -- Jack.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Why, thank you, Wolf.

This probably doesn't come as news to you, but it's been confirmed now that the United States has wasted tens of millions of dollars in Iraq reconstruction aid. There's been an audit by a special inspector general.

Get this -- the United States paid $44 million for a police training academy. He's never been used and the building stands empty. It has been for months.

The price included $4 million for 20 VIP trailers and an Olympic- sized swimming pool. These items were ordered by the Iraqi government, never authorized by the United States.

Put an Olympic-sized pool in there while you're doing that.

We have spent $36 million on weapons that we can't account for -- vague invoices and things like that. Body armor, armored vehicles, communications equipment -- we don't know what happened to this stuff, $36 million worth.

You remember the Baghdad police college?

$73 million of your money, my money, down the toilet for that debacle. The construction was so bad that at one point there was raw sewage dripping from the ceiling in the living quarters. This was when the building was brand new.

Four years after the war started and the State Department says it's now working to improve controls.

We're finding out about all of this just as President Bush is ready to ask Congress for another $1.2 billion in reconstruction aid to Iraq. We -- you and I -- have already spent more than $20 billion on reconstruction.

So the question is this -- how can the U.S. avoid wasting millions of dollars in Iraq on things like an unused police academy, an Olympic-sized pool, and unaccounted for weapons?

E-mail your thoughts to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, we'll be anxious for that -- those e-mails.

Jack, thank you very much.

I just want to remind our viewers, we're standing by for a news conference in Boston. We expect to hear from the mayor and some other authorities on what they thought was a bomb scare. It's caused some traffic and security problems in Boston.

We'll give you that news when it's available. It looks like the whole thing may simply be a hoax.

Meanwhile, a presidential launch gone wrong -- Senator Joe Biden finds himself at the center of some controversy over what he said about fellow Democratic Senator Barack Obama.

And also coming up, who's a better speaker, Senator Obama or presidential rival Hillary Clinton?

Democrats take a stand in a brand new poll.

And a new glimpse inside the Bush White House and its relationship with the news media. A reporter who went to jail goes under oath. We're going to share what she's saying.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back.

DOJ_NMG_0125482

A journalist who went to jail to protect a source inside the Bush White House is testifying against that person once again today, and her credibility is coming under fire.

Let's go to Brian Todd.

He's at the courthouse.

He's joining us now with more of the CIA leak trial that's unfolding -- everyday, Brian, there is more and more drama.

BRIAN TODD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Absolutely, Wolf. And as you just mentioned, today was all about "Scooter" Libby's team trying to attack the credibility of that key prosecution witness. That witness, former "New York Times" reporter Judith Miller, who today finished her testimony. And the defense spent just about all morning trying to punch holes in Judith Miller's memory, specifically, her memory of the first meeting she had with Louis "Scooter" Libby in which Miller says Libby told her that Ambassador Joe Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

Now, at that meeting on June 23, 2003, Miller told the court that Libby was agitated, that the CIA was, in his view, back-pedaling on pre-war intelligence.

But the defense came right back at Judith Miller this morning, essentially asking how could she remember those details when she had forgotten to tell the grand jury the first time she testified before the grand jury that she had even had that meeting with "Scooter" Libby.

The defense also asked Judith Miller several times whether she had learned about Wilson's wife from other sources, other than "Scooter" Libby, before that meeting. And Judith Miller's response: "I can't be absolutely, absolutely certain, but I have no recollection of it with anyone else."

Now, that June 23, 2003 meeting is key, Wolf, because that was weeks before Libby claims he heard of Joe Wilson's wife's status for the first time.

Judith Miller, of course, spent 85 days in jail for refusing to cooperate with investigators about her source, revealing her source, which turned out to be "Scooter" Libby -- Wolf.

BLITZER: How many of those reporters, Brian, are being forced to testify about their relationship with "Scooter" Libby?

TODD: Well, Matt Cooper, the former "Time" magazine reporter, is on the stand just as we speak. He came on the stand shortly after noon today. He testified that he first learned of Wilson's wife from White House political adviser Karl Rove and that he later asked "Scooter" Libby if he had heard the same thing and Libby replied to him, "yes, I've heard that, too."

But the defense trying to punch holes in Matt Cooper's credibility, too, talking about what he reported on the record and off, even kind of dissecting his typographical errors in notes. So they're really trying to go after Matt Cooper's credibility.

Also, Wolf, Tim Russert of NBC News scheduled to take the stand very soon, probably this week, and that's very, very key testimony.

BLITZER: It's understandable to punch holes in one or two or even three witnesses. But when you have seven, eight, nine, 10 people, journalists as well as Bush administration officials, basically saying the same thing, that's -- that's a pretty high hurdle.

TODD: It is a high hurdle, Wolf. They are trying to erode the credibility of each and every one of those people who essentially said that Libby shared information with them about Joe Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame Wilson.

But remember that they are going to -- the central defense for "Scooter" Libby is his memory, saying I simply don't remember what I told different people and when.

And so when "Scooter" Libby testifies, that's a big chance for them to kind of rebut that once again.

BLITZER: All right, Brian is going to stay on top of this trial for us.

Thank you, Brian.

And we're also getting more details from Matt Cooper's testimony today online.

Let's go to our Internet reporter, Abbi Tatton -- Abbi.

ABBI TATTON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, there are a handful of bloggers at this trial who are reporting in real time about what is going on. And their sites give you a real look inside what is happening right now.

I've just updated from liberal Firedoglake, which is reporting on Cooper's demeanor. He's been there since about noon, looking a little bored at this point.

DOJ_NMG_0125483

But, of course, they're also following details of his testimony. Cooper describing how on July 12, 2003, he was running in and out of a country club, taking a phone call from "Scooter" Libby on his cell phone in the parking lot.

And we also have details online of the very basis for that conversation. This is the Web site of the office of the special prosecutor. This is where we're getting all the trial exhibits. And there you see one of the latest documents to be uploaded is an e-mail from Matt Cooper to the office of the vice president about some questions he had on Niger.

Many more documents being uploaded here now mounting at this Web site, including a handwritten note here from the vice president. Another one here, a formerly classified document. And we're expecting another batch to be unloaded in the next couple of hours when the courtroom wraps up for the day -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Thanks very much for that.

We'll stay on top of this story, Abbi.

And this just coming into THE SITUATION ROOM.

We're just getting word that Senator and presidential hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton will postpone a trip to New Hampshire this weekend because of the illness of her stepfather-in-law, Dick Kelley.

We're going to continue to watch this and see her schedule.

We, of course, wish him a speedy recovery.

Just ahead, does Senator Barack Obama think he was insulted by his White House rival, Senator Joe Biden?

New details on this dustup that's muddying Biden's campaign kick- off.

And is Iraq a winning issue for Democrats and a loser for Republicans?

It's trench warfare that could decide the 2008 election.

Much more coming up.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Carol Costello is off for the day.

Fredericka Whitfield is monitoring the wires. She's keeping an eye on the video feeds coming in from around the world.

She's joining us now with a closer look at some other important stories making news -- hi, Fred.

FREDRICKA WHITFIELD, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Hello to you, Wolf.

Well, it could be as early as today that the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee get their hands on key documents surrounding the government's so-called warrantless surveillance program. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales today announced plans to turn the information over to Senators Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter. Leahy and Specter have been demanding for months to see the secret court documents that led to the reversal of the controversial intelligence program.

And this today -- a leading London-based security think tank says Iran is only two or three years away from being able to build a nuclear bomb. The International Institute for Strategic Studies says Iran is on track for producing 3,000 centrifuges to create weapons grade uranium by the end of March. In its annual publication, "The Military Balance," it does say domestic opposition to nuclear development efforts may help to slow the process.

And new movement today in the global war on terror. British police staged a series of early morning raids they say thwarted what they call an Iraq-style abduction. The raids in Birmingham, England netted the arrests of nine men. A source tells CNN the plot centered around the torture and beheading of a British Muslim soldier who recently returned home from Afghanistan. The soldier was not identified. And then this message today from the travel industry to the U.S. government -- tourists are not terrorists and should not be treated as such. Industry leaders, meeting in Washington, called on the Feds to take steps to reverse the steep post-9/11 decline in overseas travel. They say travel to the U.S. has fallen 17 percent in the past five years and U.S. travel abroad is off 9 percent -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, thanks very much.

I want to go to Boston right now.

The police chief there is meeting with reporters, explaining what was going on -- a traffic nightmare, as a result of some sort of scare.

Let's listen in.

EDWARD DAVIS, BOSTON POLICE COMMISSIONER: ... as a result of the investigation, I'd like to remind citizens to treat any suspicious devices with care and to call 911 if any such device is found.

I'd like to introduce Governor Patrick.

Governor?

GOV. DEVAL PATRICK (D), MASSACHUSETTS: Commissioner, thank you.

I think we are all relieved that the devices found so far have proven to be hoax devices. We are very gratified by the prompt and professional response of all of law enforcement -- the commissioner and the mayor and his team, the transit police from the T, the state police, working cooperatively with the ATF. And we're very, very gratified that the response has been as prompt, as professional and as cooperative as it has been.

The investigation continues. There is more information to be developed. But I think we feel at this point that there is not a reason for anyone to panic, but there are reasons for us to be vigilant.

And, as I say, we are relieved and pleased that none of the devices have so far been found to pose a threat to public safety.

And I want to commend all of the leaders and members of law enforcement represented here with me and the lieutenant governor and Secretary Burke for the cooperation shown in pursuing today's events.

Mr. Mayor?

MAYOR THOMAS MENINO (D), BOSTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Governor.

Early this morning, I received a call from Commissioner Davis of a suspicious bomb in Sullivan Square in Cambridge. And from that point until right now, the Boston Police, the state police, the ATF and the BRIC, which is the Boston Regional Investigative Service, have been working together investigating all calls that they've got about suspicious bombs being in Boston and in Somerville.

I just want to say that every one of those so far has been investigated, either the Boston police and the federal and state folks are working on those investigations.

I just want to say to the public, you know, public safety officials, both the federal, state and city side, are all working together. Like the governor says, at no time anyone should panic. We believe we have the situation in hand and that to go about your business.

And Commissioner Davis said, we will have additional officers at different locations during the transit time this evening, as people make their way home, just to give the sense that we are out there and doing our jobs.

And it's just about all of us. And the individuals who might have placed these bombs, or these packages, I should say, should be warned that this is a heavy penalty. It's imprisonment, two to five years for each one of them. So, it's not -- we're not playing around. This is about keeping the city on edge.

It's about public safety. When it comes to public safety, we're throwing everything at it.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Mr. Mayor, we're hearing that Turner Broadcasting is saying...

(CROSSTALK)

MENINO: Well, Joe (ph), I'm not finished yet.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) apologize. We thought you were finished, Mr. Mayor.

MENINO: You're last in questions now.

(LAUGHTER)

MENINO: I just want to say that we're staying -- we will stay focused.

The unified command center will stay open as long as we deem necessary.

And I just want to finish up and say thanks for everyone working together. This is when public safety really rises to the occasion, because public safety, both in the federal, state, and seaside, have been doing their jobs since early in the morning, this morning, and they will continue the rest of the day.

Thank you. QUESTION: Mayor, do you have any idea about who might be behind this?

MENINO: I will ask the commissioner to answer those questions.

DOJ_NMG_0125485

DAVIS: This is a very active investigation. We are following numerous leads right now. And we're confident that those leads will bring us to an individual who was behind this.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... connection on some of these devices?

DAVIS: Well, this is part of the ongoing investigation. And I wouldn't make any specific comments at this point in time. This is a very active investigation.

We hope to have additional information for you specifically about individuals or parts of the investigation later this evening.

QUESTION: Did you search...

(CROSSTALK)

DAVIS: We did not.

QUESTION: Commissioner, can you speak to the toll that this has taken on the city, both in police resources and the time and the money in operating the command center, if this is a fact a hoax or some sort of advertising campaign?

DAVIS: This has taken a significant toll on our resources. Emergency deployment teams were sent into the center of the city immediately upon these reports. Bomb squad units from the transit police, the state police and the Boston police were fully deployed.

There were significant shutdowns of not only highways, but rail traffic with the MBTA. And this has created an enormous inconvenience to people in the city. So, we're going to fully investigate this and get to the bottom of it. And, thankfully, none of these devices have proven to be lethal.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Commissioner, do any of these devices have any common characteristics, or is there any indication at this point that any of the devices are connected in any way?

DAVIS: Yes, several of the devices do have common characteristics. But it's too early to say specifically how many are connected and how many are not.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... ease public fears and say either this is definitely not terrorism, this is some whack job, or this is a prank? Can you go in one direction there for us?

DAVIS: There are no indications in the investigation at this point in time that will indicate that this is a terrorist act. But, as to exactly who was behind it, the reasons, the motivations, I can't comment on that right now.

QUESTION: One person though, right, one person?

DAVIS: I can't comment right now.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... that someone thought this was funny, that this was a prank?

DAVIS: I would not comment on any of the ongoing investigation.

(CROSSTALK)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Last question. Last question, please.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Commissioner, apparently, Turner Broadcasting has issued a statement saying that this is some sort of marketing campaign for some cartoon. Have you heard this? Are you aware of this?

DAVIS: We're investigating numerous leads, numerous comments that were made that were phoned into us. We're looking at that as a possibility. But we're looking at all sorts of possibilities at this point in time. It really is premature for us to talk about where this investigation is going to go.

I want to make clear that people should not be afraid to come into or leave the city of Boston right now. There is nothing that we have found that indicates any danger to the people who are coming into and out of the city. We have additional police resources out there to make people feel safe. We're working very closely with the other police agencies represented here.

The governor and the mayor have joined us here at the police department. And we're doing everything we can to assure people that they should be safe right.

DOJ_NMG_0125486

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... commercial interests involved?

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... any commercial interests who are involved in this in any way...

BLITZER: All right, the police chief up in Boston, Ed Davis, speaking to reporters.

We heard from the mayor. We heard from the governor -- this investigation continuing.

But we're getting some new and significant information coming into THE SITUATION ROOM right now.

Dan Lothian is joining us from Boston.

What are you picking up, Dan?

DAN LOTHIAN, CNN BOSTON BUREAU CHIEF: Well, you heard at the press conference where someone kept asking law enforcement officials if this was part of some kind of advertising campaign. And law enforcement officials said that they did have some leads; they were talking with some people, and that they would have more information later on.

We can report this, a statement from Turner: "The packages in question are magnetic lights that pose no danger. They are part of an outdoor marketing campaign in 10 cities in support of Adult Swim's animated television show "Aqua Teen Hunger Force." They have been in place for two to three weeks in Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Austin, San Francisco, and Philadelphia. Parent company, Turner Broadcasting, is in contact with local and federal law enforcement officials on the exact location of the billboards."

And, then, from Turner Broadcasting, "We regret that they were mistakenly thought to pose any danger."

So, that's the very latest information. Obviously, this is something law enforcement is looking into. And this began this morning, the first incident that occurred this morning just north of downtown Boston, where there was some kind of package device found on I-93. They had to shut down the northbound lanes.

They brought in bomb teams, exploded that device safely -- officials saying at that time that it was not an explosive device. And, then throughout the day, we saw these other devices, at least five of them, if not more, showing up across the city -- Wolf.

BLITZER: So, it looks like this may just be a huge misunderstanding, some advertising devices put out at these billboards in these cities, part of a promotional campaign for the Cartoon Network's Adult Swim animated television programs.

That's what it looks like, based on the statement from our parent company, Turner Broadcasting.

Deb Feyerick is getting some more information as well.

Deb, what are you picking up?

DEBORAH FEYERICK, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, we can you tell that apparently this was done by a third-party marketing campaign, interference marketing, is what we are being told.

According to intelligence sources, the device itself was a circuit board about 15-by-12 inches long, with a character put together by LED light bulbs, almost like the lite-brites that you may remember. It was powered by four Duracell batteries.

We actually were able to call up an image of that device on a blog, makezine.com. It tells exactly how to make these things. So, whether that was something that was put out by the marketing campaign, but that is the image that was appearing. And when we went on the blog, we even found somebody that said: I saw the same thing up in Seattle.

So, this has been out there for a little while -- that posted about a week ago -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And our parent company, Turner Broadcasting, is in contact right now with federal and local law enforcement to try to work this out -- clearly -- apparently, at least, a major misunderstanding. These packages, as they were described, magnetic lights that pose absolutely no danger, but law enforcement authorities clearly taking no chances whatsoever.

We're going to continue to follow this. But it looks -- looks like a major misunderstanding caused this scenario to unfold in Boston.

Still to come: Senator Biden's underdog race for the White House stumbles out of the gate. Is the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee suffering from what his critics are calling foot-in-mouth disease? Mary Snow will have a live report.

And will the war in Iraq be the cloud hanging over the GOP's head for generations to come, or will Democrats overplay their hand? Bill Schneider's analysis straight ahead.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

DOJ_NMG_0125487

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: You can bet this is not the way Senator Joe Biden wanted to get his presidential campaign off the ground. Were his comments about fellow White House hopeful Barack Obama a case of loose lips or worse?

Let's go to CNN's Mary Snow. She's watching the story for us -- Mary.

MARY SNOW, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Biden was eager to talk about foreign policy, but he found himself having to explain comments he made about Senator Barack Obama Obama.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JOSEPH BIDEN (D-DE), SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN: I'm running for president because...

SNOW: On the very day Senator Joseph Biden launched his 2008 presidential campaign, controversy kicked in. In an interview with "The New York Observer," questions were raised when he use the word clean to describe fellow Democratic presidential contender Senator Barack Obama.

Here's what he said.

BIDEN: I mean, you have got the first sort of mainstream African-American, who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice- looking guy. I mean, it's -- that's a storybook, man.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Yes.

SNOW: And what does Senator Barack Obama think of that?

SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D), ILLINOIS: I mean, you would have to ask Senator -- Senator Biden what -- what he was thinking. I don't spend too much time worrying about what folks are talking about during the campaign season.

SNOW: But the Reverend Jesse Jackson, who ran against Biden for president in 1988, said Biden's comments called for an explanation.

REVEREND JESSE JACKSON, FOUNDER, RAINBOW/PUSH COALITION: I do not think he meant to say anything intentional that was off-color, but it certainly is highly suggestive.

SNOW: In a conference call, Senator Biden said his comments were taken out of context.

BIDEN: My mother has an expression: clean as a whistle, sharp as a tack. That's the context. He's crisp and clear.

LARRY SABATO, DIRECTOR, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA CENTER FOR POLITICS: It's classic Joe Biden. It's really history repeating itself.

SNOW: Biden dropped out of the 1988 presidential race following charges he plagiarized a speech of a British Labor Party leader. And, just last year, he caused controversy with comments that some had to hear for themselves to believe. The comments are still posted on the Internet.

BIDEN: You cannot go to a 7/Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent.

SNOW: Biden later explained the comment, saying he was referring to a vibrant Indian-American community in the state of Delaware.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SNOW: Now, this afternoon, Senator Obama told CNN that Senator Biden called him. He said it unnecessary, that he didn't think Senator Biden intended to offend anyone -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And, in that same interview in "The New York Observer," he was pretty critical of Senator Clinton and former Senator Edwards as well, two rivals for that Democratic presidential nomination. Mary, thanks for that.

Coming up in our "Strategy Session": The speaker, Nancy Pelosi, she is meeting over at the White House with President Bush right now. Is there some tough talk going on, on Iraq in the Oval Office?

Bay Buchanan and Donna Brazile, they are standing by to join us right here. Stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Let's get some analysis now on Joe Biden announcing formally his run for the White House today in our "Strategy Session" -- Democratic strategist Donna Brazile and her Republican counterpart, Bay Buchanan, the president of American Cause.

What do you make of this? What a way for Joe Biden to formally start his run for the White House.

DONNA BRAZILE, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: You know, Wolf, I was shocked to read those comments.

Look, I know Joe Biden. I believe his intentions are good. He has a strong civil rights record. But it came across pretty damaging. His first, you know, major event, his announcement, and he stepped on his own story by criticizing Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Edwards, even making some weird remarks about, you know, Al Gore and John Kerry...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: In the interview that appeared today in "The New York Observer."

But it's the comments about Barack Obama, Bay, where he says he's articulate and bright and clean and nice-looking guy, which I'm sure he meant in a good context.

BAY BUCHANAN, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: I'm sure.

BLITZER: But, to some people, that might be condescending, if you will.

BUCHANAN: There's no question.

If you read it as he said it, there is real question as to what it really means. Now, I agree with Donna. I think what he meant is clean-cut, just like he said he meant. Everything around it was positive.

But it's a major mistake as to, what is he thinking? What is he comparing this to? Was it -- is he different from -- in this way from Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson, who have run before as black Americans? He really has a lot of the explaining to do.

I think it's enormously damaging to him and it's unfortunate. But, in fairness, he took on every single candidate. (LAUGHTER)

BUCHANAN: He took them all out. His opening interview, he knocks every present and former major Democratic nominee -- candidate.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: How severe of a setback would this be, you think, for Senator Biden?

BRAZILE: I think it's going to continue to play across the board.

Look, I -- when he took on Barack Obama, that's one thing. But, to take on Jesse Jackson, Al Sharpton, to take on those who have also run for the presidency, that's -- they have a lot of support out there.

(CROSSTALK)

BRAZILE: So, I think Senator Biden will clean up his comments.

(CROSSTALK)

BRAZILE: And I believe he's already talked to Barack Obama. And Senator Obama said he's not going to make a lot out of it.

BUCHANAN: But, in fairness, America is looking for nice, candid, honest candidates. We have got one here, who likes to publicly assess his fellow Democrats. I say more credit to him. I'm memorizing all his lines as we go.

BLITZER: How worried are Republicans right now with these various resolutions that are moving forward, because we're hearing that there's really an emotionally driven divide among those Republicans?

BUCHANAN: On both sides. It's extremely emotional, Wolf.

And there's no question those who do not want to see these resolutions go forward make an excellent point, in the sense that they feel that this will indeed hamper, undermine the efforts of General Petraeus over there in Iraq. We -- obviously, no one in this country wants to see that happen.

And if indeed they are correct, I think every single senator should reconsider that vote, because nobody wants to see that happen.

BLITZER: We have got to leave it there, guys.

Thanks very much...

BRAZILE: Thank you.

BLITZER: ... Donna and Bay. And, coming up in our next hour, former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, she says the president's Iraq plan is more a prayer than a policy statement.

Also coming up: How can the U.S. avoid wasting millions of dollars in Iraq on things like an unused police academy and unaccounted-for weapons? Jack Cafferty with your e-mail right after this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Jack's back with "The Cafferty File" -- Jack.

CAFFERTY: So, before we get to the question, Wolf, I have a question.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: How long do you think it's going to be before Joe Biden announces he's decided not to run for president?

BLITZER: He's got a little explaining to do. And I'm sure he's working on that overtime right now.

CAFFERTY: You know, last night, here on THE SITUATION ROOM, we could have helped him. We were talking about these guys who train politicians not to stay stupid stuff. I guess Senator Biden wasn't watching last night.

The question, the other question, is: How can the United States avoid wasting millions of dollars in Iraq on things like unused police academy and unaccounted-for weapons?

Jonathan writes, "Well, maybe the first step is stopping the no- bid contracts to Halliburton and other friends of the vice president."

James in Florida: "Congress can do something other than passing nonbinding resolutions and symbolic statements, such as creating a committee that oversees reconstruction in Iraq that Congress actually oversees, you know, do their job."

Dan in Quebec: "Jack, the best way I could suggest managing the funds being grossly misspent in Iraq would be to have your trusted IRS agents do the dirty work. They come after hardworking Americans for a lot less than millions."

Joseph in Miami -- this is poignant -- "Listen, it's this waste that is the business of the war machine. And the only reason the war machine wants war, someone's profiting from all of this waste. The money doesn't really go into a toilet. It goes into someone's pocket. I wouldn't be surprised if that doesn't leak to the administration and its extended cronies, including its Iraq cronies. It's all a business deal. And young kids think their dying is about freedom. Bunk."

Tony in Ohio: "I will answer your question by asking one of my own. What has happened to the premise put forth by the Bush administration at the beginning of the war, that we will use the Iraqi oil to pay for the reconstruction of that country? Where's the oil? And who's making the money from it?"

And Bob in Oklahoma: "Let's send a real decision-maker, Donald Trump, to make some decisions about our construction money" -- Wolf.

BLITZER: A Trump Towers in Baghdad, I can only imagine what that would be like.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Jack, stand by. We're going to get back to you soon.

Still to come: The war in Iraq, will it hang over the GOP for years to come, or will the Democrats overplay their hand? Bill Schneider's take is coming up.

And Senator Lindsey Graham, he is looking for a way to keep his Republican Party united on the war in Iraq. Senator Graham joins us in the next hour, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: In Iraq right now, lives are on the line, including those of American troops. The political stakes pale by comparison. But they will be a critical part of the legacy of this war and of President Bush.

Our senior political analyst, Bill Schneider, is standing by with more -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Wolf, could the Iraq issue change the long-term political landscape? It is a possibility.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER (voice-over): Disillusionment with the war in Iraq has produced a dramatic shift in the polls.

"The Washington Post"/ABC News poll asks: Who do you trust to do a better job handling the campaign against terrorism, President Bush or the Democrats? In 2003, President Bush had a 51-point advantage. In 2004, Bush was ahead by 29 points. And now? People say they trust the Democrats more than President Bush on terrorism.

Republicans won the 2002 and 2004 elections as the daddy party, the party that would do a better job protecting the country. But it didn't work in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0125490

In 2002, Republicans had a 35-point lead over Democrats on handling terrorism. Now the parties are virtually tied. That gives Democrats an opening. But they can't make the same mistakes they made in the 1970s. Then, anti-war sentiment made the Democrats look weak on national security. The loss of Vietnam, followed a few years later by the Iran hostage crisis, made Americans feel vulnerable. Enter Ronald Reagan and a new era of Republican dominance.

Now Democrats are trying to make it clear that opposition to the war in Iraq does not mean weakness in the war on terror. The public no longer believes the war in Iraq is part of the war on terrorism. The best way to fight the war on terror, Democrats argue, is to get out of Iraq.

SEN. RUSS FEINGOLD (D), WISCONSIN: Our Iraq-centric policies are hurting our ability to defeat the enemy that attacked us on 9/11.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: The daddy party may be in trouble.

Political analyst James Pinkerton of the New America Foundation put it this way in an interview with "The San Francisco Chronicle" -- quote -- "In times of war, the instinct is to trust dad more than mom. And the Republicans have benefited from that. But, if dad keeps wrecking the car, there may be reason to change" -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Bill Schneider, reporting, thank you.

Can Sen. Clinton Be Elected To The White House In 2008? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, February 1, 2007

If activists, political insiders and journalists are asking whether former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani can win the Republican nomination for president, they are equally consumed with the question of whether Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) can win the White House.

Let's skip the suspense and cut right to the answer: Yes.

While some of my colleagues doubt that the New York Senator can overcome her high negative ratings and attract a majority of the electorate in her bid for the White House, I've come to the conclusion that she can, as long as she runs the high-quality campaign I think she can.

Let me be very clear: I am not predicting that Clinton will win in 2008. I'm not even predicting that she will be the Democratic nominee. What I am saying is that I don't agree with those who have concluded that her negatives are so great that she cannot beat a strong Republican nominee next year.

Every White House hopeful in history — and I am not exaggerating when I say "every" — has begun the race with a number of question marks. For some, the question was experience. For others, ideology. For still others, it was a question of style or substance or ability to connect with real people.

Clinton is not without such questions. Is she "warm" enough to make voters feel comfortable voting for her? Is a majority of the electorate ready to elect a woman? How will she deal with the double-edged sword of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who simultaneously is an asset and a liability in her White House bid? Did she alienate so many people as first lady that a majority of voters in key states simply will not cast their votes for her?

There is no debate about this: The Senator's campaign will need to address these questions — and others, including the aforementioned electability question — and deal with them successfully if she is going to have a chance of winning the White House. There's no doubt that she has political baggage.

But Sen. Clinton isn't the only hopeful with weaknesses to strengthen and questions to answer. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) will have to answer questions about his age and health, as well as his Iraq position and his wooing of conservatives. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) will have to deal with his multiple positions on abortion and, yes, his religion. And Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will have to deal with his inexperience, just as former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) will have to address his lack of foreign policy experience.

Polling released over the past few weeks doesn't support the argument that Clinton is unelectable.

DOJ_NMG_0125491

A Jan. 18-21 CBS News poll of adults showed that Clinton's favorable and unfavorable ratings are identical at 36 percent. A Jan. 16-19 ABC News/Washington Post survey of adults found that her personal ratings were 54 percent favorable and 44 percent unfavorable. While the Senator's negatives are high, they certainly don't appear high enough to prevent her from wining a presidential election.

A Jan. 5-7 Gallup/USA Today poll of adults found that only 34 percent of Democrats and independents who lean Democratic said they "definitely" would support Clinton for president, while 52 percent said they would "consider" supporting her, and 14 percent said they "definitely" would not support her.

If Clinton had to start a general election having to write off one out of every seven Democrats, she would be in a serious general election hole. But I'm very skeptical about people knowing how they'll feel and how they'll behave a year or two from now. And I expect that some of those who insist they will never vote for her will in fact vote for Clinton if she is the Democratic nominee.

In the meantime, the CBS survey offered some very good news for Clinton. More than two out of three respondents — and 84 percent of Democrats — said Clinton "has strong leadership qualities," and 59 percent said she has "the right kind of experience to be a good president." Finally, a majority of those questioned, 53 percent, said Clinton could win the presidential election if nominated by her party.

When ABC News/Washington Post pollsters asked respondents about hypothetical White House matchups, Clinton beat McCain, 50 percent to 45 percent, and she beat Giuliani, 49 percent to 47 percent. While these ballot tests don't guarantee that Clinton would win those races, they do strongly suggest that it's a mistake to dismiss her as unelectable.

Finally, assertions that Clinton's polarizing reputation and name make her unelectable ignore history. I remember some New York political observers questioning the then-first lady's electability in New York when she announced for the Senate. But she went to the most Republican part of the state — upstate — and won over her skeptics. There is no reason to believe that she couldn't do that in Ohio, Iowa, New Mexico and the handful of other competitive states that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) lost in 2004. Remember, it's irrelevant that Clinton can't carry Mississippi or Utah. She won't need them.

Moreover, elections involve choices, and often those choices involve the lesser of two evils. No matter what personal baggage she carries, the Senator surely would have targets of opportunity in 2008, including the GOP nominee, the outgoing president and the now-damaged Republican Party brand. Her job would be to make the election about Bush and to position herself as a force for change, competence and accomplishment.

Then-Vice President Al Gore and Kerry, Democratic presidential nominees with considerable weaknesses, narrowly lost presidential elections in 2000 and 2004, respectively. Gore even carried the popular vote. Whatever her liabilities, it's hard to see Clinton losing large numbers of voters who were willing to pull the lever for Gore and Kerry. She would lose some, but not many. In my book, that's reason enough for believing that she would have a reasonable chance of wining the White House in 2008.

President Clinton (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

Senator Hillary Clinton is waging two presidential campaigns at once. She is running for the Democratic presidential nomination while keeping a sharp eye on the general election campaign against the Republican presidential nominee, whoever that turns out to be. Mrs. Clinton wants to run as a centrist, not a liberal, in the general election. But there's a problem. She is being tugged to the left in the nomination fight, forced to take positions that may jeopardize her chances later against the Republican candidate.

Her opponents in the Democratic primaries next year don't have this problem. They are unabashed liberals who have done nothing to place themselves near the ideological center of American politics. Mrs. Clinton, however, spent her first term as senator from New York downplaying her image as a staunch liberal. Instead, she has sought with some success to fashion a reputation as a centrist on some several key issues, particularly national security. And while doing so, she became the undisputed frontrunner for the 2008 Democratic nomination. She became electable.

A glance at the breakdown of red and blue states in the 2004 presidential race shows how little it would take for her to win the general election. If she holds the states won by Democrat John Kerry, she would need to add only one populous red state or two smaller ones. And there are numerous Republican states that have drifted toward the Democrats since 2004 -- Ohio, Colorado, Iowa, Montana, Nevada, Arizona and Virginia, just to name a few.

But Mrs. Clinton's ability to pick up one or two of these red states depends on her maintaining credibility as a centrist on key issues. That is a difficult task. Given the pressure from her party's liberal base and from her Democratic opponents for the presidential nomination, it's now very much in doubt whether she can accomplish it. She's already becoming more liberal than it's safe to be in a presidential election in a nation with an enduring center-right majority.

As surprising as this may sound, Mrs. Clinton starts her campaign as the Democratic candidate furthest to the right. The only two Democrats who might have gotten to her right -- Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana and former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia -- dropped out of the race. So she faces competition from a phalanx of liberals, two of whom -- Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Democratic vice presidential candidate John Edwards -- are formidable opponents.

In her six years in the Senate, Mrs. Clinton has gone a good ways toward achieving the threshold requirement for a female candidate for president: making herself believable as a commander in chief. She did this by spending long hours at Senate Armed Services Committee hearings, forging a supportive relationship with Donald Rumsfeld, and voting in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq.

She became conversant on defense issues. At a breakfast with reporters in late 2003, I asked her if there had been good reason to believe, as President Bush did, that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. "The intelligence from Bush 1 to Clinton to Bush 2 was consistent," she said, in concluding Saddam had chemical and biological weapons and was developing nuclear weapons.

Mrs. Clinton had done her own "due diligence," she went on, by attending classified briefings on Capitol Hill and at the White House and the Pentagon, and also by consulting national security officials from the Clinton administration whom she trusted. All agreed Saddam had WMD. Now, an investigation was needed on how everyone had been "so misled," Mrs. Clinton said. But she declined to endorse the theory of Sen. Edward Kennedy that the existence of WMD was a "fraud" cooked up by Mr. Bush to justify the war in Iraq.

It was a strong answer and I was impressed. Mrs. Clinton further burnished her credentials as a serious person on national security affairs by refusing once the war turned unpopular to repudiate her vote, as Mr. Edwards had. (Mr. Obama, as a state legislator, had opposed the war from the outset.) She criticized the conduct of the postwar occupation and suggested there might never have been a vote to go to war had it been known Saddam had no WMD. But this was the standard sort of second-guessing by a senator, Democrat or Republican.

Then came January 2007 and two events: the sudden effort by Democrats to compel Mr. Bush to bring the Iraq war to an end and the just-as-sudden acceleration of the presidential race. Mrs. Clinton joined the stampede to cast the president and the war in the most pessimistic light. She dramatically escalated her criticism.

First, after a trip to Iraq, she called for a cap on American troops in Iraq at the current level of 137,000, thus no "surge" in the number of troops. At a Senate hearing a few days later, Mrs. Clinton lectured Gen. David Petraeus, the new Iraq commander, on the appropriate counterinsurgency strategy in Baghdad; she asked the general, the Army's foremost expert on counterinsurgency, no questions. Then during her first campaign trip to Iowa, she demanded Mr. Bush "extricate our country" from Iraq before he leaves office.

It was as if all the pressure had gotten to Mrs. Clinton and she'd forgotten her need to remain resolute on national security. Rather than acting like a potential president, she acted like a bickering senator. She put the reputation she'd earned for seriousness on national security at risk. That the Iraq war was unpopular in 2006 and early 2007 probably won't help her in 2008, when Mr. Bush is stepping down.

The question now is whether Mrs. Clinton will stand up to the political pressure to move left on other issues. In 2005, she boldly reached out to pro-lifers, calling abortion "a sad, even tragic choice to many, many women." She said both sides in the abortion debate should seek "common ground." Will she repeat that when she and the other Democrats appear before groups like Naral Pro-Choice America?

And on health care, Mrs. Clinton insists she's learned from her painful experience of authoring a failed national plan in 1993 that relied heavily on government mandates. Lobbyists for health-care groups say she speaks approvingly now of injecting free-market incentives into the system. But will she advocate them as part of a centrist health-care initiative in the Democratic primaries?

Presidential campaigns are unfair to liberals. The American electorate prefers presidents to be centrists (Bill Clinton, the elder George Bush) or conservatives (Ronald Reagan, the younger George Bush). Voters usually opt for a presidential candidate who is tough-minded, rather than wavering or vulnerable to fleeting passions, on one issue above all, national security. Hillary Clinton was well on her way to becoming such a candidate. Until now.

Giuliani: Can Hero Of 9/11 Win Over His Own Party? (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, February 1, 2007

BRETTON WOODS, N.H. — Rudy Giuliani would seem to have all the credentials a candidate for president could want: A hero of 9/11, a crime-busting federal prosecutor, a two-term Republican mayor in an overwhelmingly Democratic city and one of the most admired politicians in the country.

He's got a big problem, though. First, he has to be nominated by Republicans who don't yet know his views on social issues.

"People remember how he provided leadership at a time the city needed it and the country needed it," coin-company executive Jeff Marsh, 41, says as he waits to greet Giuliani at the annual dinner of the Littleton (N.H.) Chamber of Commerce. While Marsh's admiration of Giuliani the man is evident, his support for Giuliani the presidential candidate is no sure thing. Giuliani's advocacy of abortion rights gives him "some pause," Marsh says ruefully.

The question is this: Can the thrice-married New Yorker — a supporter of abortion rights, gay rights and gun control — win the nomination of a Republican Party that has become increasingly dependent on and influenced by conservative Christians?

Maybe not, says Tony Fabrizio, a GOP pollster who advised Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign.

"As a presidential candidate, Rudy Giuliani should absolutely be taken seriously," Fabrizio says. "As a contender for the Republican nomination, he should be taken significantly less seriously. He has the stature to be president, but how does he get the Republican nomination? That is the fundamental disconnect."

Republicans tend to stick with front-runners. In each of the last nine presidential elections, the GOP contender who led the field the year before the election has won the nomination. Despite Giuliani's edge at the starting line, however, there is widespread skepticism among insiders such as Fabrizio whether he'll be there at the finish.

With the war in Iraq raging and terrorism a global threat, Giuliani's campaign could measure just how powerful social issues continue to be in the GOP. "He may be the candidate to test that proposition," says former Republican national chairman Ed Gillespie, now the party's state chairman in Virginia.

At least at the moment, Giuliani leads the Republican field, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds. He holds a narrow advantage over Arizona Sen. John McCain, who is often identified as the party's front-runner. In January, 31% of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents said Giuliani was their likely preference for president; 27% chose McCain. Former House speaker Newt Gingrich was third at 10%.

In a head-to-head contest, Giuliani beat McCain 50%-42%.

Giuliani, who declined to be interviewed for this story, also shows appeal beyond the GOP.

Dubbed "America's mayor" after he led New York City's response to the Sept. 11 attacks, Giuliani had a nearly 4-1 favorable rating among all those polled. McCain had a 2-1 favorable rating, and the rating for Democratic hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton was only a bit more positive than negative.

"I have great admiration for how he handled everything in New York," says Jan Mercieri, an independent married to Littleton's fire chief. She's brought a book profiling first responders who died during 9/11 for Giuliani to autograph before he speaks to the dinner. It's being held at the Mount Washington Hotel here, where the Bretton Woods monetary conference convened after World War II. ("God bless you for your service to our people and God bless America," he writes.)

"I think it touched everybody," she says of his take-charge actions on that day, tears welling in her eyes even now.

DOJ_NMG_0125494

As fondly remembered as Giuliani is for responding to Sept. 11, however, most Americans don't know much else about him. Barely one in five Republicans knew that he supports abortion rights and civil unions for same-sex couples, the USA TODAY poll found. Nearly as many thought he was "pro-life" as said he was "pro-choice."

When they were told about his stance on those issues, his star dimmed. One in five Republicans said his views would "rule him out as a candidate" they could support. That included one-third of those who attend church every week, an important base of the GOP that makes up a third of party loyalists.

Another 25% of Republicans said his views made them less likely to support him, nearly double the proportion who said they made them more likely to support him.

Even some Republicans who see Giuliani as a stronger general-election candidate question if he can be nominated. A Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday showed Republicans split evenly over whether Giuliani or McCain had a better chance of winning the nomination, though by 17 percentage points they thought Giuliani had a better shot at defeating the Democratic candidate in November.

"He's a fine guy, and he certainly has a sterling record as mayor of New York," George Lovejoy, 75 and courtly, says the next morning. The former New Hampshire state senator, a real estate agent in Barrington, applauds politely as Giuliani addresses the annual state GOP meeting in Manchester. Could he be the presidential nominee?

"I don't think it's likely," Lovejoy says. He is backing former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who now opposes abortion rights after supporting them earlier in his career. "Our strong focus as Republicans has been on social issues as well as tax-and-spend issues. That's what's made us strong."

Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, calls Giuliani "unacceptable" as a nominee. Conservative Christian leaders haven't targeted him because they assume "he's not going to go anywhere" once the campaign begins in earnest — but Perkins says they're ready to mobilize against him if he seems to gain traction.

Giuliani's strategists recognize his vulnerabilities. A campaign memo leaked to the New York Daily News last month and acknowledged as authentic by spokeswoman Sunny Mindel listed some of them: questions about his private-sector businesses, which have made him a millionaire and entangled him with clients from thoroughbred racing to the energy industry. Controversies around his current and former wives, a soap-opera saga played out in public. His stance on social issues, to the left of any major GOP contender since the party adopted an unyielding anti-abortion line in its 1980 platform.

"Probs (problems) that are insurm (insurmountable)?" asks the memo. "Does any of it cause RWG (Giuliani) to lose his lustre?"

In New Hampshire, Giuliani tries a response, portraying himself as a strong leader who can be trusted despite differences he may have with a voter on a particular issue.

"The single most important part of leadership … is to figure out what you believe, figure out what's important, have convictions, stand for something," he says in his speech here, stepping to the side of the podium to get closer to the audience and punching his hand in the air for emphasis. "I would prefer to support for president or head of a corporation, mayor, head of an anything — somebody who stands for something, even if I don't agree with them completely."

He cites a bipartisan trio — Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan — as great presidents who earned support even from those who might have disagreed with them on this or that. "I don't even agree with myself on everything," he jokes.

Famously combative as mayor, he tries to convey a warmer side on the stump. He repeatedly refers to his wife, Judith, a petite woman in a black turtleneck and oversized pearls who smiles from the audience; they walk out of the ballroom hand-in-hand. They were married in 2003 after his messy divorce from Donna Hanover, who says she learned they were separating when he announced it at a news conference. Giuliani's first marriage was annulled after 14 years.

Giuliani has honed his skills as a motivational speaker in considerable demand since 9/11; Forbes magazine estimates he charges $100,000 a speech, though he declines to accept even travel expenses from the New Hampshire group. He wears a tailored pinstriped suit, crisp shirt and glossy blue tie. His manner is conversational and occasionally self-deprecating — mentioning, for instance, that he was knighted by Queen Elizabeth but then adding that he doesn't bring that up in Brooklyn.

"Did you know I was from New York?" he asks to laughter.

DOJ_NMG_0125495

Actually, his hometown may turn out to be yet another vulnerability. Not since DeWitt Clinton won the governorship in 1817 has a New York mayor been elected to a higher office. Not even Clinton, the Federalist presidential candidate in 1812, managed to make it to the White House.

Giuliani backed away from a tough contest before. In 2000, he had formed an exploratory committee and begun raising money for a Senate campaign against Hillary Clinton but then abandoned it after he was diagnosed with prostate cancer. He is now recovered.

This time, he's formed an exploratory committee and started fundraising with a goal of $25 million by March 31, when Federal Election Commission reports will provide a comparison among presidential contenders. He's begun hiring campaign staffers in Iowa and New Hampshire, which hold the opening caucuses and first primary. He heads this weekend to South Carolina, site of the second primary.

Republicans in the Palmetto State will judge the contenders based on "the entire package, not a single issue," Katon Dawson, South Carolina's Republican chairman, says when asked about Giuliani's views on abortion and gay rights. Still, he adds: "Those are issues important to the core of our party."

A Giuliani game plan might go like this: Finish in the top tier of candidates in Iowa, then win or at least finish second in New Hampshire, a Northeast state with a libertarian streak. (That would mean besting McCain, who won the primary over George W. Bush in 2000, and/or Romney, the former governor of neighboring Massachusetts.) Then Giuliani would need to survive in South Carolina, a Deep South state with a solidly conservative electorate.

If all that happens, he could be well positioned for the unprecedented crush of primaries on Feb. 5 that may include California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey.

"We feel very good about the consolidation of primaries on an early date," says Michael DuHaime, a former political director of the Republican National Committee who is poised to run Giuliani's campaign. Contests in those big states would favor candidates with high name identification and deep pockets — that is, candidates like him.

Some Republicans believe Giuliani would be better able than McCain to deal with anti-Washington sentiment and the anti-GOP tide that cost the party control of Congress in November's elections.

"I'll tell you who's going to win the nomination," declares Bill Williams, 72, of Franconia, head of the New Hampshire Rural Development Corp. and a former congressional aide who was attending the Littleton dinner. "It's going to be a non-federally employed individual — a governor or a mayor."

The next day, before heading to Providence for a fundraiser, Giuliani and his wife drop by Blake's Diner in Manchester to shake hands with local residents and share lunch. He orders a pita stuffed with chicken fajita ingredients after a fellow patron recommends it. She gets a bacon cheeseburger.

The reception in New Hampshire has been "encouraging," he tells a few reporters as he leaves. The retail campaigning demanded in New Hampshire feels "familiar," like a mayor's race. He says Republicans, downbeat after congressional setbacks in November, need the sort of encouragement and optimism that he's ready to provide.

"So why wouldn't you run?" Anita Siegfriedt of Fox News asks.

"That's a good question," he says, and laughs.

Franken Saying He'll Run For Senate (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 1, 2007

Star Tribune WASHINGTON - Comedian and radio talk show host Al Franken has begun calling Democratic members of Congress and prominent DFLers to tell them he will definitely challenge Republican Sen. Norm Coleman in 2008, the Star Tribune learned Wednesday.

On Monday, Franken announced that he is quitting his radio show on Feb. 14, and he told his audience that they'd be the first to know of his decision. But Franken has been working the phones, telling his political friends he's ready to declare his candidacy.

Franken made calls to at least two members of the Minnesota congressional delegation in Washington and one member of the Legislature to break the news. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity, not wanting to be identified as pre-empting Franken's announcement.

"From his voice to my ears, he's running," said one House member, who relayed the remark via his press secretary.

"I can tell you we got one of those calls," said a top-ranked aide for another House member.

A long-time DFL state House member said she was happy to receive a call from Franken. "He said he's in and he just wanted to let me know."

Franken declined to be interviewed.

"He's not going to comment on his private conversations," said Andy Barr, his spokesman. But he added that Franken has "made no secret" of his interest in Coleman's seat.

No other big-name Democrats have announced plans to challenge Coleman, who's expected to be among the most vulnerable GOP incumbents next year.

Franken, who grew up in St. Louis Park, achieved fame in New York as a comedy writer for NBC-TV's "Saturday Night Live" and went on to become a best-selling author. He moved his radio show to Minneapolis last year and has become increasingly active in Minnesota and national politics.

His Midwest Values political action committee raised more than $1.1 million and he distributed checks of $10,000 each last year to Democratic Sens. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota and Claire McCaskill of Missouri and to Rep. Tim Walz, D-Minn.; he gave smaller amounts to dozens of other national and state candidates.

After seeing an account of Franken's calls on the Star Tribune website, Minnesota Republican Party Chairman Ron Carey issued a statement criticizing Franken's "anger and slash-and-burn partisanship."

Coleman himself has had little to say about Franken, but in an interview last year he said he expected him to be "a very strong voice for the far left" and a strong fundraiser. Republicans will try to exploit Franken's ties to Hollywood: Contributors to his political action committee have included Barbra Streisand, Phil Donahue, Larry Hagman and Norman Lear from the entertainment industry, as well as former Minnesota Gov. Wendell Anderson and Minneapolis attorney Sam Kaplan.

Franken expects his years in New York to be an issue in the campaign but has had a ready line as he promotes himself to Minnesota audiences: "If I do run against Norm Coleman in '08, I'll be the only New York Jew in the race who actually grew up in Minnesota."

Coleman grew up in New York and moved to Minnesota as an adult.

Comedian Al Franken To Run For Senate (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, February 1, 2007

Comedian Al Franken has decided to run for the U.S. Senate from Minnesota in 2008, a senior Democratic official from Minnesota said Wednesday.

Franken told the official, who did not want to be identified because Franken has not made an announcement, that he had decided to run in a recent conversation.

Andy Barr, the political director of Franken's Midwest Values Political Action Committee, declined to comment.

The news was not unexpected. Franken has been calling members of the Minnesota congressional delegation to get their input on a run, and he announced this week that he would be leaving his show on Air America Radio on Feb. 14. He told listeners he would be making a decision on a race soon.

In a statement, Minnesota Republican Party Chairman Ron Carey said he was confident Minnesotans "will reject Franken's divisive, scorched-earth attacks." The state Democratic Party declined to comment.

Should he win the Democratic primary in Minnesota, Franken would take on Republican Norm Coleman, a first-term senator who is among the Democrats' top targets. Coleman declined to comment Wednesday.

Franken, 55, was born in New York City, like Coleman, but grew up in St. Louis Park, a suburb of Minneapolis. He was a performer and writer on television's "Saturday Night Live" before writing best-selling books combining humor and politics.

DOJ_NMG_0125497

His PAC raised nearly $1 million last year. Although Franken can't use that money for his Senate campaign, it shows he shouldn't have a problem raising money.

Coleman reported about $1.7 million in his bank account as of Dec. 31.

Franken faces major challenges, said Larry Jacobs, a political science professor at the University of Minnesota. Besides needing to establish himself as a serious candidate, Franken has staked out left-wing policies that make it questionable whether he can win independent voters, Jacobs said.

Spitzer's First Budget Assails Health Care System (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

ALBANY, Jan. 31 — Gov. Eliot Spitzer proposed to radically restructure aid to New York's sprawling health care industry in his first budget Wednesday, saying that the system props up failing hospitals and too often overlooks patients' needs, while consuming roughly a third of the state's budget.

The health care changes were among several ambitious proposals that the new governor outlined in his $120.6 billion budget, which would increase overall spending by 6.3 percent — about double the rate of inflation — and cut $1.2 billion from existing health care programs. The cuts would offset billions of dollars worth of proposed property tax cuts and increased education aid.

Many of the governor's ideas, which followed up on his campaign pledge to toss aside the conventional way of doing business in Albany, would indeed reshape the way the state operates. But they face tough going in the Legislature, where Mr. Spitzer's brash style has already put him on a collision course with the top legislative leaders, prematurely ending the political honeymoon that often greets newly elected governors. [News analysis, Page B5.]

To control health care spending, Mr. Spitzer would hold the growth of Medicaid to 1.7 percent, compared to 8 percent growth rates in recent years, by cutting subsidies to hospitals and nursing homes, slashing Medicaid reimbursement rates and by stepping up efforts to combat fraud. Conversely, he outlined a plan to make low-cost health insurance coverage available to the state's 400,000 uninsured children.

His budget also called for several other major measures.

One was an education plan that would increase state aid to schools by $7 billion annually within four years and throw out the complex formula used to distribute school aid around the state. New York City would receive $3.17 billion more annually within four years, with the expectation that the city stick to Mayor Michael Bloomberg's plan to increase its own spending by $2.2 billion annually within four years.

But a new municipal-aid formula would favor impoverished cities and take nearly $350 million a year away from New York City.

The budget also includes a $1,000- per-child tax deduction for private school tuition. Similar proposals failed to pass under the previous governor.

Another was a $6 billion, three-year property tax relief plan that would focus new aid on middle-class homeowners, granting an average of $920 in relief for such families in the New York suburbs and an average of $512 upstate. The Senate has proposed distributing the same amount of money in two years in a more broadly based manner.

A third major proposal would increase the state work force by nearly 2,500, including 355 workers who would carry out new policies on civil commitment of sexually violent predators. The governor also proposed creating 166 new environmental and conservation jobs, and create an office specializing in climate change to look at ways to reduce global warming.

Mr. Spitzer, readying for a fight over the health care cuts and school aid, told lawmakers on Wednesday morning that he would take his case to the public. Polls show the governor is far more popular than the Legislature.

"I'm going to be out there talking to voters, citizens, homeowners, taxpayers, editorial boards," the governor said in his speech to lawmakers. "I'm going to be speaking to anybody who will listen. This is not a debate that will be cloistered in the halls of this building. This is a debate that I plan to bring to the people."

DOJ_NMG_0125498

The Republican Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, a frequent ally of the health care industry, said he had "serious differences" with the governor's proposals, and also took aim at his style.

"When you're governing, it's all about compromise," he added. People who "draw lines in the sand don't get on-time budgets. They don't get results."

In taking on the health care system, Mr. Spitzer is confronting the nation's costliest Medicaid program, one that helps support an expansive but money-losing hospital industry with arcane financing rules often designed to keep state aid in place, no matter the effect on patient care.

The health care proposals drew a sharp and immediate response from two politically powerful interest groups, the Greater New York Hospital Association and 1199 S.E.I.U., the health care workers' union, which, in a joint statement, said the governor's health proposals were "riddled with inaccuracies."

Those two groups have cultivated close ties to legislators and spent millions on political contributions, and in the past have defeated similar proposed cuts by saturating the airwaves with television commercials explaining their viewpoint.

The governor's Medicaid proposals would freeze reimbursement rates to hospitals and nursing homes, lower reimbursements to pharmacies and overhaul payments to hospitals to help them increase salaries.

But many advocacy groups were supportive, saying the proposals brought needed reform to a byzantine system of paying for health care. Michael Kink, legislative counsel of Housing Works, an advocacy and service organization for people with AIDS, said the governor "moves health care money towards patients and front-line care providers, and away from big institutions that don't serve many Medicaid beneficiaries."

For his part, the governor contended that "every patient will come out ahead in the long run," adding that large hospitals and nursing homes "can afford it."

"They are the ones who have received almost an unending supply of capital and cash over the last 10 or 15 years," he said. "They will have to rationalize their own operations to make themselves accountable for those dollars they are getting."

Kenneth E. Raske, the president of the Greater New York Hospital Association, said the cuts could hurt patient care. "He cuts us and we have to cut into the operations of the hospitals, particularly since no one has helped us by putting a freeze on our cost of doing business," he said.

The governor's proposed spending increases exceeded former Gov. George E. Pataki's proposals in his executive budget a year ago — which were just over 4 percent for the total budget. But in his speech, Mr. Spitzer emphasized that his proposals were far lower than the final budget that the Legislature enacted, which increased spending overall by more than 9 percent.

Dealing just with the state's spending of its own money, not federal aid, the governor is proposing to increase total state spending 7.8 percent, to $83.6 billion, or about three times the rate of inflation projected for the state.

Edmund J. McMahon, the director of the Empire Center for New York State Policy, an affiliate of the conservative policy group the Manhattan Institute, called the proposed spending increase the largest in an executive budget "since Pataki's first election-year budget."

"Unless the normal law of physics is suspended, it lays the groundwork for a big increase," in spending, he said.

The governor said he was not proposing any new taxes, but Republicans disagreed, pointing to $449 million in business-tax loopholes that the governor is proposing to close and $67.7 million in new or higher fees in the budget. The governor also said he would create a special commission to explore whether some of the state's prisons can be closed.

The governor warned lawmakers not to spend more than he was proposing, a notion that made some lawmakers roll their eyes.

"I think it's kind of naïve to think you're going to give this budget to the Legislature and they're not going to enhance it in some way," said James Tedisco, the leader of Republicans in the Assembly.

A Health Care Plan Both Ambitious And Contentious (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125499

The budget Gov. Eliot Spitzer laid out yesterday represents the first stages of an ambitious health care agenda, including covering hundreds of thousands of uninsured people with government health plans, and broadly revising how Medicaid money is distributed.

It also contains the seeds of an epic battle — $1.2 billion a year in cuts — that could make everything else he wants harder to attain. The proposed cuts, mostly in Medicaid, the health plan for the poor, pit the governor against the Legislature, health care workers and the hospital industry — powerful camps that welcome some of his ideas, but that fiercely protect their share of Medicaid spending.

Mr. Spitzer proposed setting the nation's most generous boundaries for state-subsidized children's health insurance. He would raise the income ceiling for families to cover children, at little cost, through Child Health Plus, to about $82,000 from about $51,000.

That would make affordable insurance available to nearly all of New York State's 400,000 uninsured children, his administration says. In addition, Mr. Spitzer called for simpler rules for renewing Medicaid coverage, which his assistants said would increase enrollment by 100,000, by keeping eligible people from dropping out.

For now, the attention is on proposed cuts that would reduce hospitals' overall income by about 1 percent, a significant hit for a money-losing industry that may face other cuts from Washington. But New York has the nation's largest Medicaid program by far, at $46.5 billion, and the governor's proposals would merely restrain its growth to $1.1 billion during the next year.

"The most significant piece of the budget, the one program that's become, and rightly so, the evidence of spiraling and unwieldy spending, is our Medicaid system," Mr. Spitzer said.

But the governor and members of his staff say they are after something more subtle and audacious than cost-cutting. The goal, they say, is to make Medicaid make sense — starting with revising old financing formulas that no longer reflect reality.

Eventually, Mr. Spitzer said, the state will make Medicaid more uniform and efficient by taking over local government's role in running it, and it will conduct a top-to-bottom review of what Medicaid pays for each service, adjusting prices to correct shortages of some services and gluts of others.

None of that consoles 1199 S.E.I.U. United Health Care Workers East, the main hospital and nursing home workers' union, or the Greater New York Hospital Association. They praised some of the governor's plans, but said that his cuts would do real harm.

"We're basically at break-even, so this cuts into operations," said Kenneth E. Raske, president of the hospital group.

Former Gov. George E. Pataki proposed similar cuts year after year, usually unsuccessfully, and eventually they came to be seen as mere opening bids in budget talks. But 1199 and the industry have reacted heatedly to Mr. Spitzer's plans, protesting that he has not met with them, and objecting to his spoiling-for-a-fight tone.

Mr. Spitzer has publicly blamed the union and hospitals t for out-of-control spending. Yesterday, he talked about institutions that,"through a combination of persuasive argument, political strength and effective presence here in Albany," drive state spending.

Dennis Rivera, president of 1199, called that "an attack on each and every one of 600,000 health care workers in New York State." He and Mr. Raske control a rich political action fund that can be used to finance attacks against politicians, but they have not yet threatened to go that route.

Mr. Rivera noted that the union and the industry recently accepted a state plan to close and merge a number of hospitals. "After doing that, to turn around and attack us as entrenched interest groups" is unfair, he said.

Mr. Spitzer proposed a one-year freeze on Medicaid payments to hospitals and nursing homes, eliminating an expected increase worth $182 million.

In other areas, he would cut the money and rearrange it, creating a set of winners and losers that Mr. Raske and his group are still sorting out.

Mr. Spitzer would end the practice of paying hospitals to train young doctors, paying each hospital based in part on how many doctors a hospital had in 1981, even if the number has declined sharply. He proposed cutting $96 million from that program, about 6 percent of the total.

DOJ_NMG_0125500

He called for a $40 million reduction in money to boost the salaries of low-wage workers — many of them 1199 members — and train them for new jobs. And again, he would rearrange the money, to favor hospitals that treat mostly Medicaid patients.

Other proposals would not directly affect the hospital industry, like tighter restrictions on which drugs Medicaid patients get, for a savings of more than $200 million, and more aggressive antifraud measures.

Governor Spitzer's Pivotal Budget (NYT)

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Gov. Eliot Spitzer described his first New York State budget yesterday as a "pivot" from the old way of doing things. He wants to turn away from a financial system that rewards political favorites to one that focuses on what regular people — students, patients, taxpayers, workers — actually get when New York spends a stunning $120 billion. That emphasis has resulted in one of the boldest, bravest budget proposals in Albany in many years.

Mr. Spitzer's most innovative move throws out the calcified state education formula, which cheats poor, urban school districts, and directs substantially more money to the schools that need it most. He is proposing universal prekindergarten care, which is critical to helping the most disadvantaged children, and he wants to build in accountability to ensure the money is well spent.

It would be difficult to get the new formula through the Legislature without something to win over suburban and upstate lawmakers. Mr. Spitzer has offered to cut property taxes by $6 billion statewide over the next three years, with the biggest cuts going to the middle class.

He also wants to overhaul the $45 billion Medicaid system, which spends more per capita than any other state. The Spitzer solution would shift money away from hospitals and nursing homes and toward expanded health care, including health insurance for all New York children. Unions, hospital advocates and politicians have already begun to raise the alarm. But the governor is right to fight for a fairer, more cost-effective distribution of public funds.

Mr. Spitzer has chosen other worthwhile battles. He proposes pay increases for judges — long overdue — and rightly decouples them from raises for the Legislature.

The question now is whether legislators will join Mr. Spitzer in moving the state forward. The Assembly speaker, Sheldon Silver, and the Senate majority leader, Joseph Bruno, both rushed to offer some praise but also to note their "concerns" about the governor's health care proposals. Mr. Spitzer's budget will need a thorough vetting, but any wheedling from legislators should focus on the interests of regular New Yorkers, not political supporters.

This first budget makes good on Mr. Spitzer's promise to start upending the ailing culture in Albany. Legislators are integral to the budget process, and they should weigh in now with their own ideas — but only the ones that really make the budget better.

Island Of Moguls Is Latest Front In Labor Battle (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

FISHER ISLAND, Fla., Jan 26 — The class struggle is coming to paradise.

It's hard to tell from the Bentleys and the Jaguars debarking from the ferry, tooling past the pink flamingos in the pond and the peacocks sashaying along the exquisitely coiffed lawn, but this exclusive enclave of the moneyed is bracing for an unexpected test of its decades-old insulation from the outside world: a labor union is trying to organize its workers.

After successful campaigns last year to organize janitors and other maintenance workers at several universities in South Florida, the Service Employees International Union has set its sights on Fisher Island, one of the most concentrated pockets of wealth in the nation.

Amid mounting political attention to the substantial widening of the income gap over the last two decades, the service employees union hopes that Fisher Island — where a share in the golf club costs $250,000 and dues run to $20,000 a year while workers tending the grounds or washing linens can make as little as $8.50 an hour — will serve as a rallying cry for low-wage service workers across the nation.

"This is a symbol of what's wrong and a beacon of what could be right," said Stephen Lerner, director of the union's property services division. "There's a growing feeling in the country that something is a little out of balance when workers live in poverty in the middle of incredible wealth, and it can and should be fixed."

But the union drive, which is just getting under way, might not play out as a straightforward battle pitting the haves against the have-nots. Some residents, of course, oppose the union's arrival. But others are already being courted by the union, which hopes that they will be moved to support it when confronted with the contrast between their affluence and the meager existence of many of their workers.

Even among employees interested in joining the union, resentment of the rich does not seem to be the prime motivation.

"I'm not bothered by their wealth," said Christiana Monestime, a Haitian immigrant working in the club's laundry room for $8.76 an hour. "They earned what they have. We just need to earn more than we earn."

Representatives of Fisher Island's community association and of the golf club, the two main employers with a combined payroll of about 600 workers, say that their wages and benefits are above the area average. They say they pay 80 percent of the cost of individual health insurance, offer a 401(k) plan with a company match, and provide paid vacations and an allowance of $60 a month to buy food from vending machines in the workers' cafeteria.

"I am not sure if there are any advantages" from having a union, said Gaële C. Silva, vice president for legal and government affairs at Fisher Island Holdings, the island's developer, which controls the community association. "Unions are needed usually when pay, benefits or working standards are below the usual norms."

Still, to the union, the local wage comparisons are almost beside the point. The chasm between the fortunes of the 750 or so families that call Fisher Island home and the workers toiling in its restaurants and laundry rooms is so striking that it makes for a potent image. Fisher Island, organizers say, is a microcosm of the nation's increasing social and economic divide.

A 216-acre nub of land sliced from the tip of Miami in 1905 when the government dredged out a sea-lane from Biscayne Bay, Fisher Island was acquired in 1925 by William K. Vanderbilt II, scion of the robber-baron railroad clan, to build his winter mansion.

It epitomizes wealth to this day. The island is home at least part of the year to an assortment of magnates, like the investment guru Martin Zweig, the car dealership mogul Robert Potamkin and the financier Bennet S. LeBow, of tobacco fame. Celebrities like Oprah Winfrey and Mel Brooks have owned winter homes here.

According to the Census Bureau, Fisher Island was the richest enclave in America in 1999, with an average income per capita of about $236,000 — more than double the $91,000 average on the Upper East Side of Manhattan. Residents say the real figures are actually far higher, partly because of the difficulty in gathering income data on part-time residents.

Indeed, from the imported Bahamian sand coating the beaches to the marble and mahogany-encrusted Vanderbilt mansion and the 186-foot, $250,000-a-week chartered yacht bobbing in the marina just outside, everything bespeaks luxury. The gilded trappings are a potent reminder of the great income gap that prevailed when Mr. Vanderbilt used to alight his hydroplane in the inviting waters offshore, in the early decades of the 20th century, a gap that has re-emerged today.

Elena Bluntzer, a longtime real estate agent on the island who owns a condominium here, said that Fisher Island was comfortably insulated by its wealth, even from the chill affecting the housing market in nearby Miami Beach and elsewhere.

New condos are being offered for $4.5 million to $9.1 million. Resale units can go for much more. One that Ms. Bluntzer is trying to sell, 8,300 square feet of oceanfront luxury adorned with coral rock from Santo Domingo, stained glass by Frank Lloyd Wright and sheepskin-covered bathroom walls, is listed for $17.5 million. Maintenance will exceed $7,000 a month.

"Everything above six million is doing extremely well," Ms. Bluntzer confided.

Fisher Island's workers live in a more frugal universe, with laundry workers at the club or landscaper tending the grounds earning as little as $8.50 an hour.

Several months ago Ms. Monestime's workweek in the laundry was cut from 40 hours to 24, forcing her to drop the health plan that cost her $22 every two weeks. "We have to fight," Ms. Monestime said. "Everybody has a family to support."

Abraham Guevara, a Honduran immigrant who has worked 18 years as a landscaper on the island and makes $14.42 an hour, said he was generally content with his employers. Still, he thought a union might help workers push for a better deal.

"I have never been in a union," he said, "but it might be a good idea."

DOJ_NMG_0125502

This is not the first time organized labor has tried to land on Fisher Island. In 2005, the Teamsters dropped their attempt to unionize workers after they lost a representation election against fierce opposition from the developer, John Melk.

During that drive, Mr. Melk warned that "I will not agree to any changes that will cost Fisher Island more money." The union complained to the National Labor Relations Board, arguing that Mr. Melk had threatened workers, but lost the case on appeal.

Management of the community association changed after Mr. Melk sold to the investment fund Euro Fund Properties. The S.E.I.U. is trying a different strategy from that of the Teamsters, hoping to draw some of the prosperous residents to its side. "There's plenty of wealth around to lift workers out of poverty," Mr. Lerner said. "The issue here is not to get rid of rich people."

This month, a local organization of religious leaders that is allied with the union sent a letter to all residents, alerting them to "serious and tragic poverty within your midst."

"A great invisible work force, unseen by many, maintains your condominiums, golf courses and tennis courts, prepares and serves your food, cleans your rooms and common areas, and maintains the critical equipment that keeps the air-conditioning and other mechanics of the island running smoothly," the letter says. "Their stories are chilling."

Residents on the island are some of its biggest employers; they control the club and they run the individual condos, which contract for maintenance and cleaning work among several companies.

Some Fisher Island residents appear sympathetic. Harold Ford Sr., the former congressman who is now a Washington lobbyist and lives part time on the island, said he paid a house-worker more than $20 an hour, plus health insurance. "It's really the club that employs the people," he said. "I just live here."

Yet others were taken aback by the charge that workers earn too little. "We don't need a union," said Suzanne B. Irving, a resident who manages her condo association at Seaside Villas. "We are really taking care of our workers."

The condo contracts with an outside firm for three workers who clean and maintain two small buildings. Ms. Irving said the two cleaners made $9 to $10 an hour, plus health insurance and a 401(k) plan. The maintenance worker makes $15 to $18 an hour.

"It's not in our interest to get the cheapest worker," she said. "You teach them; you put so much effort into them; so you want to keep them."

Some residents say that comparing the income of residents to that of their workers is pointless. Ms. Bluntzer argued that the nation's superwealthy have become so rich because they created businesses that were generating enormous wealth, which is ultimately good for all.

"What's fair is fair," Ms. Bluntzer said. "Everyone needs to be compensated for the job they are doing. But it's unfair to pay all the same."

And residents argue that they care about the downtrodden. Several pointed to the island's philanthropic fund, which raised $550,000 to $600,000 last year for donations to several children's charities in the area.

"Fisher Island," Ms. Irving said, "is not the story about rich people who don't care about the poor."

Mary Cheney Publicly Defends Her Pregnancy (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Mary Cheney, the lesbian daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, today for the first time publicly defended her decision to become pregnant and asserted that same-sex couples are equally capable of raising children as heterosexual couples.

"When Heather and I decided to have a baby, I knew it wasn't going to be the most popular decision," Ms. Cheney said, referring to her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe. She then gestured to her middle — any bulge disguised by a boxy jacket — and asserted: "This is a baby. This is a blessing from God. It is not a political statement. It is not a prop to be used in a debate, on either side of a political issue. It is my child."

Ms. Cheney, 37, was speaking at a panel discussion sponsored by Glamour magazine at Barnard College in Manhattan. The baby, whose sex she has not publicly disclosed, is due this spring and will be the sixth grandchild for the vice president and his wife. Ms. Cheney, who is vice president of consumer advocacy for AOL and lives in Virginia, has not said how she became pregnant.

DOJ_NMG_0125503

Her father became testy last week during a CNN interview when the host Wolf Blitzer asked what he thought of conservatives — specifically James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family— who are critical of his daughter Mary's pregnancy.

In refusing to answer, Mr. Cheney told Mr. Blitzer that he was "over the line."

Ms. Cheney said in a brief interview after the panel that she was not speaking for her father, but that when she saw the interview, she also felt Mr. Blitzer had crossed a line. "He was trying to get a rise out of my father," she said.

Today at the panel discussion, inside a stuffy room decorated by portraits of stern-looking former Barnard presidents, Cindi Leive, the editor of Glamour, asked Ms. Cheney if she had anything to say to critics like Mr. Dobson.

Mr. Dobson wrote in Time magazine last month that years of social research "indicates that children do best on every measure of well-being when raised by their married mother and father." He also wrote that his group believes that "birth and adoption are the purview of married heterosexual couples." (Two of the researchers whom Mr. Dobson cited in his article have complained that Mr. Dobson distorted their views and said they disagreed with his conclusions.)

Ms. Cheney noted Mr. Dobson's distortions of the research he cited and added: "Every piece of remotely responsible research that has been done in the last 20 years has shown there is no difference between children raised by same-sex parents and children raised by opposite-sex parents; what matters is being raised in a stable, loving environment."

She said Mr. Dobson was entitled to his opinion, "but he's not someone whose endorsement I have ever drastically sought."

A Tide For School Choice (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Fifty-seven years later, Sumner Elementary School in Topeka is back in the news. That city's board of education is still wrongly preventing the right people from getting into that building. Two educators wanted to use Sumner for a charter school, a public school entitled to operate outside the confinements of dictated curricula and free from many work rules written by teachers unions. Their school would have been a back-to-basics academy from kindergarten through fifth grade, designed to attack Topeka's 23-point gap between the reading proficiency of black and Hispanic third-graders and that of whites.

When the school board rejected the application of the two educators -- African American women -- but praised their dedication to children, one of the women was not mollified: "A bleeding heart does nothing but ruin the carpet."

Sumner is a National Historic Landmark because in 1950 Oliver Brown walked with his 7-year-old daughter Linda the seven blocks from their home to Sumner, where he unsuccessfully tried to enroll her. But Topeka's schools were segregated, so Linda went to the school for blacks 21 blocks from her home, and her father went to court. Four years later came Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka.

Sumner, which has been closed for years, would have needed costly repairs. Still, clearly one reason for the rejection was the usual resistance of public educators to innovations that challenge the status quo, meaning centralized control of schools.

In Arizona, some amazingly persistent and mostly liberal people are demonstrating the tenacity with which some interests fight to prevent parents of modest means from having education choices like those available to most Americans. In 1999, Arizona's Supreme Court upheld a program whereby individuals receive tax credits for donations they make to organizations that provide scholarships to enable children to attend private schools, religious and secular. More than 22,500 children have benefited from the program in a decade. Thousands of families are on waiting lists for scholarships because 600 Arizona schools have failed to meet federal academic requirements.

In 2000, Arizona opponents of school choice, in a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union, attacked the program in a federal court. They failed again, in a ruling issued in 2005, which was not surprising, given that in 2002 the Supreme Court held that there is no constitutional infirmity in government-sponsored and administered programs that involve "true private choice" by giving government aid directly to parents, who use it at their discretion for sectarian or nonsectarian schools.

Now Arizona opponents of school choice, thirsting for a third defeat, are challenging what Arizona's legislature enacted last year. Noting the success of the individual tax credit for scholarship contributions, the legislature has authorized corporate donors a dollar-for-dollar tax credit for contributions to private, nonprofit school tuition organizations. So opponents of school choice are trudging back to court, where they will recycle twice-rejected arguments.

Doing the same thing repeatedly while expecting different results is a sign of insanity, but what really defines the plaintiffs is banality. This is about the control of schools by bureaucrats, about work rules negotiated by unions and, not least, about money -- not allowing any to flow away from the usual channels.

The public school lobby, which apparently has little confidence in its product, lives in fear of competition -- the fear that if parents' choices are expanded, there will be a flight from public schools. But the tide is turning:

Newark's mayor, Cory Booker, a member of the board of the national Alliance for School Choice, proposes a scholarship program similar to Arizona's. New Jersey corporations could get tax credits totaling $20 million a year collectively for scholarships for low-income students in five cities with especially troubled schools.

New York's new Democratic governor, Eliot L. Spitzer, proposes lifting the cap that restricts the state to a mere 100 charter schools. This common-sense idea -- lowering a barrier the government has erected to limit innovative schools that compete with the government's existing system -- is welcome, but it is not as bold as what Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is doing with the nation's largest school system, New York City's, with 1.1 million pupils.

He is dividing large schools into smaller ones, emancipating many principals to be educational entrepreneurs under a system that holds them accountable for cognitive results. The logic is that public money should follow wherever students are attracted by competing schools. So school choice is gaining ground in the city that has historically been ground zero for collectivist, centralizing liberalism.

Rice To Press For Faster 'Roadmap' Plan For Israeli-Palestinian Peace (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 1, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice meets her Russian, European and UN counterparts to push a plan to fast-track their stalled "roadmap" for achieving Israeli-Palestinian peace.

At the meeting here of the so-called Quartet of Middle East mediators, Rice will also press for renewed efforts to bolster moderate Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas in his power struggle with the Iranian-backed Hamas movement, her spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Friday's gathering will include Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Germany Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon.

The talks are timed to precede a rare three-way meeting between Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in mid-February, though no firm date or venue for those discussions have been set, officials said.

Rice announced the meetings during a tour of the Middle East in mid-January focussed on garnering Arab support for President George W. Bush's new strategy in Iraq and on countering the growing regional influence of Iran.

Under strong pressure from European and Arab allies alike, Bush has also signalled a renewed interest in breaking the deadlock in Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts -- something his administration has been accused of neglecting as it focussed on the crisis in Iraq.

The Quartet, which has not met formally since September, issued a "roadmap" for achieving Israeli-Palestinian peace in 2003, but the three-stage plan that should have led to the creation of a Palestinian state by 2005 has since languished.

Continuing attacks on Israel by Palestinian militants and the surprise election victory a year ago that gave Hamas control over the Palestinian government have blocked movement along the Quartet route.

The plan's phased implementation meant crucial "final status" issues like the borders and powers of a Palestinian state and the fate of Palestinian refugees could not be tackled until Israel's security was guaranteed -- handing violent militants a virtual veto power over progress.

Rice has rejected suggestions the plan be dropped in favor of an all-at-once approach embodied in a Saudi peace plan calling for creation of a Palestinian state in tandem with a broad peace deal between Israel and the Arab world.

Instead, she has proposed an "accelerated" roadmap that would deal in parallel with the security problems and with final status issues that have not been broached since the peace process broke down in 2001.

"They haven't talked about any of these issues for going on six years now, so they can start to have those conversations while they also work on the very practical, real-world current issues" of security, McCormack said, adding that he expected the other Quartet members to back Rice's initiative.

"The fact that they're getting together is a demonstration that they support what is being done by us as well as others," he said.

For Washington, the first step is strengthening Abbas in his showdown with Hamas and this week Bush announced the US was providing 86 million dollars in aid to security forces dominated by his secular Fatah party.

McCormack said Friday's meeting would discuss "a division of labor" in helping Abbas as he tries to wrest control of government from Hamas, with Washington focussing on the build-up of pro-Abbas security forces and the Europeans on strengthening government institutions.

US officials though played down expectations the Quartet meeting would produce any major new initiatives.

"In large part this is an exercise in demonstrating political and diplomatic support for efforts that are currently underway," he said.

A major obstacle to progress is the political weakness of both Abbas and Olmert, whose popularity has sunk since Israel's mismanaged war against the Lebanese Islamic militia Hezbollah last year.

Abbas for his part has failed to convince Hamas to join in a unity government that would meet Quartet conditions for ending a devastating aid boycott it has imposed on the Hamas-led administration.

Hamas has so far rejected the Quartet's requirements of recognizing Israel, renouncing violence and agreeing to honor past peace agreements with the Jewish state.

Is Now The Time To Talk Peace In The Mideast? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON

The Quartet of powers seeking to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict ends a hiatus in peacemaking efforts with a meeting in Washington on Friday. But it comes at what would seem to be a particularly unpromising moment.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will host the European Union, Russia, and the United Nations for talks on how to get negotiations toward a final settlement moving again – even as rival Palestinian factions battle each other in Gaza, and Israel founders under a weak and scandal-torn government.

Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas – who is locked in battle with a government run by the militant Hamas organization – would seem to be in the kind of position needed to make hard choices and painful compromises.

And even before the Quartet meets, cracks are appearing in its position, with Russia calling for a lifting of the freeze on international aid to the Palestinian government. The freeze was a response to Hamas's election victory last year and was designed to pressure Hamas to recognize Israel, give up violence, and accept past peace-process accords.

Yet Secretary Rice and other Western leaders, including German Chancellor Angela Merkel, insist this is a moment of opportunity. Rice, just back from a Middle East trip, speaks of a "change of environment" and "realignment" that "clarifies" the way forward, separating the advocates for peace from the forces for turmoil.

In particular, she and other US officials speak of a new willingness of Sunni Arab regimes – increasingly alarmed by Shiite Iran's growing clout in the region – to work together and with Israel to push the peace process forward.

But many experts in the region, while applauding any renewed effort to resolve the conflict, don't see the opening some leaders are talking about, and they worry that the timing is based more on the tangential needs of players such as the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0125506

"Nothing has changed over recent weeks or months to suggest any hopes for a major breakthrough, so I can't see that [the calling of the Quartet meeting] has anything to do with improved prospects," says Bernard Reich, a Middle East expert at George Washington University in Washington. "But the Palestinian issue remains connected to everything else in the region, so we have no option but to try to do something about it."

Others see the current US push for progress as responding more to political motivations than to encouraging facts on the ground.

"The motivation for [moving] now is that this administration is in its last two years, and the question is, What has it accomplished for US foreign policy?" says Stephen Cohen, national scholar at the Israel Policy Forum in New York. "This is particularly important for Condoleezza Rice, who wants to have a future in US foreign policy and politics."

Indeed, for most of its first term and into the second, the Bush administration said the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was not "ripe" for dedicated US diplomacy. President Bush did call for a Palestinian state "living side by side in peace" with Israel in 2002, but horizons for achieving that goal have been pushed off into the distance.

Now the United States is not just playing catch-up as it revives the peace process, analysts say, but is acting from a more difficult position.

"If they had really focused on this back in 2002 and moved with some vigor and balance on the Palestinian situation, there would have been a better chance for progress," says Michael Hudson, an expert in US regional diplomacy at the Center for Contemporary Arab Studies at Georgetown University in Washington.

"It's a pretty terrible moment for any progress," he says, noting the difficult straits the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships are in, and the perceived weakness of the US. "Bush is not seen to be in a position to press ahead for something to get done, and the Democrats also tend to be uncritically pro-Israel on this issue."

Beyond that, Mr. Hudson says the US is now encumbered by a much worse image in the region. "The US is seen so broadly as an expansionist colonial power as the result of Iraq that its good offices are not to be trusted," he says.

The controversy over Israel's use of US-supplied cluster bombs in last summer's war with Hizbullah in Lebanon is one current example of the kinds of issues that continue to tarnish the US standing in the region, analysts say. Such issues also complicate the domestic political environments for the region's Sunni Arab regimes that might be open to greater cooperation with the US and Israel, they add.

The emergence of such a "coalition" will depend on US actions, says Mr. Cohen of the Israel Policy Forum. "We need to be careful to make a distinction between potential coalitions and actual," he says. "Whether it happens depends on US behavior."

For example, he says Sunni Arab regimes are watching not just for US action in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but for assurances that the US will not forsake Sunni Arabs in Iraq.

Even more skeptical, Mr. Reich of George Washington University says the scenario of Sunni Arabs teaming up with Israel over Iran may be what Rice considers "logical," but not what Sunni regimes are ready for. "The Saudis, for one," he says, "aren't just going to set up the alliance implied in this 'realignment.' "

Israeli Envoy Rejects Mideast 'Linkage' (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Foreign-policy crises in Iraq and Iran will not be eased by pressuring Israel to cut a peace deal with the Palestinians, Israeli Ambassador Sallai Meridor said in an interview yesterday.

Mr. Meridor, in a luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times, firmly rejected the idea pushed by Arab allies of the U.S. that an Israeli-Palestinian accord would reduce ethnic and sectarian violence in Iraq or slow Iran's quest for a nuclear bomb.

"Frankly, we don't see any connection between our dispute with the Palestinians and the level of violence on Haifa Street in Baghdad," said Mr. Meridor, who assumed his post in early December.

"And there is no linkage in my mind between the Israeli-Palestinian question and what Ahmadinejad is planning for the region and the world by pursuing a nuclear weapon."

DOJ_NMG_0125507

Meanwhile, Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said this week that Israel does not intend to use military force against Iran, which Israel suspects is building nuclear bombs.

In addition to Iran's nuclear program, Israel considers the Islamic republic a threat because of repeated declarations by Mr. Ahmadinejad that the Jewish state should be wiped off the map.

Mr. Peres spoke Tuesday during "the Doha Debates," a project in which world leaders discuss current events with students in the Persian Gulf sheikdom of Qatar.The central role of Israel's disputes with its Arab neighbors in fueling regional tensions was a key finding of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat.

Mr. Meridor said in the interview that he saw the beginnings of a realignment in the Middle East, linking Israel and the United States with moderate Sunni Muslim Arab states fearful of the rising power of Shi'ite Iran. But he said it was too soon to tell whether an anti-Tehran coalition would form.

"We think that, yes, there is a convergence of interests of many Arab countries in the region and Israel today in recognition of the threat to the entire region from Iran," he said. "Whether that can be translated into action and a new alliance, we will have to see."

Moderate Arab governments have long argued that the Israeli-Palestinian dispute has fueled tensions throughout the Muslim world, providing popular support to extremist groups.

"The continued denial of Palestinian rights is a fire starter," Jordan's King Abdullah II told the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, earlier this week. "If you don't fix the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, you can't have stability in the region."

The Iraq Study Group recommended renewed U.S. pressure on Israel to deal directly with the Palestinians, with Syria over the Golan Heights, and with Lebanon over the threat posed by the Shi'ite militant group Hezbollah.

"The United States will not be able to achieve its goals in the Middle East unless the United States deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict," the panel concluded.

Israel has long feared pressure from Washington to make major concessions to the Palestinians to further other U.S. foreign-policy goals in the region. Mr. Meridor said a push for a peace deal now is complicated by the deep political divisions within the Palestinian territories.

"Nobody is more interested in a real two-state compromise than Israel, as we have demonstrated time and time again," Mr. Meridor said.

"The real problem is that, right now, we don't have a real interlocutor on the Palestinian side willing and capable of delivering an agreement that meets basic international principles," he said.

The Israeli envoy said his country was taking a "calculated risk" in allowing the buildup of security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, locked in a bloody power struggle with the elected Hamas government.

Iran-backed Hamas, which the U.S. government and many European countries consider a terrorist movement, has refused to recognize Israel's right to exist and has claimed responsibility for terrorist attacks in Israel.

The Bush administration also is considering expanded aid to Mr. Abbas' national security force, to beef up its firepower as clashes with Hamas supporters escalate, Western and Palestinian officials said yesterday.

But Mr. Meridor made it clear that the greatest threat to Israel, the region and the world was Iran's suspected quest for a nuclear bomb.

Mr. Meridor said an Iranian bomb would embolden the Islamic regime, change the balance of power in the region and risk a Middle East nuclear-arms race.

"The world not just Israel, not just the Middle East is facing its biggest security crisis since the 1930s," he warned.

Hamas Slams US Aid To Abbas As Truce Holds (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125508

Hamas has slammed a multi-million dollar US aid package to bolster security forces loyal to its rival Fatah, as the two Palestinian factions consolidated a two-day-old truce by releasing hostages.

"There is no doubt that this is part of American policy aimed at provoking an escalation and a civil war in the service of a Zionist plan," said Ismail Radwan, a spokesman for Islamist movement Hamas, which heads the government.

"Each time the American administration sees that we have arrived, or are on the verge of arriving, at an agreement, it sends (US Secretary of State) Condoleezza Rice to poison the atmosphere or announces financial aid (to president Mahmud Abbas) to maintain tensions among Palestinians," he said Wednesday.

US President George W. Bush has ordered the transfer of about 86 million dollars in aid to strengthen security forces loyal to the moderate president and Fatah party leader, the White House announced on Tuesday.

The aid was declared as a truce between Fatah and Hamas took effect in Gaza following the deadliest bout of inter-Palestinian violence in a year and a day after a Palestinian suicide bomber killed three people in southern Israel.

The truce was largely holding for a second day Wednesday, as the groups swapped hostages. Medics, however, said unknown gunmen shot and wounded a presidential guard officer, one day after a Hamas militant was killed.

"Last night, we started to implement the agreement between Fatah and Hamas and the hostages on both sides have been exchanged," said Radwan.

"Dozens of hostages have been released on both sides," confirmed the Fatah spokesman in the Gaza Strip, Tawfiq Abu Khussa.

But while the Fatah spokesman said the general atmosphere had improved, he complained that an "executive force" controlled by Hamas was causing "tensions and not helping the restoration of confidence" between the groups.

The ceasefire was brokered amid increasing international pressure on the factions to resolve their differences and negotiate a power-sharing agreement after months of broken talks and collapsed ceasefires.

The US aid is part of a broader US push to revive peace negotiations between Abbas and Israel, with the four Middle East peace sponsors -- the European Union, Russia, United Nations and United States -- to meet in Washington on Friday.

US officials said the aid, which includes training, vehicles and uniforms, would theoretically help Abbas counter militant attacks against Israel such as Monday's suicide bombing in the popular Red Sea resort of Eilat.

"The idea is to build the legitimate security forces, to help provide law and order in Gaza and the West Bank, fight terror and to facilitate movement and access," said national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

The European Union and United States cut off aid to the Palestinians after Hamas routed long-dominant Fatah in polls last January, dominating parliament and forming a government, consigning Fatah's hold on power to the presidency.

Fatah and Hamas, which have very different political outlooks, have tried for months to form a national unity government in the hope of resuming Western aid payments and reversing an unprecedented economic crisis.

Hamas has steadfastly refused to accept Western conditions to renounce violence, recognize Israel or abide by past peace deals.

The political showdown turned violent after Abbas announced in December that he would call new elections in the hope of wresting control from Hamas.

Thirty-five people have been killed and around 100 wounded in the latest bout of internecine violence.

Scheme To Sell Military Gear In Mideast Nets Prison Term (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

A former Defense Reutilization and Marketing Service (DRMS) official was sentenced yesterday in U.S. District Court in Washington to 33 months in prison and $342,000 in restitution payments for illegally selling stolen surplus military equipment to Middle Eastern buyers.

In pronouncing a sentence on Gayden C. Woodson, U.S. District Judge James Robertson said, "The word needs to get out to people who are representing this country in the field and in far-flung places that if the cookie jar is open, it doesn't mean they can steal from it."

DOJ_NMG_0125509

Woodson, 46, of North Ogden, Utah, was convicted on charges that included selling militarized high-mobility multi-wheeled vehicles. He had been employed for 27 years by the DRMS, which is responsible for managing the disposal -- by reuse, sale, transfer or donation -- of excess U.S. military property.

U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said that after arriving in the Middle East, Woodson willingly joined an ongoing conspiracy among DRMS personnel and local contractors and purchasers to sell surplus military equipment outside regular channels and pocket the proceeds.

Woodson admitted that he alone obtained nearly $350,000 through this illegal scheme. Among the equipment he admitted to selling in this way were the high-mobility vehicles, which regulations require to be demilitarized before disposal and that if not demilitarized may not be sold to foreign nationals without a validated export license issued by the State Department.

Mr. Taylor said some of the vehicles illegally sold by Woodson and his criminal associates have been traced to, and some recovered from, dealers in Europe, but the whereabouts of most are not known.

He said Woodson admitted he was recruited to the conspiracy by another DRMS official, Ronald W. Wiseman, 60, of New Boston, Texas, who previously pleaded guilty to his part in the scheme. After cooperating with the investigation, Wiseman was sentenced to serve 18 months in prison.

"These men abused their positions of public trust to line their own pockets at the expense of our U.S. military services," Mr. Taylor said. "It is particularly offensive that in that process they put excess military equipment into the unregulated stream of international commerce -- including militarized vehicles which could make their way into the hands of adversaries and endanger our fighting troops abroad."

DRMS operations at U.S. military facilities overseas are carried out by personnel authorized to conduct local sales for certain usable excess U.S. property, through sealed bid, auction or retail fixed-price sales to qualified purchasers.

From 2000 to 2006, Mr. Taylor said, Woodson served as a DRMS property disposal specialist assigned to Southwest Asia, covering Oman, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and other countries.

US In Warning On Somali Militants (FT)

By William Wallis

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

The US believes militant Islamists from the ousted coalition that held sway over parts of southern Somalia may be regrouping in Saudi Arabia, Eritrea and also Yemen, Jendayi Frazer, US assistant secretary of state for Africa, said yesterday.

Speaking to the Financial Times in Addis Ababa, Ms Frazer said it was too early to tell who among the Islamist leadership had survived Ethiopia's invasion last month and subsequent US air strikes on alleged affiliates of al-Qaeda.

"It is going to take some time for the fog of war to clear up and we have an ability to see who is still operating and how they are operating," she said.

But she was "very concerned" that extremist elements from among the defeated Islamists were "trying to reconstitute themselves either out of Saudi Arabia or Eritrea", and that international jihadist networks would see this as an opportunity.

"We have to engage with the Saudi government and their services to try to prevent that from happening as well as engage regionally."

Ms Frazer described Eritrea, with whom the US has deteriorating relations, asa "source of regional instability".

This had been "very clearly exposed" during recent events in Somalia.

Ethiopia, the US's principle ally in the Horn of Africa, alleges that Eritrea supported hardline elements within the ousted Islamists by supplying arms, fighters and military advice.

"Eventually Eritrea will see the limits of its actions to destabilise the Horn," said Ms Frazer.

Ms Frazer said the key to ensuring Somalia did not provide a haven for international terrorist networks now lay with the Transitional Federal Government, which emerged from peace talks in Kenya in 2004.

"They have to do it by reaching out. They have to do it through inclusive dialogue," she said.

Africa's In-house Cops (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125510

WHEN AFRICAN leaders met this week in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, they fell short of their goal to get commitments for 8,000 troops for a peacekeeping mission in Somalia. But what has attracted less attention is that, for the first time, the rest of the world is counting on Africa to police itself — and the continent is nearly in a position to do it.

The African Union's 7,000 peacekeepers in the Darfur region of Sudan, though grossly undermanned and underfunded, represent the closest thing to security and justice that blighted land knows. The AU has encouraged better governance through its peer-review mechanism in countries such as Rwanda and Uganda and headed off violence in turbulent regions such as the Democratic Republic of Congo. And now the organization is the best hope for averting a security implosion in Somalia, where Ethiopian troops are on the verge of pulling out after sweeping an Islamist movement out of power in December.

Not too bad for a group that's less than 5 years old and is on shaky financial and administrative footing. Perhaps the best evidence to date that the AU is building legitimacy and effectiveness came Monday, when members deftly dodged a leadership crisis. Sudan's president, Lt. Gen. Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir, who has presided over a genocidal campaign of ethnic cleansing in Darfur, expected to be first in line for the AU chairmanship after being put off last year. As expected, Bashir made a strong push in Addis Ababa for the chairmanship, only to be snubbed once again.

To declare the AU a success because it didn't choose a mass murderer as its leader sets the bar pretty low. Yet it's a major change from the days when its predecessor, the Organization of African Unity, was steered by the likes of Ugandan dictator Idi Amin. And the nature of the man the AU chose is significant. Ghanaian President John Kufuor is a legitimately elected leader whose country last year won the largest grant to date from President Bush's Millennium Challenge Corp., meaning that it passed a test for transparency and good governance that few other Third World regimes have managed. Kufuor is an ideal choice.

Having AU peacekeepers as an option to stabilize a failed state such as Somalia is a boon to the international community, whose own peacekeepers, from NATO to the United Nations to the U.S. military, are badly overstretched. The organization might still have a long way to go, but the distance it has come in its short history is striking.

U.S. Suspects N. Korea Laundering Money (AP)

By Alexa Olesen

AP, February 1, 2007

A U.S. Treasury envoy who on Wednesday wrapped up two days of talks with North Korean officials said his agency's suspicions of illegal financial activity involving bank accounts linked to the communist nation were accurate.

Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser said that he went over bank information of 50 account holders from the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia with his North Korean counterparts in Beijing, adding that U.S. concerns that the bank was being used for money-laundering purposes had "been vindicated" by the discussions.

"I think we are now in a position after a very lengthy investigation ... to start moving forward and trying to bring some resolution to this matter," Glaser said. He did not elaborate.

The financial talks are linked to continuing talks between North Korea and five other nations aimed at getting Pyongyang to dismantle its nuclear programs. China said Tuesday that those talks — the latest round of which ended in December with no breakthrough — will resume next week.

Glaser said the two sides planned to meet again to talk further about U.S. financial restrictions imposed due to Pyongyang's alleged smuggling and counterfeiting, but no date had been set.

Washington took action against the Banco Delta Asia in 2005, accusing the bank of complicity in North Korea's alleged illegal financial activity such as counterfeiting and money-laundering.

The move has caused other banks to steer clear of North Korean business for fear of losing access to the U.S. market, hampering the North's access to the international financial system.

The North says the restrictions are evidence of U.S. hostility.

U.S. officials have indicated that North Korea is demanding the financial issues be dealt with before progress can be made on the nuclear talks, involving the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia.

Pyongyang wants Washington to first end the financial isolation campaign, and to lift a freeze on $24 million in accounts at Banco Delta Asia.

Russia Warns North Korea Over Nukes 'Threat' (AFP)

By Sebastian Smith

AFP, February 1, 2007

North Korea's nuclear weapons capability threatens Russian interests, Moscow's chief negotiator at international talks with Pyongyang said Wednesday, warning the country against carrying out another military test.

"Our interests are under threat," Alexander Losyukov was quoted as saying by Interfax news agency, also cautioning North Korea against a repeat of last October's atomic bomb test.

"I think a very negative reaction would follow another test and that tougher measures would probably be taken," he said.

Analysts said Losyukov's statement marked a hardening of the Russian position on North Korea ahead of February 8 talks in Beijing -- involving China, Japan, South and North Korea, Russia and the United States -- to try to persuade Pyongyang to give up its military nuclear programme.

According to Losyukov, "concrete" results are unlikely in Beijing, but "it could be possible to lay out quite precisely the route toward achieving them."

Reflecting the growing flurry of diplomatic activity ahead of next week's negotiations, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov talked by telephone with his South Korean counterpart Song Min-Soon to discuss "resolving the nuclear problem on the Korean peninsula," Interfax reported.

South Korea's negotiator to the six-nation talks, Deputy Minister Chun Young-Woo, was due to meet with Losyukov in Moscow on Thursday to discuss a "road map" plan on the issue.

The last round of talks in China in December ended in deadlock after Pyongyang demanded the lifting of US sanctions imposed for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The talks have continued intermittently since 2003, but gained new urgency when North Korea conducted its atomic test.

Viktor Kremenyuk, deputy director at the USA-Canada think tank, said that Losyukov's message indicated that Russia was cutting back on longtime diplomatic support for North Korea.

"Russia's position has shifted and that could help push North Korea into a deal. They will see that no one is fighting for them," he said.

Another analyst, Anatoly Dyakov, head of the Centre for Study of Disarmament, Energy, and Ecology, said that Russia was right to toughen its stance.

"If Korea continues its nuclear programme, that will push the region out of control. Japan will be next, then Taiwan, and so on. Russia and China are worried."

Earlier this week Losyukov expressed "cautious optimism," saying that "simply the agreement to hold a new round shows that encouraging signs have appeared regarding the movement of different participants' positions."

He repeated this Wednesday, adding that both North Korea and the United States, the two countries most at loggerheads, were "now coming out with the biggest optimism."

However he tempered this with warnings about the effect of negotiations dragging on for too long with too little result.

"I personally think that this (weapon) test very much complicated the situation in the region and set back the process of the six-sided talks. The result is that we lose time and the process of nuclearisation on the peninsula goes further."

Senators Vent On Chinese Currency (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Since becoming Treasury secretary last summer, Henry M. Paulson Jr. has pleaded for patience on the issue of China's currency. Using the high-level contacts he made as chairman of the global investment bank Goldman Sachs, he sought ways to get Chinese leaders to move.

But on Capitol Hill yesterday, Paulson learned that patience in Washington may be wearing thin. Several senators at a Senate Banking Committee hearing sharply questioned the value of his talks, and threatened legislative action against China.

DOJ_NMG_0125512

"The Congress is not going to wait and see how this is progressing when they watch 3 million manufacturing jobs leave this country," said the committee chairman, Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). "You are going to get blown by if we don't get a better handle on this."

Paulson offered assurances that he, too, is disappointed by China's slow movement toward allowing the market to set the value of the yuan, its currency.

"I would like to see China showing much more flexibility, and I'm going to be frustrated until they do," Paulson said, adding that he has been "pressing them hard."

Paulson was responding to criticism from some members of the committee for not accusing China of manipulating its currency in a recent Treasury report on international exchange rates. That would have triggered consultations with China and raised the possibility of trade sanctions.

U.S. manufacturers accuse China of maintaining its currency at 20 to 40 percent below its market value, making China's products unfairly cheap on world markets and taking sales from U.S. companies.

China asserts that it is moving on its own timetable toward allowing the yuan to trade freely, while also arguing that it has unfairly been made a scapegoat for the loss of manufacturing jobs in the United States.

The yuan has strengthened against the dollar by about 6.5 percent since July 2005, when China allowed its currency to move more freely than in years past.

Paulson's arrival as Treasury secretary last summer raised hope that his business experience in China would help him persuade Beijing to move faster. But two well publicized trips to China in recent months accomplished little. With the U.S. trade deficit with China expanding to a record high and voters in last November's elections expressing anxiety about globalization, Paulson faces intensifying pressure to deliver.

"All the jawboning and talking you are doing with the Chinese is not going to affect one iota that steelworker" who lost his job to overseas competition, said Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky).

Paulson Urges Talks With China (WT/AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. insisted yesterday that new high-level talks with China offer the greatest chance of success in reducing the soaring U.S. trade deficit.

He faced a skeptical Senate banking committee where both Democratic and Republican senators said they thought China would listen only if the country faced punitive economic sanctions.

The lawmakers said nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs have been lost since early 2001, a period during which the trade deficit has hit records for five straight years and the imbalance with China has soared to a new high.

"All the jawboning and talking you are doing with the Chinese is not going to affect one iota that steelworker" who has lost his job to unfair foreign competition, Sen. Jim Bunning, Kentucky Republican, told Mr. Paulson.

Many senators said they were upset that the Bush administration did not cite China as a currency manipulator in a report it sent Congress in December.

Such a designation would have triggered negotiations with the Chinese and could have led to punitive sanctions against imports if the United States had won a case before the World Trade Organization.

Mr. Paulson said he thought a better approach was the new Strategic Economic Dialogue he began with the Chinese in December involving seven members of the Bush Cabinet in meetings with top Chinese officials in Beijing.

He said those twice-a-year discussions offered the best hope for persuading China to make the types of economic changes that would reduce the U.S.-China trade gap. He said he would make these discussions a top priority in the two years left in the Bush administration. The next meeting is scheduled for May in Washington.

"I really believe we have a plan in place that gives us the best chance of making progress," Mr. Paulson said while conceding that at the end of two years "we could still be frustrated because we would like to see more progress."

DOJ_NMG_0125513

Mr. Paulson said pursuing economic sanctions against China could cause the Chinese government to abandon reform efforts for fear they would be seen as caving to foreign pressure.

Senate banking committee Chairman Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, said he thought events could quickly overtake Mr. Paulson's effort given the level of unhappiness in the U.S. over trade deficits and lost jobs.

"The Congress is not going to wait and see how this is progressing when they watch 3 million manufacturing jobs leave this country," Mr. Dodd told Mr. Paulson. "You are going to get blown by if we don't get a better handle on this."

Senators on the panel pressed Mr. Paulson to outline exactly how the administration planned to persuade China to move more quickly.

Mr. Paulson did not say whether the administration would support economic sanctions although he did not rule out future WTO cases. He said he would be pressing the Chinese to allow the value of the yuan to rise by larger amounts on a daily basis and to allow currency markets rather than government intervention to play more of a role in setting the yuan's value.

U.S. manufacturers contend that China is manipulating its currency to keep it undervalued against the U.S. dollar by 20 percent or more. Such an action makes Chinese goods cheaper for American consumers and U.S. products more expensive in China.

Paulson Lays Out His Yuan Wish List (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Faced with relentless, bipartisan China-bashing on Capitol Hill, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson laid out a series of economic changes he expects Beijing to undertake before President Bush leaves office.

Mr. Paulson, who has staked his tenure on his extensive experience and ambitious agenda with China, told senators that he will measure his own success by how far and fast Beijing moves, especially in loosening its grip on its currency, the yuan.

"My goal is to make significant progress toward a fully market-determined, floating Chinese currency," Mr. Paulson, a former Goldman Sachs chief executive, told the Senate Banking Committee.

Mr. Paulson and his Treasury predecessors have consistently urged the Chinese to allow the yuan to rise against the dollar; U.S. manufacturers complain that an artificially weak yuan makes competing against Chinese companies unfairly difficult. But yesterday's Senate hearing was the first time since he took office last year that Mr. Paulson has set out markers for progress other than percentage-point moves in the yuan-dollar exchange rate.

The secretary identified four steps China should take on the road to a freely floating exchange rate:

Widen the trading band within which the yuan is allowed to move.

WSJ's Ian McDonald discusses2 the bullish Chinese markets.

Reduce central-bank purchases of dollars.

Develop a bond market to absorb foreign-exchange flows and provide instruments to hedge against currency risks.

Establish clear central-bank policy targets to avoid inflation and build confidence in the yuan's value.

While the Chinese authorities "agree they need to introduce currency flexibility and move to a floating exchange rate, they are not moving quickly enough for the United States or the rest of the global community," Mr. Paulson testified. "And they are not moving quickly enough for their own good."

The yuan has appreciated 6.51% against the dollar since the Chinese began to allow it to move in July 2005.

Mr. Paulson was grilled for more than two hours by skeptical senators, several of whom complained of the difficulty of explaining benefits of free trade to constituents who have seen their jobs move to China or elsewhere.

"We meet our constituents, and they are livid," Sen. Chris Dodd (D., Conn.) told Mr. Paulson. "Congress isn't going to wait necessarily for us to get some sort of vague definitions of how this is progressing when they watch three million manufacturing jobs leave this country."

Goldsmith Reveals Saudi Royal Dilemma (FT)

By Christopher Adams, Michael Peel and Jimmy Burns

DOJ_NMG_0125514

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Lord Goldsmith, the attorney-general, believed that Senior Saudi royals, possibly even King Abdullah, would have been needed as essential witnesses had a corruption inquiry into the al-Yamamah arms deal led to charges against BAE Systems.

But he judged it would have been unrealistic to expect the country's rulers to submit themselves to questioning. This, combined with uncertainty over whom to approach in Riyadh, posed "insuperable" obstacles to a prosecution, he said.

In an interview with the Financial Times, he spelt out his belief that Saudi Arabia's "particular constitutional position" was a key reason why a Serious Fraud Office inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE was doomed to failure.

His comments put him further at odds with investigators, who have said it was impossible to reach such a firm view about the case's prospects until the probe was over.

Saudi Arabia had threatened to cease all security and intelligence co-operation after it emerged the SFO was poised to gain access to secret Swiss bank accounts belonging, it is believed, to the royals.

The corruption inquiry into Britain's biggest export agreement was abandoned in December after intervention by Tony Blair. The government cited fears for national security. Britain, though, has been accused of ignoring its anti-bribery commitments to save a fighter jet deal with the Saudis.

In an account of his role, the attorney-general defended the decision to scrap the inquiry. He said the main obstacle was the difficulty of proving corruption under current laws. These require prosecutors to show the person receiving bribes – the "agent" – was acting without the approval of their boss – the "principal".

"Normally to produce a corruption case you ... will call somebody senior from the company to say: 'Good heavens, I never knew the marketing director was taking used £50 notes, or getting a free subscription to the golf club, or having his roof done', or whatever it may be. That's the first person you call," said Lord Goldsmith.

"The reason I was concerned was because of the particular constitutional position of Saudi Arabia ... And, indeed, how, in this context, do you ever succeed in showing that? BAE were asserting that the payments had been authorised at the highest level [in Saudi Arabia]," he said.

BAE has always declined to comment on the investigation, except to reject the allegations it bribed Saudi officials. Lord Goldsmith believed the company's assertion would probably have meant questioning senior members of Saudi Arabia's royal family. Whitehall insiders said the royals were unlikely to agree to appear in a witness box.

A source close to the Saudi ambassador in London declined to comment.

The Liberal Democrats will on Thursday attack the government's move to abandon the Serious Fraud Office investigation into BAE Systems' dealings in Saudi Arabia, in a House of Lords debate.

British Police Finish Inquiry In Poisoning Case (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

Sources close to the family of a dead former KGB agent say they believe people in Russia are suspected.

LONDON — British police said Wednesday that they had concluded their investigation of the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, and handed the case to prosecutors for a decision on whether to file charges.

Though authorities refused to disclose their findings, people close to Litvinenko's family said they believed authorities were leaning toward suspects in Russia as the probable perpetrators.

"From my understanding, they know where and who and how. They know exactly what happened," said one source, who had not been formally briefed on the police findings.

Prosecutors have said they will review the results of the detectives' work and determine whether it is appropriate to file charges. But if the results identify suspects in Russia, it might be moot; authorities there have already said it would be impossible under Russian law to extradite them to Britain for trial.

Litvinenko, a former colonel with the Russian security services who resigned and became a dissident in London, was killed with a massive dose of radioactive polonium-210. The poison appears to have been administered Nov. 1 in tea he drank at a

London hotel while with two businessmen from Russia, Andrei Lugovoy and Dmitry Kovtun, both of whom formerly had ties to the Russian security services.

Lugovoy and Kovtun have denied any role in the poisoning and have said they consider themselves victims in the case.

In an interview Wednesday in his London office, exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky said he met with Lugovoy a day before Litvinenko was poisoned. Berezovsky formerly employed Lugovoy and Litvinenko and believes the Russian security services were behind the poisoning.

"Mr. Lugovoy, who now is suspected to be the killer, he was sitting in this room in front of me, and we drank wine with him. And he had not less chances to poison me in this office where we are present now than to do the same in the hotel, putting polonium to a cup of tea of my friend Alexander," Berezovsky said.

He said he had a "more or less clear answer" to why he was not targeted for poisoning, but had pledged to the police that he would not discuss the case in detail until the investigation was concluded.

"I think the main point for the British government today is that until they find all the rings of [the] chain, how it happened, starting from the place where the polonium was taken until it reached the cup of tea of Alexander, no one British is able to feel protected," Berezovsky said. "The problem now is whether this government is able to protect the population of this country from the same plot again."

Many in Russia have suggested that Berezovsky could have poisoned his friend in an effort to discredit Russian President Vladimir V. Putin.

The BBC television program "Panorama" reported last week that authorities think Litvinenko may have been poisoned not once, but twice, and may have received an initial dose two weeks before his Nov. 1 meeting at the hotel. Litvinenko had also met Lugovoy and Kovtun on Oct. 16 at a sushi restaurant near Piccadilly Circus, which later was found to have significant traces of polonium-210, the program said.

The restaurant was the same one at which Litvinenko met Italian contact Mario Scaramella on Nov. 1, but Scaramella told the BBC that the polonium had been found at a table other than the one at which he sat with Litvinenko.

Lugovoy attorney Andrei Romashov said his client had not been informed that he was anything other than a witness.

"If the investigation is over and the case is transferred to the prosecutors, a witness should be informed about it, especially if his status has changed. We know nothing about any change in status," he said.

He said Lugovoy, whose family traveled with him on the trip to London during which he met Litvinenko, would never have knowingly exposed his family.

"It is absurd to think that a person who wants to commit such a serious and socially dangerous crime would bring his entire family, wife and children, along. This doesn't make sense," Romashov said.

Russian officials also have launched an inquiry in the case and have discussed traveling to London to interview witnesses. A number of Russian citizens charged or suspected of crimes in Russia have sought political asylum in Britain, including Berezovsky, and Russian investigators have signaled their interest in questioning some of them as part of their own inquiry.

Dmitry Oreshkin, senior political analyst with the Russian Academy of Sciences' Institute of Geography in Moscow, said it appeared certain that Russia would place insurmountable roadblocks in the way of any notion of Russian suspects being tried in Britain, even if the suspects volunteered to go.

"I think Lugovoy may come out and make a statement to the effect that he is ready to go to London and face the trial, but that statement will most likely be accompanied by a number of hard-to-fulfill demands, like for instance the desire of the Russian Prosecutor's Office to interrogate about 100 people in Britain, including dozens of persons related to Yukos," Oreshkin said, referring to an oil company dismantled as part of a government tax case and whose chief executive has been imprisoned.

Chavez Wins Move To 'Dictatorship' (WT/AP)

By Fabiola Sanchez

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chavez was granted free rein yesterday to accelerate changes in broad areas of society by presidential decree -- a move critics said propels Venezuela toward dictatorship.

Convening in a downtown plaza in a session that resembled a political rally, lawmakers unanimously gave Mr. Chavez sweeping powers to legislate by decree and impose his radical vision of a more egalitarian socialist state.

"Long live the sovereign people. Long live President Hugo Chavez. Long live socialism," National Assembly President Cilia Flores said as she proclaimed the "enabling law" approved by a show of hands. "Fatherland, socialism or death. We will prevail."

The law gives Mr. Chavez, who is beginning a fresh six-year term, more power than he has ever had in eight years as president, and he plans to use it over the next 18 months to transform broad areas of public life, from the economy and the oil industry in particular to "social matters" and the very structure of the state.

His critics call it a radical lurch toward authoritarianism by a leader with unchecked power, similar to how Fidel Castro monopolized leadership in Cuba.

"If you have all the power, why do you need more power?" said Luis Gonzalez, a high school teacher who paused to watch in the plaza, calling it a "media show" intended to give legitimacy to a repugnant move. "We're headed toward a dictatorship, disguised as a democracy."

Hundreds of Chavez supporters wearing ruling-party red gathered in the plaza, waving signs reading "Socialism is democracy," as lawmakers read out passages of the law giving the president special powers to transform 11 areas of Venezuelan law.

Vice President Jorge Rodriguez publicly ridiculed the idea that the law is an abuse of power and argued that democracy is flourishing. He thanked the National Assembly for providing "gasoline" to start up the "engine" of societal changes.

"Dictatorship is what there used to be," Mr. Rodriguez said. "We want to impose the dictatorship of a true democracy."

After the vote, Mr. Chavez remained out of public view but announced plans for a press conference today at the presidential palace.

Mr. Chavez, a former paratroop commander re-elected with 63 percent of the vote in December, has said he will decree nationalization of Venezuela's largest telecommunications company and the electricity sector, slap new taxes on the rich, and impose greater state control over the oil and natural gas industries.

The law also allows Mr. Chavez to dictate unspecified measures to transform state institutions; reform banking, tax, insurance and financial regulations; decide on security and defense matters such as gun regulations and military organization; and "adapt" legislation to ensure "the equal distribution of wealth" as part of a new "social and economic model."

Historian Ines Quintero said that with the new powers, Mr. Chavez will achieve a level of "hegemony" that is unprecedented in the nation's nearly five decades of democratic history.

The top U.S. diplomat for Latin America said the law isn't an issue for the United States.

"The enabling law isn't anything new in Venezuela. It's something valid under the constitution," Tom Shannon, the assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs, told reporters in Colombia.

"As with any tool of democracy, it depends how it is used," he added. "At the end of the day, it's not a question for the United States or for other countries, but for Venezuela."

Keeping Up With The Chávezes (WSJ)

By Francis Fukuyama

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

What is it that leaders like Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah and Venezuela's Hugo Chávez have in common that vastly increases their local appeal? A foreign policy built around anti-Americanism is, of course, a core component. But what has allowed them to win elections and build support in their societies is less their foreign-policy stances than their ability to promise, and to a certain extent deliver on, social policy -- things like education, health and other social services, particularly for the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0125517

Mr. Chávez has opened clinics staffed with Cuban doctors in poor barrios throughout Venezuela; Hezbollah has provided social services for years and is now in the business of using Iranian money to rebuild homes in the devastated south of Lebanon. Hamas in Palestine, the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and Evo Morales in Bolivia all have active social agendas. Organizations like Hezbollah and Hamas do not merely lobby the government to provide social services; they run schools and clinics directly.

The U.S. and the political groups that it tends to support around the world, by contrast, have relatively little to offer in this regard. Washington stresses democracy and human rights -- that is, procedural safeguards that institutionalize popular sovereignty and limited government -- as well as free trade, with its promise of economic growth. This is a good agenda in line with American values, and it has worked well in Eastern Europe and East Asia. But it tends to appeal to middle-class, educated constituents. In those parts of the developing world that suffer from deep social cleavages and inequalities, free elections and free trade have relatively little resonance for the great majority of the population that is poor.

The reason that Washington has so little to offer in the social sphere is that American politics itself has focused on cutting back on the state sector and social services in the past generation. From the New Deal through the Great Society, the American welfare state grew enormously. Ronald Reagan came into office promising to cut back on entitlements and "big government," which he argued was an obstacle to economic growth. In the context of U.S. politics this made a lot of sense. America's freer labor markets and deregulated economy laid the groundwork for more than two decades of sustained productivity growth. Britain went through a similar revolution in late 1970s and '80s under Margaret Thatcher; the failure of continental Europe to follow suit has saddled it with an unsustainable welfare state and entitlement crisis.

But the legacy of the shift toward "smaller government" has meant that there has been little new thinking in the U.S. on social policy. The Democrats returning to power are loath to offer proposals for ambitious new social programs, sticking with penny-ante proposals like raising the minimum wage or student loans. Washington has lots of advice to give developing countries on economic policy, in terms of deregulation, privatization, reduction of tariff barriers and the like. But apart from Hernando de Soto's pioneering work on property rights for the poor, there is no clear agenda on how to help Bolivia, Pakistan or Egypt improve their primary education systems or get health services delivered more efficiently in poor neighborhoods.

Part of the problem is that while social policy is popular, it has many pitfalls and is very hard to do well. Badly designed social programs don't achieve their primary purposes, and retard economic growth in the long run. Social safety nets have a habit of becoming entrenched entitlements, controlled by powerful lobbies that benefit directly from public spending and use their power to expand the rents they receive. In Argentina and Mexico, public education is controlled by centralized teachers' unions whose main interest is in protecting the interests of the adults in the system rather than the children.

As was the case with the American welfare system, cash transfers breed dependence and moral hazard. In the case of the Depression-era Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), the program had the unexpected consequence of encouraging out-of-wedlock births. Post World War II housing programs for the poor took no account of existing social capital in poor neighborhoods and created vertical slums that were soon taken over by drugs and gangs. It was for these reasons that AFDC was abolished by Congress in 1996, and housing projects like the Robert Taylor homes in Chicago have been dynamited. In developing countries with deeply dysfunctional public sectors, the World Bank can finance the building of schools and clinics, but has a much harder time incentivizing teachers and health-care workers to show up for work.

Some of the newest and most innovative social policy has been designed by economists who, taking these earlier experiences into account, have tried to design programs that also take incentives into account from the get-go. For example, the Mexican Progresa program of conditional cash transfers pays poor people a stipend on the condition that they send their children to school, recognizing the fact that many poor families see greater benefit in putting their children to work rather than educating them. Built into the program was a way of empirically testing its effects, by deliberately creating control groups that could be used to benchmark its impact. There are by now a host of econometric studies documenting how Progresa raised school attendance rates dramatically, though its final impact on long-term educational outcomes is less certain. Early success led to the program being extended broadly across Mexico as the Oportunidades program, where it now reaches into urban neighborhoods.

Progresa's success has led to it being copied in other parts of Latin America, like the Red de Protección Social program in Nicaragua, the Programa de Asignación Familiar in Honduras and the Bolsa Família in Brazil. The Bolsa Família now reaches some 15 million poor Brazilians, and appears to have had an actual impact in lowering that country's Gini coefficient (a measure of income inequality), Brazil's being one of the highest in the world.

What is fascinating about these new social programs is that they were initiated not by leftist politicians, but by pro-free-market leaders on the conservative side of the spectrum. Progresa was started by Ernesto Zedillo of the dominant Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) during the 1990s, and greatly expanded by the National Action Party's Vicente Fox over the past six years. There is some evidence that the current president, conservative Felipe Calderón, may owe his razor-thin victory over leftist Andrés Manuel López Obrador to a substantial number of poor voters who supported him out of gratitude for Mr. Fox's Oportunidades. The Bolsa Família was initiated in Brazil by pro-market President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, and only later expanded by his leftist successor Ignacio Lula da Silva.

If the U.S. wants to support liberal democracy around the world, it needs to start thinking seriously about a well-designed social agenda that will appeal to the poor. There is both an inherent and an instrumental reason for this. In itself, the world's poor desperately need help, and have often been ill-served by the interventions of well-intentioned outsiders.

And if true supporters of liberal democracy and free markets are ever to compete successfully with the Islamists and populists of the world, they need to have a social agenda that gives some hope not just to the middle-class and educated, but to those who are isolated and excluded as well. Above all, we need to stop seeing this issue through the old left-right ideological lens of American domestic politics, and recognize that our influence is dependent in large measure on our ability to offer people around the world what they want, and not what we think they should want.

Mr. Fukuyama is professor of international political economy at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and editorial chairman of the American Interest.

A Separate Peace (NYT)

By Timothy William Waters

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Washington

JUST a few years ago, there was guarded optimism about Kosovo's future. Checkpoints were dismantled; the process to establish governance standards was under way. But that was before the communal riots in 2004, and before Albanians' and Serbs' incompatible visions for Kosovo led to deadlock last year in talks over the province's final status. And so now, more than seven years after NATO ended Serbia's brutal dominion over the province, the international community is about to impose a solution.

Too bad it's the wrong one. The likely plan gives too little to Albanians and takes too much from Serbs. But there's an alternative, if only the international community would consider it: partition. Flexibility on borders could make a fully independent Kosovo easier to govern, provide more protection for minorities and make a negotiated deal attainable. Partition is possible, and possibly the right thing to do.

Yet every proposal assumes partition must be ruled out. The United Nations plan, due to be presented Friday to the Serbian and Kosovo governments but whose details leaked last week, follows the conventional wisdom. It offers a half-state on the whole territory: Kosovo will get most of the powers of a sovereign state without full independence, and with no revision of its borders. But that combination is unacceptable to Albanians and Serbs: Albanians suffered horribly under Serbian rule and deserve full independence, yet any separate status for Kosovo poses a threat to non-Albanian minorities there.

The international community's all-Kosovo fixation has forced it to concoct complex power-sharing schemes to accommodate two mistrustful populations before considering independence. The costs of this ''standards before status'' approach have been predictable: an uncertain investment environment, frustrated expectations and a fragility that destabilizes the region.

It would be one thing if these mutually suspicious populations were inextricably linked, but they aren't. The majority of Serbs in Kosovo live in a small strip in the far north. Partition would allow them to continue living in Serbia. The remaining pockets would be less threatening to Albanians, making Kosovo more governable, and the small, remaining Serbian population safer.

DOJ_NMG_0125519

Partition could break the negotiating deadlock. The Albanian leadership in Pristina might give up the Serb-populated north in exchange for immediate recognition and streamlined governance without international supervision. And Serbia might relax its resistance to Kosovo's independence if it could retain the northern bit — which would ease international approval, since Russia has vowed to veto any plan that Serbia doesn't accept.

Objections to partition are many, but not compelling. Some observers assume re-examining borders would destabilize other states. But suppressing talk about partition can have the same effect. Imagine the passions that would ignite if we opposed Kosovo's separation from Serbia.

Others worry that partition would deprive Kosovo of the factories and mines in Trepca, in northern Kosovo. But far more necessary for the landlocked province are tolerable relations with Serbia and security of investment, neither of which is likely to follow from the United Nations solution.

Still others assert that letting Serbia keep part of Kosovo rewards ethnic cleansing. Yet everyone agrees we are justified in reducing Serbia's control over Albanian areas; the real question is how much intrusion on Serbia's sovereignty is necessary.

There is nothing magic or moral about Kosovo's borders. They are an artifact of Tito's Yugoslavia, and they never corresponded to ethnicity or contributed to social peace. If borders fail to ensure security or promote welfare, they should be changed. That's why we favored separating Kosovo from Serbia in the first place. That is a partition, too. So why is severing a smaller part of Serbia inherently wrong?

Kosovo's Albanians deserve real independence, and while Serbia must pay that price, individual Serbs should not suffer unnecessarily. Changing the border — reducing the partition we are undertaking — could make full, fair independence possible.

Partition isn't perfect; it's painful and carries risks. But the current plan will neither resolve Kosovo's uncertain status nor prevent an entire Balkan people from once again taking to the road. Surely it would be better to move the border than the people trapped within it. That sounds like a moral argument for putting partition back on the table.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House To Share Surveillance With Congress (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano
The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — A two-week standoff over documents in the White House domestic spying program came to an end Wednesday when Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to turn over to Congress classified material about secret eavesdropping.

The Bush administration last month said it would put its surveillance of potential terrorist activities under supervision of a federal court but did not disclose details of the revised program. A key Senate panel, newly controlled by Democrats, demanded access to the records to gauge whether the administration was going too far or breaking any laws in tracking terrorism suspects.

The decision to share information with Congress was the latest concession by the Bush administration, which had argued that it had the right to conduct its "war on terror" as it deemed necessary and that secrecy was vital to national security.

The documents, which include applications for electronic wiretaps and orders from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, will be made available to congressional committees only and not released to the public.

"We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country," Gonzales said. "But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs."

Some of the documents were made available to Congress on Wednesday, according to a Capitol Hill source.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said his panel would review the records before "deciding what further oversight or legislative action is necessary." Only then, he said, "can the judiciary committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a moderate who is the ranking Republican on the panel, had joined the Democrats in demanding the records be turned over. At a feisty hearing last month, he sharply criticized the attorney general for his refusal to release the documents even though the FISA court's presiding judge had no objections.

On Wednesday, Specter, while thanking the administration for releasing the records to the committee, added that he might at some point make them public, as long as that would not violate privacy rules or jeopardize legitimate ongoing federal investigations.

"They will not be made public until I've had a chance to see them," he said. But "my own view is that there ought to be the maximum disclosure to the public consistent with national security procedures."

Central to the dispute has been the White House argument that extraordinary steps must be taken to protect Americans from further terrorist plots since the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and conflicting concerns among Democrats and civil libertarians that the spying appears to be a wholesale violation of individual freedoms.

Under the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the National Security Agency eavesdropped on telephone and e-mail conversations between people in the U.S. and abroad without first getting a warrant from the FISA court. The program was launched weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks and remained secret until it was exposed in the New York Times in late 2005, creating a public furor.

Now, with the Democrats controlling Capitol Hill, the spying program is likely to become the target of several congressional investigations into operations by the Bush White House.

For instance, House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) said Wednesday that his panel members also would read the material, and that he and Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the ranking Republican, would have their own questions into "whether the program is effective at tracking terror suspects and whether the program adequately protects the liberties of the American people."

Gonzales said that the Justice Department would cooperate with both committees, and that he hoped the congressional leaders would realize how important the domestic spying program had become to national security.

"It's important for us that they understand what we're doing," the attorney general said. "All they have to do is ask."

Justice Expands On Spy Program Details (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, February 1, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales expanded Congress' access Wednesday to classified documents detailing the government's domestic spying program but still didn't satisfy several lawmakers demanding information about surveillance.

Investigators' applications, legal briefs and orders issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court are now open to the leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House and Senate intelligence committees, Gonzales said.

Two weeks ago, the Senate Judiciary Committee — led by Democratic Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — criticized the attorney general for refusing to answer specific questions about the secret court's new oversight of the controversial program.

"We obviously would be concerned about the public disclosure that may jeopardize the national security of our country," Gonzales told reporters Wednesday. "But we're working with the Congress to provide the information that it needs."

The documents would not be released publicly, the attorney general said. "We're talking about highly classified documents about highly classified activities of the United States government."

Leahy and Specter both said they welcomed the Bush administration's decision to show them the documents, which could give insight on how judges on the secret court consider evidence when approving government requests to spy on people in the United States who have suspected links to al-Qaida.

But Leahy said he will decide after he reviews the papers whether further oversight or legislative action is necessary. Specter stopped short of calling for them to be released publicly but said "there ought to be the maximum disclosure to the public, consistent with national security procedures."

"They will not be made public until I've had a chance to see them," Specter said.

The documents also are available to lawmakers and staffers on the House and Senate intelligence committees, who already were cleared to receive details about the spy program. But several lawmakers accused the Justice Department of still holding back crucial classified documents about the surveillance, including the original presidential order that created it in October 2001.

"We have informed Justice Department officials that the committee's requests for those documents remains in effect," House Intelligence Chairman Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, said in a statement. "We are hopeful that the administration will comply with those requests in a timely fashion and that further efforts to secure that material will not be necessary."

Congressional aides did not rule out the possibility of issuing a subpoena for those documents.

Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the department and Bush administration intelligence officials have provided "numerous documents and many briefings" to help lawmakers oversee the spy program.

The continued demands for more information underscores Congress' suspicions of the spying program, which President Bush secretly authorized after the 2001 terror attacks without court review. It was not revealed until December 2005, and has been a sore point for many lawmakers from both parties, as well as civil libertarians who fear people's privacy rights are being violated.

The warrantless program, run by the National Security Agency, monitors phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries that are suspected to be linked to agents of al-Qaida or affiliated terror groups. A federal judge in Detroit last August declared the program unconstitutional, and government lawyers were back in court Wednesday asking a Cincinnati-based appeals panel to drop a civil lawsuit against it.

The Justice Department argued that the American Civil Liberties Union's lawsuit is moot since the surveillance now is monitored by the FISA court. But the ACLU is asking the appeals court to uphold the earlier decision in August, since Bush retains authority to continue warrantless surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0125525

Gonzales described the decision to release the documents to Leahy and Specter as the result of ongoing negotiations between Congress and the administration. He said lawmakers most likely will not have to review the documents at the Justice Department, which keeps a tight grip on classified information, but offered few other details.

"It's important for us that they understand what we're doing," Gonzales said. "All they have to do is ask."

Records On Spy Program Turned Over To Lawmakers (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The Justice Department turned over documents about the government's controversial domestic spying program to select members of Congress yesterday, ending a two-week standoff that included pointed threats of subpoenas from Democrats.

The deal appears to resolve the latest conflict between Congress and the administration over the National Security Agency's surveillance effort, and it provides new evidence of the administration's more accommodating approach to the Democrats who now control Congress.

The agreement follows the administration's announcement two weeks ago that it was replacing NSA's warrantless surveillance program with a plan approved by the secret court that administers the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. The NSA had conducted the domestic spying for more than five years without court oversight.

Under yesterday's accord, announced by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, more than three dozen lawmakers will have access to the secret court orders governing the spying program that were issued Jan. 10 and the applications from the Justice Department that preceded them. The lawmakers include the House and Senate leaders, the members of the two intelligence panels and the heads of the two judiciary committees, officials said.

But Gonzales and other Bush administration officials also indicated that they had no intention of making the orders and related documents available to the public. The lawmakers and staff who view the records will be subject to strict statutes that bar disclosure of classified information. Congressional aides said it was unclear how much new information could be shared with the public.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the documents would help determine "what further oversight or legislative action is necessary.

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances," Leahy said.

Gonzales -- in remarks to reporters during an unrelated event announcing the formation of a human-trafficking unit at Justice -- played down any conflict with lawmakers. He said: "It's never been the case where we've said we would never provide access."

Gonzales said the orders cannot be released publicly because the subject matter is "highly classified."

One Justice official said Gonzales decided two weeks ago that both of the intelligence panels, along with Leahy and Arlen Specter (Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, should have access to the records.

But several congressional aides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the details of the negotiations, described a tense two-week standoff between the administration and lawmakers from both parties over the issue.

The staff members said the push for access was driven by Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.) and Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) -- the heads of the House and Senate intelligence panels -- who warned Justice Department officials that they would face congressional subpoenas if they did not turn over the records.

Reyes and other lawmakers said they would continue to push for other documents that the administration has refused to turn over, including the original order that created the NSA program in October 2001.

Shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, President Bush authorized the NSA to monitor telephone calls between the United States and overseas without warrants if one of the parties was believed to be linked to al-Qaeda or related groups. The program's existence was disclosed in media reports in December 2005.

Many lawmakers and civil liberties advocates called the program illegal, and a federal judge in Michigan ruled last August that it was unconstitutional and should be stopped. In oral arguments in an appeal of that case yesterday before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit, in Cincinnati, government lawyers said the lawsuit should be thrown out because of the new FISA orders.

Administration officials said previously that the NSA program could not be accommodated under FISA and that Bush had the power to authorize it on his own.

DOJ_NMG_0125526

The administration abruptly changed course last month, however, by obtaining approval for the spying from an unidentified judge on the FISA court. But the outlines of the new effort remain unclear because the government has refused to release details.

One key question is whether the new approach resembles traditional criminal procedures -- which require the government to obtain a separate warrant for each individual it wants to monitor -- or whether it allows eavesdropping on a more broadly defined group of people. Several sources who have been briefed on the program have described it as a hybrid of the two.

Specter said on the Senate floor yesterday that earlier briefings by Justice "fell short" because the details of the new program were left unclear. "In order to meet the traditional safeguards for establishment of probable cause, there would have to be individual warrants," he said.

Key Lawmakers Getting Files About Surveillance Program (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Bowing to bipartisan pressure from lawmakers, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that it was turning over to selected members of Congress secret documents with details of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program.

The decision was made two weeks after Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales faced senators' withering questions about why the Bush administration had refused to provide details about the legal underpinnings of the program.

Last week, Representative Silvestre Reyes, the Texas Democrat who is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, joined other committee members in threatening to subpoena documents related to the program.

Those threats prompted negotiations over the weekend between staff members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and Steven G. Bradbury, who leads the Office of Legal Counsel in the Justice Department.

The decision on the documents, which Mr. Gonzales confirmed Wednesday, will let members of the House and Senate intelligence committees, as well as a few Congressional leaders, review those court orders to determine whether the administration had significantly changed the program by putting it under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

A central question is whether the court will approve requests case by case or issue broad orders giving the government wide leeway to choose targets.

The document package for the lawmakers includes the Justice Department application for surveillance warrants from the special court and the legal briefs before the court approved a request on Jan. 10 for eavesdropping warrants.

Lawmakers from both parties applauded the decision, but promised that the new Congress would continue to scrutinize closely the legality of the program.

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Congressional officials said they were pressing the administration for more documents, including President Bush's original executive order that authorized the program, which was secretly established after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and did not require court warrants for certain wiretaps of calls between overseas and the United States.

Administration officials said they continued to want to limit future disclosures to Congress and were not agreeing to a precedent-setting arrangement in which everything that the special court reviewed would also be subject to Congressional review.

Just members of the intelligence committees and certain House and Senate leaders have been briefed on the highly classified program. Mr. Gonzales said a special provision would be made to allow the top members of the Judiciary Committees, who have not received the classified briefings, to review the FISA court documents.

Gonzales To Give Congress Secret Surveillance Papers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday agreed to hand over to some members of Congress previously secret documents on the government's domestic terrorist-surveillance program.

Mr. Gonzales, who acknowledged last month that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court had issued orders bringing the program under its jurisdiction, said the documents would be shared with members of the House and Senate intelligence committees and the Senate Judiciary Committee's chairman and ranking Republican.

The documents, which contain classified information, will not be made public.

"We've been working hard and having discussions to reach an appropriate accommodation as to how that access should be provided," Mr. Gonzales told reporters in Washington. "Access will be made available starting today."

The surveillance program, begun in 2001 after the September 11 attacks, gave law-enforcement authorities the ability to monitor telephone calls and e-mails to and from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

The Bush administration vigorously defended the legality of the program, saying it would be impossible to obtain warrants in time to intercept phone calls of those suspected of belonging to al Qaeda.

The Justice Department has said the program is "essential" in the war on terrorism, adding that it "ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack."

Last month, Mr. Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court would monitor Justice Department intercepts of international calls involving terrorism suspects in this country.

He said an order establishing oversight was issued Jan. 10 and gave the department, which conducts the program through the National Security Agency, the "necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages."

The announcement was considered a major concession by President Bush, who has argued since the secret program was publicly disclosed in 2005 that he did not need or want to use the special intelligence court.

During a Jan. 18 hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Mr. Gonzales was challenged by panel members on why the Bush administration had taken more than five years to seek oversight by an independent court for its wiretapping program.

Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, has been critical of the White House for its refusal to disclose details of the surveillance program. He called the policy a "clear-cut violation" of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) and said the administration could have moved quicker to get court approval.

"I cannot help but conclude that there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency on behalf of the Department of Justice to get this job done faster," he said.

He said yesterday that the documents would "not be made public until I've had a chance to see them."

Rep. Heather A. Wilson, New Mexico Republican and a senior member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said the administration did not intend to release other documents that explain how the FISA court's orders comply with the 1978 surveillance law the court oversees.

"We are playing hide the ball down at the Justice Department," said Mrs. Wilson, who told House intelligence committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat, that she would support the issuance of a subpoena if necessary.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, said the Bush administration made "the right decision" in changing its course of "unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program."

"Only with an understanding of the contours of the wiretapping program and the scope of the court's orders can the Judiciary Committee determine whether the administration has reached the proper balance to protect Americans while following the law and the principles of checks and balances," he said.

Lawmakers Receive Details Of Government Surveillance Program (MCT)

By Greg Gordon, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Wednesday turned over to key legislators copies of a secret court's "highly classified" orders spelling out how the administration has stopped wiretapping suspected terrorists without warrants and is now spying with judicial supervision.

Gonzales disclosed the decision, which averts a confrontation that might have brought congressional subpoenas, during a news briefing at the Justice Department.

The classified documents lay out details of a secret arrangement approved by a judge on an 11-member national security court that puts the spying program under its jurisdiction. The material was delivered to members of the House and Senate intelligence committees late in the day, congressional aides said.

The documents also will be made available to Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, both of whom have asked to review the new arrangement.

Leahy, Specter and members of the intelligence committees have voiced concern that the eavesdropping on some Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails may have violated their constitutional rights. Leahy and Specter praised President Bush for granting their requests to review details of the latest arrangement.

"The president has made the right decision in changing his previous course of unilaterally reauthorizing the warrantless surveillance program, to now following the law by seeking court approval for these wiretaps," Leahy said.

But he said he would "have to look at the court's order to determine whether the administration has reached that proper balance to protect Americans while following the law."

Specter called the move "a significant step forward" but said he would reserve judgment until he had reviewed the documents.

Those include Justice Department applications for what administration officials have described as a complicated arrangement to expedite the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's approval of electronic surveillance on American citizens' overseas phone calls and e-mails. The court was created under a 1978 law to approve warrants in espionage and terrorism investigations.

The administration has said it's eavesdropping only if one party to the communication is likely to be affiliated with al-Qaida or an associated terrorist group.

Gonzales said that the documents being released detail "highly classified activities" and must remain secret because their public disclosure "may jeopardize the national security of our country." He said that other documents on the program are "especially sensitive," and it's still not clear whether they'll be given to Congress.

The National Security Agency started the surveillance program shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and ran it for years without warrants or judicial review and in apparent violation of constitutional protections. The New York Times disclosed the program in December 2005, provoking an outcry from civil libertarians and others.

After a federal judge in Detroit ruled the program illegal last summer and Democrats seized control of Congress, Gonzales disclosed in January that the Justice Department had worked out an arrangement under which the FISA court would oversee the program. Justice Department officials said the new arrangement was under way for some time and was unrelated to an American Civil Liberties Union lawsuit that led to a court injunction halting the program or to the Democrats' election victory.

A panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments Wednesday on the government's petition for dismissal of U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's ruling last August ordering the government to halt the surveillance program because it was unconstitutional. Administration lawyers argued that that case is now moot, because the surveillance is now under the jurisdiction of the national security court.

But lawyers for the ACLU, representing 10 groups and individuals that contend that they have had to arrange secret meetings to communicate with overseas associates because of the wiretaps, said the case cannot be moot because the administration claims that Bush still has the power to conduct the surveillance without warrants.

Judges Weigh Arguments In U.S. Eavesdropping Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 31 — Three federal judges hearing the first appellate argument about the legality of a National Security Agency domestic surveillance program on Wednesday indicated that they were not that convinced the issue was moot now that the Bush administration had agreed to submit the program to a secret court.

In a series of sharply worded questions to an administration lawyer defending the program, the judges noted that the administration did not promise to continue working with the secret court in the future.

“You could opt out at any time, couldn’t you?” asked Judge Ronald L. Gilman of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre acknowledged the possibility.

But the judges pressed Mr. Garre’s adversary, Ann Beeson of the American Civil Liberties Union, just as hard on a different point — whether her clients had suffered injuries direct and concrete enough to give them standing to sue.

“Explain to me how we get to a finding of standing?” Judge Julia S. Gibbons asked.

Judge Gibbons repeated the question in similar form several times.

Ms. Beeson said the plaintiffs, who include lawyers and journalists, have had to change the way they communicate with clients and sources in the Middle East because they feared that their discussions would not be confidential.

But Judge Gibbons and Judge Alice M. Batchelder seemed skeptical about whether that sort of general and speculative fear was sufficient.

The government has refused to say whether it eavesdropped on the plaintiffs.

“Telling our enemies who is the subject of surveillance would reveal information that could harm the national security,” Mr. Garre said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0125529

The A.C.L.U. brought suit last year after an article in The New York Times disclosed the existence of the program, which monitors the international communications of people in the United States without court approval.

In August, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of the Federal District Court in Detroit ordered the program shut down. The decision has been stayed during the appeal to the Sixth Circuit.

Judge Gilman raised the possibility that the legality of the program might never be adjudicated. “If the plaintiffs here don’t have standing,” he said, “who would possibly have standing?”

While Mr. Garre urged the court to dismiss the case under threshold questions like mootness and standing, Ms. Beeson tried to steer the judges toward the merits.

“A failure to decide the case will leave it up to the president whether and when to follow the law,” Ms. Beeson said.

Over the course of the litigation, the government has refined some of its arguments.

Early statements from various administration officials appeared to concede that the program violated a 1978 law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

But the government’s appellate filings say that is an open question and one that cannot be answered without disclosing state secrets.

At several points in the argument, Mr. Garre said that the so-called state secrets privilege was a litigation showstopper. The privilege requires courts to limit or dismiss cases when allowing them to proceed would disclose information harmful to national security.

Several courts have ruled, however, that the administration’s general description and defense of the N.S.A. program meant that it was no longer secret and that questions about its legality could be decided without raising national security concerns.

Assuming the court finds a path through the thicket of preliminary objections, it will be left with the question of whether the president was entitled to ignore the 1978 law when he authorized eavesdropping that bypassed warrants.

Mr. Garre said that a 2001 Congressional authorization to use military force after the Sept. 11 attacks overrode the law.

Judge Gilman seemed unconvinced. “I understand your argument,” he said. “I’m not sure I agree with it.”

The administration has also said that the president has the constitutional power, regardless of what Congress has to say, to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance in wartime.

Judge Taylor’s decision striking down the program was sweeping, and her reasoning, which was in places unorthodox, attracted criticism even from legal scholars who supported her conclusion.

In its public briefs, the government said Judge Taylor had taken “the unprecedented step of permanently enjoining a foreign intelligence gathering program authorized by the commander in chief to protect the nation from foreign attacks in wartime.”

The government has also filed classified versions of its briefs and other documents, which are available only to the judges.

Judge Batchelder was appointed by President George Bush, Judge Gilman by President Bill Clinton, and Judge Gibbons by President George W. Bush.

Appeals Court Hears Wiretapping Case (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

The ACLU says the program is illegal and has done harm. The Justice Department argues it's both legal and moot.

CINCINNATI — A lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union urged a federal appeals court on Wednesday to affirm a lower-court decision that the Bush administration's Terrorist Surveillance Program was illegal and show "the president that he has to obey the law."

But a Justice Department lawyer maintained that the program was legal and called on the judges to overturn the ruling, while also arguing that the case was now moot.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals peppered the attorneys with questions about broad constitutional principles as well as the issue of whether the ACLU's clients had legal standing to challenge the program.

In a related development in Washington, the administration agreed Wednesday to turn over to Congress classified documents related to the surveillance program.

At the hearing in Cincinnati, Justice Department attorney Gregory Garre said that when Congress authorized the use of military force after the Sept. 11 attacks, it clearly contemplated that the president would have the authority to conduct counterintelligence surveillance of the type used in the program. Garre said it would be unprecedented for a U.S. court to say that a president did not have such power.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled in Detroit that the warrantless domestic surveillance program violated the 1st and 4th amendments to the Constitution and ran afoul of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law was created in 1978 in response to revelations about illegal government surveillance of hundreds of Americans, including the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

ACLU attorney Ann Beeson said that the administration's post-Sept. 11 surveillance program clearly violated FISA, which requires a warrant to be issued before surveillance is conducted.

She told the judges that if they accepted Garre's argument, it would, in effect, mean that the FISA law had been overridden without Congress saying that it wished to do so. "To rule for the government" in this case would mean "the president has unbridled power," Beeson told the judges.

"Congress did its part," by passing the FISA statute, Beeson said. Now, after the government acted in "direct violation" of FISA for more than four years, she said, "it is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil."

She also asked the court to unseal secret documents the government had filed in the case.

Garre asserted though that the case was moot now because of the Jan. 17 announcement by Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the Bush administration had made an agreement with the FISA court to get surveillance warrants there. "We have eliminated the central premise" of the case, Garre said.

At least two of the judges hearing the appeal — Ronald Lee Gilman, an appointee of President Clinton, and Alice Batchelder, an appointee of the first President Bush — expressed skepticism about that contention.

"The FISA court didn't wake up one morning and call — you went to them," Batchelder said.

"You could opt out of FISA any time, couldn't you?" Gilman asked.

"That's absolutely true," Garre responded. But he reiterated the central arguments the Justice Department had made since the ACLU filed the suit a year ago on behalf of a group of lawyers, journalists and scholars. He said the suit had to be dismissed because it violated the "state secrets" privilege.

First recognized by the Supreme Court 54 years ago in U.S. vs. Reynolds, the privilege bars disclosure of information in court proceedings when "there is a reasonable danger that the compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged."

The plaintiffs have not been able to demonstrate that the program concretely harmed them, Garre said. They have alleged only "speculative" harm, and that is insufficient to entitle them to sue, he said. Moreover, the only way the plaintiffs could find out whether they had been the targets of wiretapping was if they obtained information about the surveillance program in violation of the state secrets privilege, Garre said.

"Telling our enemies who is subject to surveillance … would harm national security," he said.

Beeson countered that Garre had overstated the breadth of the state-secrets privilege, and she maintained that her clients had suffered "concrete harm" by having to forego conversations with individuals who they reasonably believed that might be the targets of surveillance.

She noted, for example, that New Mexico defense lawyer Nancy Hollander had to travel to Africa and the Middle East to do research on behalf of clients — work she normally could have done through telephone conversations or e-mail.

Beeson said that hundreds of lawyers had to change their behavior as a result of the surveillance program and that this hampered their ability to effectively represent their clients.

The judges did not indicate when they would rule.

Warrantless Wiretapping Challenged In US Court (AFP)

AFP, February 1, 2007

President George W. Bush's domestic surveillance program came under fire in a federal appeals court, when opponents challenged it as an unconstitutional abuse of presidential power.

Critics of the program asked the US 6th Circuit Court of Appeals to uphold a lower court decision that the spy program is illegal unless it is subject to court supervision.

They also asked for the appeals court to unseal secret documents filed by the Bush administration in the case, which describe how the program is being administered.

At issue is whether or not the administration will receive blanket approval to spy on its citizens or if every case will be approved individually.

They have the support of Senator Arlen Specter, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who accused the Justice Department of "limiting access to key evidence on national security grounds as a means of controlling the outcome of these cases and obstructing the federal courts in their adjudications."

DOJ_NMG_0125531

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday that the high ranking senators would have access to the documents in order to oversee the program but refused to declassify them.

Bush started the wiretapping program after the September 11 attacks five years ago and has said he does not need court oversight to authorize the surveillance.

A district court judge ordered Bush to shut down the program on August 17, ruling that there are "no hereditary kings in America and no power not created by the Constitution."

Bush agreed on January 10 to allow that court to oversee the surveillance program, but he maintains he is not obligated to do so.

Government lawyers argued that the case is moot because the president has agreed to court supervision.

The judges, however, suggested a constitutional issue remains, since Bush has said he could resume the program without court oversight in the future.

"You could opt out at any time, couldn't you?" asked Judge Ronald Lee Gilman.

"That's absolutely true," said Gregory Garre, a deputy solicitor general.

Critics said that's why the 6th Circuit must declare Bush's original program unconstitutional.

"A failure to decide this case would leave it up to the president to decide whether or when to follow the law," said Ann Beeson, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, which sued last year to halt the program.

"It is this court's duty to serve as a check on the arbitrary exercise of government power to wiretap American citizens on American soil."

Government lawyers told the three 6th Circuit judges Wednesday that the ACLU's case compromises national security because it would require the government to publicly discuss the surveillance.

"Telling our enemies who is subject to surveillance ... would harm national security," Garre argued.

The three-judge panel did not decide the case Wednesday and could take months before issuing an opinion.

U.S. Probes Equity Firm Tied To Islamic Investors (WP)

By David Cho

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The counterterrorism division of the Justice Department is investigating whether a private equity firm in Boston that manages hundreds of millions of dollars for Muslim investors overseas violated tax laws.

The investigation of Overland Capital Group was disclosed in a filing with U.S. District Court in Boston and reported by the Wall Street Journal yesterday.

The filing claims that Overland and a subsidiary of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust (DMI), a financial group in Geneva, conducted acts "that implicate potential violation of the Internal Revenue Code." The filing does not mention terrorism, though it was submitted by a U.S. attorney who works in counterterrorism.

Subsidiaries of DMI, an umbrella organization for Islamic financial institutions, have been named as suspects in probes by U.S. counterterrorism agencies. DMI also is a defendant in a civil lawsuit brought by families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, who claim that it funded al-Qaeda. DMI has denied those claims and noted that none of its officials has been charged with terrorism-related crimes.

DMI officials say it has no direct relationship to Overland. But corporate filings in the U.S. show that the firms have a joint venture called First Leasing Bank in Bahrain. The Journal reported that DMI's chief executive headed some of Overland's investment ventures.

DMI was founded in the early 1980s by Prince Mohammed al-Faisal al-Saud, a member of the Saudi royal family. It caters to investors who want to follow the Koran, which prohibits the collection of interest payments.

Overland was founded in October 2001 and has investments worth $1.5 billion, mainly in real estate, according to its Web site. Chief executive James M. Godec said in a written statement yesterday that Overland "followed both the letter and the spirit of the law in every instance" and that he would "vigorously defend our reputation."

The filing came to light through litigation between Overland and a former employee, Laird A. Fairchild, who claimed that he was wrongfully dismissed. Fairchild cooperated with federal investigators after his termination, an act that Overland said violated his confidentiality agreements with the company.

Overland and the DMI subsidiary sued to compel Fairchild to reveal to them what he had told federal investigators. Through its filing in Boston, the Justice Department obtained a court order that allowed Fairchild to remain silent.

Geoffrey Harper, Fairchild's attorney, said yesterday that U.S. attorneys went to "elaborate lengths" to make sure that Fairchild would not reveal what he told government investigators. He said the Justice Department has concerns beyond the tax practices of Overland and DMI.

"It would be inaccurate to suggest that the only thing they are looking at is taxes," Harper said.

Hub Firm Denies Tie To Terror (BOS)

By Sacha Pfeiffer And Steve Bailey, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 1, 2007

US tax probe studies links to groups that may fund extremists

The chief executive of a Boston private equity firm under federal investigation for its connection to groups that allegedly finance Islamic extremists denied yesterday that his company is linked to terrorism.

"We do everything appropriately and by the book, and we adhere not just to the letter of the law but to the spirit of the law," said James M. Godec of Overland Capital Group. "I am extraordinarily cautious about this kind of stuff."

The US Department of Justice probe centers on alleged criminal tax law violations by Overland. A federal grand jury in Boston is examining suspected tax evasion by the company, according to a filing last week in US District Court in Massachusetts, and Overland's offices at 111 Huntington Ave. in Boston and in Braintree were raided two weeks ago by Internal Revenue Service agents who seized numerous records.

The Justice Department lawyer named in the filing, Corey J. Smith, works in the terrorism financing unit of the department's criminal division; since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorism attacks, prosecutors have increasingly used tax laws to bring terrorism cases against wealthy Middle Easterners suspected of funneling money to terrorist groups. The investigation was disclosed in yesterday's Wall Street Journal. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

"By policy, we never confirm or deny whether or not there's an investigation into an entity or a person," said the spokesman, Dean Boyd.

Overland, which has more than $1.5 billion in assets under management, was founded in October 2001 by Godec and several other former KeyBank investment professionals. The 23-person firm represents international investors, particularly in Europe and the Middle East, seeking real estate and equipment-leasing investment opportunities in the United States.

The original majority owner of Overland was Islamic Investment Co. of the Gulf Ltd., a unit of Dar Al-Maal Al-Islami Trust, or DMI, a Geneva-based financial group founded by a senior member of the royal family of Saudi Arabia. DMI specializes in Islamic banking, which prohibits paying or receiving interest and dealing in liquor, pork, gambling, or pornography. The US government suspects that terrorist groups sometimes access money with support from people involved in Islamic banking.

A DMI affiliate called Faisal Private Bank was investigated by US counterterrorism agencies in the mid-1990s for suspected connections to extremists, and both DMI and Faisal are defendants in civil litigation in New York brought by families of Sept. 11 victims who claim they funded al Qaeda.

Overland's two primary institutional investment clients are Islamic Investment Co. of the Gulf Ltd. and Shamil Bank of Bahrain, according to Godec. He said Overland, which is audited by KPMG, goes through an extensive due diligence process with its investors, whom he described as "mature, sober, older guys in their 50s and up."

"I know these guys," he said. "I believe in these guys, and I believe in their integrity and honesty.

"I understand and sympathize with what the government needs to do for national security, but I believe in what I do and will stand up in defense of it," added Godec, noting that his family has a long history of military and government service. He said his father was a career member of the US Air Force, his mother was a 25-year IRS employee, and his brother, Robert F. Godec, is US ambassador to Tunisia.

"In my heart, I know what we've done is entirely appropriate and entirely correct," he said.

Godec said he has not been subpoenaed or contacted by prosecutors.

"We'd like to get to the bottom of this, and we have offered to cooperate," he added, "and it would be nice if people would be forthcoming with us so we can have the opportunity to be forthcoming with them."

Godec, 44, who lives in Brookline, left KeyBank in Cleveland to start Overland. He had previously practiced at several Boston law firms, including Bernkopf, Goodman & Baseman; Goodwin Procter; and Rackemann, Sawyer, & Brewster. He has bachelor's and law degrees from the University of Virginia, where he majored in Middle Eastern studies and studied Islam, Islamic history, Arabic, and Farsi.

Last week's filing in Boston federal court, which disclosed the grand jury probe, stemmed from a wrongful termination lawsuit filed by a former Overland employee, Laird Fairchild, who left the firm in March 2004 when Overland closed its Dallas office, according to Fairchild's lawyer, Geoffrey S. Harper. Fairchild, who is now with the Dallas office of Hunter Chase, a real estate private equity firm, did not return a call for comment.

But according to Harper, "Laird has been identified as a material witness in [the federal] investigation, and he has been providing them documents for the grand jury. . . . He has been working with them for some time."

DOJ_NMG_0125533

Harper also said , "Overland wants to know what Laird has been telling the government, and the government doesn't want to answer that question."

Overland also has an office in Clifton Park, N.Y.

Judge Shelves Gitmo Detainee Cases (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

Sixteen lawsuits by Guantanamo Bay detainees were put on hold Wednesday by a federal judge who said he may no longer have jurisdiction to hear their cases.

U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton in Washington said the Military Commissions Act, signed into law in October, has left him unable to consider whether the detainees can challenge being held at the Navy facility in Cuba.

An appeals court in Washington is considering whether civilian jurists can rule on those cases. Until that issue is resolved, Walton said, "it is this court's view that it lacks the authority to take any action in these cases."

Walton's six-page order denying the motions challenging detention of the 16 men left open the possibility of refiling the requests if the appeals court decides civilian courts can review detainee cases.

If the appeals panel "concludes that this court retains some degree of jurisdiction over any or all of the above-captioned cases, the matters will be automatically reopened as appropriate," he wrote.

The Justice Department welcomed the ruling, said spokesman Erik Ablin. He called the military tribunals, which can be appealed, "more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts."

The New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the detainees, said Walton's decision will delay justice for an estimated 200 people imprisoned at Guantanamo.

German Court Challenges C.I.A. Over Abduction (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

FRANKFURT, Jan. 31 — A German court on Wednesday issued an arrest warrant for 13 people in the mistaken kidnapping and jailing of a German citizen of Lebanese descent, in the most serious legal challenge yet to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret transfers of terrorism suspects.

Prosecutors in Munich said the suspects, whom they did not identify, were part of a C.I.A. "abduction team" that seized the man, Khaled el-Masri, in Macedonia in late 2003 and flew him to Afghanistan. He was imprisoned there for five months, during which, he said, he was shackled, beaten and interrogated about alleged ties to Al Qaeda, before being released without charges.

His ordeal is the most extensively documented case of the C.I.A.'s practice of "extraordinary rendition," in which terrorism suspects are seized and sent for interrogation to other countries, including some in which torture is practiced.

"This is a very consequential step," August Stern, the prosecutor in Munich, said in a telephone interview. "It is a necessary step before bringing a criminal case against these people."

The Central Intelligence Agency has never acknowledged any role in Mr. Masri's detention, and a C.I.A. spokesman declined to comment on Wednesday. The German government said it would not comment on the case, except to affirm the independence of the public prosecutor.

Mr. Stern said investigators would seek to establish the true identities of the 13 people, most of whom are believed to use aliases. They include the four pilots of the Boeing 737 that picked up Mr. Masri, a mechanic and several C.I.A. operatives, people familiar with the case said.

Issuing an arrest warrant is a major expansion of the legal challenge to the C.I.A.'s rendition program in Europe. Italian prosecutors are seeking indictments against 25 C.I.A. operatives and Italy's former intelligence chief for the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric in 2003.

In Germany, unlike Italy, defendants cannot be tried in absentia. As a practical matter it is unlikely that the Bush administration will acquiesce in the extradition to Germany of the 13 suspects. But the arrest warrant could further hinder their ability to move around Europe. The German case also carries more weight, legal experts said, because of the reputation of courts here for painstaking deliberation and because of recent efforts to repair damaged diplomatic ties between Germany and the United States.

It is, in fact, a delicate time for both countries. The Bush administration has faced a drumbeat of criticism because of its antiterrorism policies since the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, while the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, has been eager to heal rifts over the Iraq war.

"It is unique that a German court would issue warrants against 13 C.I.A. agents," said Hans-Christian Ströbele, a Green Party member of a German parliamentary committee that is investigating the flights.

DOJ_NMG_0125534

The arrest warrants, which were first reported in The Los Angeles Times on Wednesday, also have political implications within Germany, where the role of the government in tolerating — or even facilitating — C.I.A. flights has come under increased scrutiny. Frankfurt Airport was reportedly used for many of the flights, as was the American air base at Ramstein.

On Wednesday, a German broadcaster, NDR, published what it said were the names of the 13 people — 11 men and 2 women. Mr. Stern declined to discuss the names, which have been picked up by other German news organizations.

Although the prosecutor's action on Wednesday was the first major legal development in the case, the German news media have been speculating about it for months. In September a television program, "Panorama," tracked down three of those named in North Carolina. They declined to comment on their activities.

For Mr. Masri, who has had to overcome a tide of public skepticism about his account since it was first reported in The New York Times in early 2005, the court's action is a significant step in bolstering the credibility of his claims, said his lawyer, Manfred Gnjidic.

"This is unbelievably important for our case," Mr. Gnjidic said in an interview. "It's the first direct sign of the German government against the C.I.A. that they did the wrong thing."

Mr. Masri, who is unemployed, lives in the southern German city of Neu-Ulm. The lawyer said Mr. Masri had been buoyed by a statement of support from the former German interior minister, Otto Schily.

Mr. Masri is petitioning a federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., to reinstate a lawsuit against the agency. Last May a federal judge threw out a suit brought by Mr. Masri, accepting the government's contention that it would be impossible to hold a trial without disclosing state secrets.

The Justice Department has declined to help the German prosecutors in their investigation, which has made the Germans dependent on information from other sources, including journalists investigating the C.I.A. practice of transferring suspects across international borders.

A major break, Mr. Stern said, came from a Spanish reporter who compiled a list of the names of people said to have been involved in Mr. Masri's abduction from sources in the Civil Guard, a Spanish paramilitary police agency. The C.I.A. used the Spanish island of Majorca as a logistics center for its flights, Mr. Gnjidic said, and the authorities found the names of members of the rendition team on hotel logs there.

Mr. Stern also credited tips from prosecutors in Milan and from Dick Marty, a Swiss senator who conducted an inquiry on the transfer issue on behalf of the Council of Europe.

The nature of Germany's role in Mr. Masri's case, and in other C.I.A. flights, remains murky. Mr. Masri has asserted that he was interrogated three times inside his prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, by a German who identified himself as "Sam."

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, has said he was not told of the abduction until June 2004, after Mr. Masri had been released in Albania. As chief of staff to Gerhard Schröder, then the chancellor, Mr. Steinmeier oversaw all German intelligence services.

Mr. Steinmeier is facing questions about his role in another case, involving a German-born Turkish man imprisoned for four and a half years at the American military jail in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The man, Murat Kurnaz, was released by the United States last August after lengthy negotiations between Germany and the United States. But internal German intelligence documents indicate that the Germans turned down an offer by the Americans to send Mr. Kurnaz home as early as 2002.

Mr. Steinmeier has insisted that the Americans never made an official offer to release Mr. Kurnaz. He has also noted that worries about security were running high in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. German newspapers have been full of speculation about whether the affair will cost Mr. Steinmeier his job.

Germans Charge 13 CIA Operatives (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BERLIN, Jan. 31 -- The CIA's clandestine program of abducting suspected terrorists and taking them to secret sites for interrogation unraveled further on Wednesday as German prosecutors issued arrest warrants for 13 agency operatives in the kidnapping of a German citizen in the Balkans in December 2003.

The case is the second in which European prosecutors have filed charges against CIA employees involved in counterterrorism operations. Italian prosecutors have charged 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer with kidnapping a radical cleric on a Milan street in 2003 and taking him to Cairo, where he says he was tortured.

European law enforcement authorities acknowledged that it is highly unlikely that any CIA officers -- most of whom work undercover, using false identities -- would be apprehended or extradited from the United States. But the arrest warrants, filed in

Munich, mark yet another case in which CIA activities in Europe since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, have strained diplomatic ties and underscored deep differences between the United States and its transatlantic allies over how to fight terrorism.

Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld, the chief prosecutor in Munich, said the 13 CIA operatives were wanted on suspicion of kidnapping and inflicting bodily harm on Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent. Masri has said he was detained by border guards Dec. 31, 2003, while en route to a holiday in Macedonia, and handed over to the CIA, which took him to a secret prison in Afghanistan and interrogated him about his alleged ties to Islamic radicals in Germany.

After five months in detention -- during which, he said, he was physically abused -- Masri was flown back to the Balkans and dumped on a hillside in Albania after his captors apparently decided they had apprehended the wrong man. German prosecutors said they were skeptical when he came to them with his bizarre-sounding story but later corroborated many parts of his account.

Robert Wood, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Berlin, declined to comment on the arrest warrants, as did a State Department spokesman in Washington. The CIA also declined to comment.

German prosecutors said they received a list of CIA operatives suspected of involvement in Masri's disappearance from authorities and a journalist in Spain. According to hotel records and flight logs, the crew of the privately chartered CIA plane that carried Masri from the Balkans to Afghanistan had stopped for a few days beforehand on the Spanish resort island of Palma de Mallorca.

Prosecutors in Munich did not name the suspects publicly and released few other details about the probe. But Schmidt-Sommerfeld said that all of the suspects used aliases and that investigators were still trying to learn their true identities.

"Ongoing analysis will concentrate on, among other things, determining the correct personal details of the suspects," he said.

The German state television network NDR released a list of 11 men and two women it said were named in the arrest warrants. According to the station, some of the suspects worked as pilots for Aero Contractors, an aviation firm based in Smithfield, N.C. Flight data show that Aero operated the Boeing 737 that carried Masri to Kabul on Jan. 24, 2004.

Aero Contractors was named as a defendant in a lawsuit Masri filed in U.S. District Court.

An employee who answered the phone at Aero's headquarters said no one was available to comment on the arrest warrants.

At a news conference in Augsberg, Germany, Masri's attorney called the arrest warrants "a great success" and said his client was "very satisfied" with the outcome of the investigation. At the same time, the lawyer, Manfred Gnjidic, said he realized it was doubtful that German authorities would be able to track down any of the suspects and bring them to trial.

"It is a very clear signal that the German ruling powers will not tolerate this action, this criminal action, against a German citizen and would like to hold those accountable," Gnjidic said.

German arrest warrants are not legally enforceable in the United States, although the prosecutors in Munich could seek to have the suspects arrested if they traveled to other nations in the European Union.

The German government said it learned of Masri's abduction from Daniel R. Coats, then the U.S. ambassador to Germany, in May 2004. Coats told Otto Schily, then Germany's interior minister, that Masri had been grabbed mistakenly but was paid off to keep quiet, according to German officials. Coats also asked Schily to keep the affair a secret, the officials said. Masri has denied receiving any money.

U.S. officials have not publicly admitted any guilt or responsibility. In December 2005, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice acknowledged in a meeting in Berlin that Masri had been "erroneously taken." But U.S. diplomats denied she had done so.

A year later, when asked by a reporter in Washington whether the United States owed Masri an apology, Rice declined to offer one. "We have tried to deal with this case in a way that is responsible and -- you know, that's all I'm going to say about this case," she said.

Masri filed suit against the CIA, but his complaint was dismissed in May on grounds that it could damage national security operations. The decision is on appeal.

Some details surrounding Masri's disappearance remain murky. The ponytailed car salesman has said he was interrogated in Afghanistan by a man named "Sam" who was fluent in German and hinted that he worked for German intelligence. The German government has denied any involvement in Masri's kidnapping or detention.

Johannes Jung, a member of a German parliamentary committee that has scrutinized Masri's case, said the arrest warrants would send a strong message to the United States. The committee has investigated the extralegal abductions of two other German residents by U.S. counterterrorism agents, a practice known as "extraordinary rendition."

"This policy of rendition has to be stopped," said Jung, a member of the Social Democratic Party. "It's totally out of control, and the U.S. needs to rethink its policy in this regard. We couldn't imagine that this policy of rendition could really be true, but we have learned that it is true."

Germany Orders Arrest Of 13 CIA Operatives (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

BERLIN — A Munich court has ordered the arrest of 13 U.S. intelligence operatives in connection with the kidnapping and beating of a German citizen who was interrogated for five months at a secret prison in Afghanistan, prosecutors announced today.

The suspects belong to a CIA-sponsored team that allegedly flew Khaled Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, from Macedonia to Afghanistan in January 2004. Each of the accused, all but one of whom were identified only by aliases, were charged with kidnapping and causing serious bodily harm.

Police found a "strong suspicion" that the operatives were involved in Masri's disappearance, said a statement released by the Munich prosecutor's office. "According to the information we have, the suspects listed in the arrest warrants are believed to be so-called code names of CIA agents. The investigation will now focus on learning the actual names of the suspects."

Legal experts said it was unlikely the accused, including four pilots, a medic and members of an operations unit, would appear before a German court. CIA and State Department officials have refused to comment in detail about the Masri case, but the Bush administration has said anti-terror laws allow for such covert operations, known as "extraordinary renditions." U.S. officials have denied allegations of torture.

"As far as I know, the German court has never issued an arrest warrant against 13 CIA officials all at once," said Hans-Christian Stroeble, a member of a parliamentary committee investigating the Masri case. His Greens Party has criticized the renditions program as a violation of human rights. "This is a great success."

The intelligence operatives, most of whom are believed to be Americans, are alleged to have been involved in a mission that loaded a bound and drugged Masri onto a Boeing 737 that flew him from Skopje, Macedonia to Afghanistan in the early morning of Jan. 24, 2004. Masri had been detained weeks earlier by Macedonian security officials when he attempted to cross the Serbian-Macedonian border. He said while in Macedonian custody he was beaten and photographed naked.

German prosecutors were initially skeptical about Masri's tale of disappearing into a hidden dimension in the fight against terrorism and being held for five months of interrogation and abuse until he was released in the mountains of Albania in May 2004. But German authorities said they concluded that the car salesman and father of four was telling the truth.

German officials believe Masri was the victim of mistaken identity: a man with the same name as a suspected terrorist linked to Al Qaeda. Former Interior Minister Otto Shilly has told a German government committee that U.S. officials privately apologized for the abduction.

U.S. authorities never charged Masri with a crime and German prosecutors have criticized Washington for not cooperating with their investigation. German officials allege that the operatives, many of whom live in North Carolina, work for Aero Contractors, which has links to the CIA. The company is connected to Premier Executive Transport Services Inc., which held the registration for the Boeing that transported Masri, according to European aviation documents.

The case has led to questions within the German government. The parliamentary committee is investigating whether German agents were involved in the abduction and why Foreign Minster Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who then oversaw intelligence agencies for the chancellery, did not immediately disclose his knowledge of the affair.

The case, at times, has agitated the improving relationship between Berlin and Washington. In 2005, after a meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rise, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said she was pleased that the Bush administration "admitted this man [Masri] had been erroneously taken."

But a senior U.S. official quickly denied such a characterization, saying that Masri was released because Washington "no longer had evidence or intelligence to justify" his detention.

Warrants Target 13 CIA Agent Suspects (WT/AP)

By David Rising

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

BERLIN -- German prosecutors said yesterday that they have issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA agents suspected of abducting a German citizen in an apparent anti-terrorist operation gone wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0125537

It was Washington's second European ally to seek the arrest of CIA agents on charges of spiriting away a terrorism suspect. Italian prosecutors want to question 25 agents and one other American in the purported kidnapping of an Egyptian cleric suspected of terrorism.

Prosecutor Christian Schmidt-Sommerfeld said the warrants were issued in the past few days against the 13 on suspicion of false imprisonment and serious bodily harm in connection with the abduction of Khaled el-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent.

Mr. el-Masri maintains he was abducted in December 2003 at the Serbian-Macedonian border and flown by the CIA to a detention center in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he says he was abused.

None of the suspects was identified. But Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld later said in a statement that "the personal details contained in the arrest warrants are, according to our current knowledge, aliases of CIA agents."

Germany's NDR television released a list of the names of the 13 -- 11 men and two women -- it said its reporters had obtained.

At the State Department, spokesman Tom Casey said the United States would review the claims. "Certainly, we will take a look at that information once it is actually made available."

But he declined further comment, referring to a lawsuit by Mr. el-Masri against the U.S. government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. officials have declined to address the case. But German Chancellor Angela Merkel has said Washington has acknowledged making a mistake with Mr. el-Masri.

Mr. el-Masri has said he was released in Albania in May 2004 after the CIA discovered they had the wrong person.

Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld said prosecutors in December 2005 received a list of people thought to be involved in the kidnapping. The list was compiled by a Spanish journalist from sources within the country's Civil Guard, a paramilitary police unit.

With help from Spanish authorities, they were then able pursue an investigation against "concrete persons," Mr. Schmidt-Sommerfeld said.

Investigators also received tips from others, including the Milan, Italy, prosecutor's office and Dick Marty, a Swiss senator who led an inquiry into CIA renditions on behalf of the Council of Europe.

The CIA agents are suspected of having flown from the Spanish island of Palma de Mallorca to Macedonia in January 2004 aboard a Boeing 737 to pick up Mr. el-Masri, Munich prosecutor August Stern said.

Mr. el-Masri has asked a federal appeals court in Richmond to reinstate a lawsuit he filed against the CIA. A lower court dismissed the lawsuit in May, ruling that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

Britain Jails 9 On Terrorism Suspicion (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 1, 2007

LONDON — British police arrested nine people on suspicion of terrorism Wednesday but declined to confirm media reports that the suspects intended to kidnap and behead a Muslim British soldier and post a video of his execution on the Internet.

Eight of the suspects were picked up in pre-dawn raids on their homes in a predominantly Pakistani neighborhood in Birmingham. The ninth was arrested on a highway in the area.

Police in West Midlands, the county that includes Birmingham, said the nine were arrested on "suspicion of the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism."

David Shaw, assistant chief constable of the West Midlands Police, did not say whether the suspects were Muslims. In remarks to reporters, though, he went out of his way to thank Birmingham's Muslim community for its help with the arrests.

Shaw would not comment on reports by the BBC, Sky News and other outlets that the suspects intended to kill a British army soldier and post Internet video of the murder.

The 4 a.m. raids were led by the Midlands Counterterrorism Unit, supported by West Midlands Police and London's Metropolitan Police.

Twelve addresses in several Birmingham areas were sealed off for additional searches, according to police. Four commercial sites were among those sealed, Shaw said.

The raids exposed divides in predominantly Pakistani neighborhoods in Birmingham.

"People don't trust their own children anymore," said Shabir Hussain, chairman of the Ludlow Road Mosque in Birmingham. "You feel like you should challenge your son or daughter: 'Where are you going at night? What are you watching on TV? What are you doing on the Internet?' "

Shaw said the investigation could take several days or weeks. "This remains a dynamic, fluid operation," he said. "And this is by no means finished."

DOJ_NMG_0125538

Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism analyst at the Swedish National Defense College, said a plot like that described by British news outlets would signal that terrorists are trying new methods to spread fear in Europe.

"An incident like this would certainly raise the threshold for shock value," he said.

Terrorists, familiar with tactics used by insurgents in Iraq, can be expected to export whatever method they can to induce shock and spread fear, Ranstorp said. "The critical issue is: Are we ahead of the terrorists' innovations?"

Britain's current terrorism threat level is listed as "severe," the second-highest level on the five-stage scale. A "severe" threat means a terrorist attack is "highly likely."

The threat level has remained at severe since the current system was introduced Aug. 1, except for three days after the disclosure Aug. 10 that police had broken up a plot to blow up jets headed to the USA from London's Heathrow Airport. The level was then raised to "critical," the highest on the scale.

Some of the suspects arrested in the alleged airliner plot were from Birmingham.

Last week, police arrested five people in terrorism investigations in the English cities of Manchester and Halifax. Rizwan Ditta, 29, and Mohammed Dilal, 26, of Halifax were later charged with possession of information of use to terrorists.

The head of Britain's domestic security service, MI5, said last year that the service was tracking 30 suspected terrorism plots involving roughly 1,600 people in about 200 domestic cells. Eliza Manningham-Buller, MI5's director general, said in a speech Nov. 9 that many of the plots could be traced to al-Qaeda.

She said Britain's security services had foiled five major plots since terrorists attacked the London transit system July 7, 2005, killing 52 people and injuring more than 770 others.

Police Hold Nine After Terrorism Sweep (FT)

By Jonathan Guthrie And Jimmy Burns

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Police in the West Midlands arrested nine people on terrorism charges and raided a number of properties on Wednesday.

The arrests were in connection with an investigation thought to be connected to an alleged plot to kidnap and execute a Muslim British soldier.

On Wednesday night a senior government official said he was taking seriously a plot he believed underlined the extent to which radicalised British-born Muslims were committed to a terrorist war against the west.

The official said the alleged plot suggested a direct challenge to the British army's policy of encouraging the recruitment of Muslims as a way of integrating them into society and countering the negative publicity regarding the army's involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan. In the UK armed forces, 330 Muslims have declared their religion.

Earlier, the police and the Home Office, the department responsible for counter-terrorism, refused to identify the nature of the plot and warned the media against speculation that might be prejudicial to an investigation and any trial.

However, in what they described as a "very major investigation", police raided eight dwellings and arrested eight men, starting at 4am.

They also searched and secured four business premises, including a Muslim bookshop and an internet café. The properties were in Washwood Heath and Sparkhill, areas with big Muslim populations, and in the mainly white area of Edgbaston.

A ninth man was arrested later while driving on a motorway in the Birmingham area.

Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw said police were "at the foothills" of an important investigation that could last for "days and weeks".

Britain Foils Major Kidnapping Plot (AP)

By Rob Harris

AP, February 1, 2007

Police foiled a major kidnapping plot, the first of its kind in Britain, with the arrests Wednesday of nine terror suspects who reportedly planned to torture and behead a British Muslim soldier and broadcast the killing on the Internet.

The alleged plot, said by British media to mirror the brutal executions of foreign hostages in Iraq, was in its final stages and uncovered during a six-month surveillance operation by anti-terror officers in this city of more than 1 million in the heart of England. The arrests came in a pre-dawn raid on homes and businesses in several Birmingham neighborhoods, which were mostly Pakistani.

"The threat from terrorism remains very real," said Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw, who would not confirm reports from the British Broadcasting Corp. and other media outlets that the intended victim was an army soldier to be killed in an "Iraqi-style" execution and broadcast on the Internet.

Britain has been at the heart of several thwarted alleged terror plots, including a scheme by a British Muslim to blow up the New York Stock Exchange and other landmarks, and a plan by Muslim extremists to use liquid explosives to blow up as many as 10 flights between the United States and Britain.

But the Birmingham kidnapping plot raised fears that a new type of terrorism has reached Britain, one which uses individual victims to send a message through kidnappings and publicized beheadings. Although the motive in the new plot was not disclosed, the announcement coincides with other indications that young British Muslims are becoming increasingly angry over this country's involvement in the American-led wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and the U.S. detention camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The four British Muslims who attacked London's transit system in Europe's first suicide bombings had expressed rage over Britain's role in the wars. Their attack at rush hour on July 7, 2005 killed 52 people.

In the past year, the object of that anger has spilled over to the 330 Muslims who serve in the 180,000-strong British armed forces.

The potential victim of the latest plot was reportedly a British Muslim soldier who was under police protection, British media reported, though the Defense Ministry would not confirm this.

Britain's first Muslim soldier to be killed in Afghanistan last year was from Birmingham, where the death prompted militant Islamist Web sites to denounce Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, 24, as a traitor. One site — that of extremist British sect al-Ghurabaa — posted an image of the soldier surrounded by flames.

Non-Muslim servicemen are also being targeted.

Last year, a London street vendor was sentenced to six years in prison in a plot to kill a decorated British soldier. Abu Baker Mansha was accused of targeting Cpl. Mark Byles, whose address and other materials were found in Mansha's apartment.

Byles was awarded a military cross for bravery following an attack in which several Iraqi insurgents were killed — exploits covered by British newspapers. One of the articles with Byles' name was circled and found in Mansha's apartment.

Twelve houses and four business — including two Muslim book stores and an Internet cafe — were cordoned off in Wednesday's raids.

Mohammed Majid, 30, watched as police barged into a house.

"At 4 a.m. I heard a loud bang. I looked through the window and thought it was a fire. I saw anti-terrorism police with shields and guns. They broke windows and doors and raided the place. They took a (South) Asian man with a beard who was in his 30s away in handcuffs. He looked dazed."

Forensic teams removed items from the house and shot a video of the scene, he said.

Sky TV reported that British investigators contacted Pakistani intelligence agents four days ago about the plot. In Islamabad, Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said, "The British authorities have confirmed to us that there is no Pakistan connection." She gave no other details on the contact between authorities in the two countries.

Still, the raid opened fresh divides in Birmingham's predominantly Pakistani neighborhoods.

"People don't trust their own children any more," said Shabir Hussain, chairman of the Ludlow Road Mosque in Birmingham. "You feel like you should challenge your son or daughter: `Where are you going at night? What are you watching on TV? What are you doing on the Internet?'

Muslims in Birmingham are mindful of the dangers inherent in any raid: Police shot a man in a raid last year in London.

"The police and government seem to be against Muslims and are trying to turn us against one another," said Kadir Mohammad, 18, who lives in one of the raided neighborhoods.

Britain's MI5 has said it set up a network of eight new regional offices across the country in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, including a center in the West Midlands. The service had previously had regional branches in Northern Ireland, but uses the new offices to coordinate with police in counterterrorism work.

Counterterrorism experts said Islamic extremists have been looking for new ways to rattle the West with their use of the Web to broadcast propaganda and unsettling images such as the beheadings of Western hostages in Iraq.

One widely publicized case was that of 62-year-old Kenneth Bigley from Liverpool. He was abducted from a Baghdad suburb where he was working in September 2004 and beheaded three weeks later. His death was captured on video.

London's counterterrorism officers had never before dealt with a terrorist plot to abduct and murder, a police spokeswoman said on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation.

The Irish Republican Army and other Northern Ireland paramilitary groups routinely conducted kidnappings, mainly for the purpose of extortion — often targeting family members of those with access to banks, British military installations and police stations.

DOJ_NMG_0125540

"This would be the first case (in Britain) of Islamic extremists using kidnapping as a tactic — but these are not the first terrorist kidnapping threats to Britain. The IRA provided those," said former U.S intelligence officer Bob Ayers, now a security analyst based in London.

A Foiled Plot In Britain May Signal Chilling Tactic (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

LONDON

British security officials were claiming Wednesday to have foiled a terrorist plot which would have imported for the first time to Britain the grisly Iraq-style tactic of kidnapping a victim, torturing and beheading him and filming the atrocity for broadcast on the Internet.

In what police characterized as "the foothills of a major investigation," at least nine arrests were made at a dozen addresses in and around Birmingham, England, including homes, an Islamic bookshop, and a cybercafe,

The suspects were the latest in a succession of hundreds arrested under terrorism legislation introduced seven years ago. Last August, 21 people were arrested in an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic flights.

But experts said this plot's new tactic, if confirmed, would amount to a significant departure in strategy. Thus far, the public has focused its concern on the possibility of suicide bombers seeking to emulate the perpetrators of the July 7, 2005, bombings that killed 52 people. The prospect of being snatched from the street, paraded before video cameras, and decapitated was considered a horror peculiar only to countries like Iraq.

"A plot to kidnap, torture, and execute an individual in the heart of England, and film the gruesome events on a videotape for posting on the Internet, represents a new chilling escalation in tactics by the global jihadi terror groups and carries grave implications for all western nations," says MJ Gohel, a terrorism expert with the London-based Asia-Pacific Foundation.

"In the past, we have witnessed the brutal beheadings of Western hostages in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq, but for it to happen in a major British city would send shock waves to millions of people throughout Europe and the world."

Debate about extent of 'fear factor'

Mr. Gohel recalled the episodes in Iraq, when American Nicolas Berg and Briton Ken Bigley were subjected to the grim fate, and added that repeating the tactic in the West would be "a massive cold-blooded propaganda tool for intimidating the public and governments. The brutal torture and beheading of an identified individual can psychologically resonate far louder than say a car bombing of unknown or anonymous victims," Gohel says.

Paul Rogers of Bradford University also underscored the potential for a negative psychological impact. "If such a plot were to be targeted against an individual, then it would be a very new development as far as Britain is concerned, but obviously worrying as far as the fear factor is concerned," he said in an interview with Britain's national Press Association news agency.

But Bob Ayres, a security analyst at Chatham House, a London-based think tank, contends that the fear-factor would be limited.

"The vast majority of the UK population doesn't believe they're high-profile enough to warrant being pulled off the street," he says. For most Britons, he adds, "getting blown up on the Underground on the way to work is much more of a concern."

But while kidnapping may not instill greater fear among the public, Mr. Ayres says, its strategic advantage for radicals is prolonged media exposure. With the release of periodic video statements, captors can keep the media's spotlight on them and their message for months, he says.

Tackling home-grown terrorism

At least some of those arrested Wednesday were believed to be young Britons of south Asian origins. The local member of Parliament, Shahid Malik, said he had been told they had been under surveillance for six months. Some of the arrests connected with the alleged planes plot were also made in Birmingham.

Pakistan, which crucially cooperated with Britain over the aviation threat last year, was again in contact with British security agencies in the run-up to the latest arrests. British media reports claimed that the target was a British Muslim soldier, though police did not confirm this.

The sudden emergence of homegrown terrorists and suspected plotters has forced domestic security services to improve their game, spread the recruiting net wider, and accelerate efforts to infiltrate the cells believed to be planning attacks.

Recently, signs have emerged that counterterrorist forces tracked radicals subsequently involved in plots without detaining them. One of the 7/7 perpetrators, Mohammad Sidique Khan, was known to security services as a radical intent on waging jihad. In the ongoing trial in London of the suspects involved in an alleged plot to bomb the mass transit network two weeks later on July 21, 2005 – a plot that failed – evidence has emerged that suspects were under police surveillance as early as 2004.

Balance of rights and security

DOJ_NMG_0125541

Though police believe that the raids and multiple arrests of recent years have foiled major terror attacks, Britain's Muslim minority often complains that rights are trampled over during the police action – and that often charges are not even brought. Two suspects were roughly arrested, and one shot, during a police raid last summer; both were later released without charge. Some in the Muslim community argue that the police action is just driving more disaffected youths into the arms of radicals.

Last year, the head of MI5, Dame Eliza Manningham Buller, warned that the security services had identified 30 major terrorist plots in Britain and more than 1,600 individuals actively engaged in promoting attacks.

New tactic?

But after the 7/7 attack and the failed 7/21 attack, heightened security and a greater police presence, particularly on the London Underground, has arguably persuaded radicals to change their targets. Experts say that mass-transit systems, even airports and aircraft, are easier to defend against than the threat of abduction.

"Kidnapping is a highly cost-efficient strategy for terror groups to deploy because no expensive bomb-making materials or detonators are needed, no skill or training is necessary – all that is required is a terrorist willing to wield a knife on a defenseless hostage," Gohel says.

Terrorism experts said that it was important to establish whether the kidnapping plot, if confirmed, was a one-off action or a new tactic.

Patrick Mercer, Conservative homeland security spokesman, said: "If this proves to be accurate, this is a disturbing departure.

"We have got to learn the lessons of this," he added, "to see what we can do to thwart future attacks."

Britain Arrests 9 In Anti-Terror Raids (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BIRMINGHAM, England, Jan. 31 -- British police arrested nine people Wednesday in a large counterterrorism sweep reported to involve an alleged Iraq-style plot to kidnap, torture and kill a Muslim soldier serving in the British army and post video of his execution on the Internet.

Such a plot would represent a dramatic turn in tactics by Islamic extremists in Britain -- a single murder rather than a bomb plot designed to kill large numbers of people. It would also be the first known case of radicals in Britain targeting a fellow Muslim for serving in the British army.

Birmingham police did not release the names of the people arrested in pre-dawn raids on eight homes and four businesses in two predominantly Muslim neighborhoods. Neighbors reported that police broke down doors and hauled off suspects beginning about 4:30 a.m.

David Shaw, a top police official, said the arrests were the "culmination of many months of activities" and "a very, very major investigation" that is "by no means finished." At a news conference, he declined to elaborate on the alleged plot or comment on reports by the BBC and many other news organizations that police sources said the plot involved the planned abduction and execution of a particular Muslim soldier. Several reports said the soldier had served in Afghanistan and has been placed under protective custody in Britain.

The arrests and raids stunned this city of 1 million residents northwest of London where the Muslim population, estimated at 14 percent in the 2001 census, has grown in recent years.

"If it were another bombing plot, I wouldn't be as scared," said Vera Bates, 65, who has lived for 40 years in the Alum Rock neighborhood, a predominantly Muslim area. "But because now they are talking about kidnapping someone off the street, beheading him and putting him on a video -- now that is scary." Her home is near a brick rowhouse and a business, Khan's General Store, that were raided by police.

Many Muslims who gathered at police lines said they viewed the raids as unfairly targeting their community and probably based on false intelligence. "We feel like we are under siege," said Allah Ditta, a businessman in Alum Rock and a member of a mosque a block from Khan's General Store.

Ditta said that he had already felt a backlash from the police operation when several men drove past him in a van and swore at him simply because he was dressed as a Muslim. "We will be picking up the pieces of this raid for years to come," he said.

Police counterterrorism raids have become increasingly common since Islamic extremists killed 52 people on subway trains and a bus in London in July 2005. What police call a virtually identical attack two weeks later failed when the alleged attackers' bombs failed to detonate; six men are on trial in that case.

DOJ_NMG_0125542

Eliza Manningham-Buller, head of Britain's MI5 domestic security agency, which was involved in Wednesday's raids, gave a rare public address in November and said British authorities were monitoring as many as 30 potential terrorism plots involving up to 1,600 individuals in 200 radical groups.

"If anyone is involved in terrorist activities, I condemn it," said Shaukat Ali, who lives on Jackson Road, where one of the arrested men lives.

He said he knew the man, describing him as a 28-year-old named Amjad and a father of two, and found it hard to believe he was involved in such a plot. He said the man worked behind the cash register at his father's business, Khan's General Store, from early morning until late at night seven days a week. "Many people knew this hardworking family and we are shocked," Ali said.

Ditta, the Alum Rock businessman and a member of the mosque a block from Khan's General Store, noted that none of the nine men had been charged. Under new anti-terrorism laws, police can hold suspects without charge for up to 28 days. Many times, he said, there have been high-profile raids and then days later the detainees are let go without charge.

He said he believes police could and should make arrests more quietly because these dramatic arrests, with dozens of officers breaking down doors and windows with hammers, are unfairly harming Muslim communities.

Tariq Khan, a Birmingham City Council member who represents the neighborhood, joined the street scene of police, TV cameras and large numbers of neighbors. He said he wanted people to know that "ninety-nine percent of these people are law-abiding citizens."

Others in Birmingham said they supported the police. "If they saved a life, it is certainly worth it," said Paul Hockney, a construction worker. "These raids have become the norm -- how sad is that? Our country is in big trouble."

Several miles from Alum Rock, police were standing guard Wednesday night outside an electronics shop and had shut down an Islamic bookstore. The Maktabah Al Ansaar bookshop has drawn scrutiny for years from British and U.S. counterterrorism investigators.

In 1999, the shop published the autobiography of Dhiren Barot, a Hindu convert to Islam who was arrested in 2004 and charged with plotting to bomb financial targets in New York, New Jersey and Washington on behalf of al-Qaeda. A British judge sentenced him in November to life in prison.

One of the store's former employees is Moazzem Begg, a British citizen who traveled to Afghanistan in 2001 and was arrested in January 2002 and imprisoned at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Begg was released in January 2005 without being charged with a crime.

Sullivan reported from London. Correspondent Craig Whitlock in Berlin and special correspondent Karla Adam in London contributed to this report.

Britain Arrests 9 In Terrorist Kidnapping Plot (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 31 — The British police conducted a series of raids on Wednesday, arresting nine suspects on terrorism charges in what appeared to be a shift in the tactics of terrorism in Britain. The suspects are accused of devising a plot that included plans to kidnap, torture and behead a British Muslim soldier and broadcast video images of his killing on the Internet.

The arrests, in the central city of Birmingham, were part of what the authorities called a major operation involving hundreds of officers after months of preparation. Eight suspects were arrested in eight different homes, and a ninth was seized on a highway near the city, the police said. Four businesses were also searched.

“We are right at the foothills of a very major investigation for us,” Assistant Chief Constable David Shaw, the Birmingham police officer leading the inquiry, said at a news conference. He declined to describe any details of the case or identify the suspects by name.

However, the British news media have widely reported details of the supposed plot, which have not been officially denied. If true, the plan would be a marked departure from previous terrorist plots, like the July 7, 2005, London bombings, intended to cause mass fatalities using explosives.

Last August, for instance, British and American investigators said they averted a plot by terrorists to use liquid explosives to blow up trans-Atlantic airliners carrying hundreds of people. A plan of this kind would also support what counterterrorism experts have depicted as the central role of the Internet in modern insurgencies and conspiracies to broadcast propaganda and spread images. Web sites have been widely used to broadcast gruesome images of beheadings in Iraq and to spread militant Islamic views.

DOJ_NMG_0125543

"If such a plot were to be targeted against an individual, then it would be a very new development as far as Britain is concerned," said Paul Rogers, an expert on terrorism at the University of Bradford. "The key point is whether this alleged plan was something being encouraged by the wider Al Qaeda movement or was a one-off, independent action."

The target for the attack was reportedly a soldier in his 20s who had served with British forces in Afghanistan and is now hiding in a police safe house in Britain.

The Home Office in London called the arrests "a major counterterrorism operation."

Britain's terrorism laws allow the police to detain suspects for up to 28 days without bringing formal charges. "This remains a dynamic, fluid operation and this is by no means finished," said Assistant Chief Constable Shaw of the Birmingham police. The search of premises, he said, "will take days or possibly weeks."

The police began to move in on the suspects at 4 a.m. in Birmingham, Britain's second largest city, which has a large Muslim minority drawn initially from Pakistani immigrants in the 1960s. The police action spread through the run-down Sparkhill neighborhood and other areas, including raids on the Maktabah Islamic bookstore, the Blades Cyber Cafe and an innocuous-seeming row house. Several vehicles, including a white van, were towed away.

The announcement of another suspected terrorism plot has not surprised many Britons, who are used to regular warnings from the authorities. Six men are currently on trial in connection with four attempted bombings on July 21, 2005, two weeks after the London bombings that killed 52 people and the 4 suicide bombers.

Last November, MI5, the domestic intelligence agency, said it was keeping 1,600 suspects in 200 terrorist cells under surveillance. At the time, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the director of MI5, spoke of around 30 conspiracies that might include "the use of chemicals, bacteriological agents, radioactive materials and even nuclear technology."

The Pakistan Foreign Office acknowledged on Wednesday that British officials had recently inquired about whether some of the nine men arrested in Birmingham had traveled to Pakistan.

Some people in Birmingham said they were skeptical about the raids, particularly in light of a similar high-profile operation last year in Forest Gate, east London, when the police shot and wounded one of two Muslim brothers who were soon released for lack of evidence linking them to terrorism.

Such events have deepened Muslim anxieties.

"There is a fear about who is next," said Mohammed Naseem, the chairman of Birmingham's Central Mosque, in a telephone interview. "People will need to know the facts, but there is a longstanding perception that this climate of terrorism is being maintained to further the political aims of the government."

Indeed, Salma Yaqoob, a member of the Birmingham City Council representing the antiwar Respect Party, said: "There's a shock and disbelief that these arrests are being made in such a high-profile manner. People are very concerned about the social backlash."

Farooq Haroon, a Birmingham social worker, said that after the raids last year that ended with the suspects being freed without charge, "people are very cynical about these raids."

The Ministry of Defense said there were only about 330 Muslims out of the 180,000 troops in Britain's armed forces. Last July, one British Muslim soldier, Lance Cpl. Jabron Hashmi, was killed in Afghanistan.

Many of Britain's frontline combat units are deployed in Afghanistan and Iraq, and their presence, some Muslim leaders contend, has helped inflame militancy among young British Muslims.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

9 / 11 Workers Criticize Bush Health Funds (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- The son of a ground zero rescue worker who died last week from lung disease met with President Bush on Wednesday to urge expanded health services for those who are still sick.

"On behalf of all World Trade Center victims, I expressed the urgency and the desperate need for financial support for health services," said Ceasar Borja Jr., 21.

He said he told the president that the funding should be expanded not just for "the heroes and heroines" who risked their lives to save victims under the twin towers, but also for men, women and children exposed to toxins because they lived or worked in the area.

Borja's father, Cesar Borja, was a police officer who worked 14-hour days in the smoldering pit after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack. He died at 52 while awaiting a lung transplant.

DOJ_NMG_0125544

Bush met Borja, his mother, Eva, his 16-year-old brother, Evan, and 12-year-old sister, Nhia, at Federal Hall in downtown Manhattan, where the president delivered a speech about the economy on Wednesday.

About an hour before the speech, sick 9/11 workers and neighborhood residents gathered nearby at the edge of ground zero to criticize Bush's proposal to spend an additional $25 million to fund a health care program.

"Twenty-five million is absolutely not enough," said Marvin Bethea, 47, pointing out that some legislators, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, have proposed $1.9 billion in additional funds.

"First responders who need treatment will get the treatment they need," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday. "Many are already covered by insurance programs, many through their union; but if there are gaps in that, we're going to do it."

Next week, the Bush administration is expected to propose the additional funding for the Sept. 11-related health care program at New York's Mount Sinai Medical Center, where 19,000 rescue workers have been screened.

About seven out of every 10 responders suffered lung problems, according to a Mount Sinai study. One of study authors has said thousands will likely need long-term care.

White House officials said they would consider providing more money, depending on the findings of a separate government task force.

The programs had been expected to run out of money by the summer. A grant of $75 million made last year was expected to last until then.

International Trusted Traveler Program Sought (USAT)

By Barbara De Lollis

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Believing it would help stem the USA's diminishing appeal to travelers from abroad, the U.S. travel industry asked Congress on Wednesday to launch a special trusted traveler program for international visitors.

Since 9/11, international visits to the USA have fallen by 17%. The decline cost about $43 billion in visitor spending in 2005 alone.

The Discover America Partnership, an offshoot of the trade group Travel Industry Association of America, proposed the new program to the Senate trade and tourism subcommittee as part of a broader package of proposals to boost international visits.

"Our travel system is broken," said Geoffrey Freeman, executive director of the partnership. "What we have outlined today is a detailed road map for Congress to solve the crisis."

The group is also asking the government to spend $300 million to finance its proposals, which include stepped-up tourism marketing and faster customs processing.

Under the trusted traveler proposal, regular visitors from abroad could submit extensive personal and biometric information to the U.S. government.

If approved by the government, foreign travelers could count on predictable airport clearance procedures when they arrive in the USA. The tourism industry says heightened scrutiny of foreign visitors in the last five years has led to unpredictable and inconsistent treatment of foreigners at U.S. airports, and has played a major role in diminishing visits to the USA.

Whether or not Congress or foreign travelers would embrace such a program is unclear. But Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., who chairs the tourism subcommittee, says he expects the issue will attract bipartisan support. He plans to develop legislation to reverse the slide in foreign tourism.

The domestic version of the trusted traveler program, which expedites members' passage at airport security checkpoints, is only now getting started, more than five years after it was proposed following the 9/11 terror attacks. For an annual fee of about $100, travelers who have provided personal data and been cleared in advance by the government are allowed use of an expedited security line at certain airports. It's in effect now at airports in San Jose, Calif., Cincinnati, Indianapolis, New York (JFK) and Orlando.

The tourism industry proposal also calls for automatically enrolling approved travelers in the U.S. registered traveler program to make flying around the USA easier.

Yves Walravens, 53, a loan broker in Brussels who traveled to the USA twice last year, says the popularity of such a program would hinge on whether travelers can expect confidentiality.

"A lot of us complain about the heavy procedures (entering the USA) and find them completely paranoid," he says. "And that is certainly not good publicity for the USA."

Travel Lobby Moves To Ease U.S. Tourism (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

DOJ_NMG_0125545

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Travel industry groups yesterday announced a series of proposals aimed at making it easier for international travelers to visit the United States.

The Discover America Partnership (DAP), a travel industry lobbying group, proposed adding more staff to U.S. Consulates to reduce the time it takes for visitors to acquire visas, setting a goal of processing all foreign travelers through customs in 30 minutes, and implementing a national tourism marketing program.

Other DAP proposals included evaluating U.S. Customs officers on their friendliness, greeting foreign travelers by saying "Welcome to America" and offering foreign visitors customer-service evaluations to fill out when they leave the United States -- proposals aimed at improving America's image abroad.

"We can make travel easier and more secure," Stevan Porter, DAP chairman and president of InterContinental Hotels Group, told reporters yesterday.

Overseas travel to the United States has declined 17 percent since the September 11, 2001, attacks, amid perceptions that it has become more difficult to get a visa to the United States than to other countries. Some visitors are waiting up to 100 days for a visa interview, DAP estimated.

The group said the proposed changes would cost $300 million and suggested three ways to pay for it: Charge a $5 fee to enter or exit the country; charge a $10 fee for travelers from countries that do not require visas; or issue government bonds.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat and chairman of a tourism subcommittee , said during a hearing yesterday that he would like to "find some sort of way" to introduce a bill based on the proposal.

Committee Co-chairmen Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, Hawaii Democrat, and Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, also said they supported drafting a bill to boost international tourism.

The State Department has been working on improving the visa process, including many of the issues the DAP addressed, a consular affairs official said yesterday.

The department has added 570 consular positions worldwide and implemented an electronic visa application form, which increases the number of applicants an office can review.

As of last month, 90 percent of the U.S. consulates recorded visa appointment waiting periods of 30 days or less.

An airline industry group expressed doubts about the DAP proposals. Air Transport Association of America President and Chief Executive Officer James C. May said his group was opposed to the idea of an exit fee, which could be tacked on to the price of an airline ticket.

"While I appreciate a warm welcome, it is really hard for me to support charging passengers a $5 fee to purchase a smile and a greeting," he said, adding that visitors to the U.S. paid $50 in airline ticket fees last year.

Boston Devices A Cartoon Publicity Ploy (AP)

By Ken Maguire

AP, February 1, 2007

Several illuminated electronic devices planted at bridges and other spots in Boston threw a scare into the city Wednesday in what turned out to be a publicity campaign for a late-night cable cartoon. Most of the devices depict a character giving the finger.

Peter Berdovsky, 27, of Arlington, and Sean Stevens, 28, of Charlestown, were each arrested Wednesday night on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said.

In a news release announcing Stevens' arrest, she said the men worked together to place the devices. At an earlier news conference she said Berdovsky had been hired to place the devices.

Highways, bridges and a section of the Charles River were shut down and bomb squads were sent in before authorities declared the devices were harmless.

Marketing Gimmick Goes Bad In Boston (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

A guerrilla marketing campaign for a cartoon show about a box of french fries and his milkshake pal set off a scare that nearly shut down Boston's commercial district yesterday, as bomb squads closed highways and two bridges in search of what turned out to be magnetic-light versions of the cartoon characters.

Turner Broadcasting, parent company of the Cartoon Network, said the small electronic circuit boards, which hang from girders and bridges, are part of a 10-city marketing campaign for the animated late-night television show "Aqua Teen Hunger

Force." Such guerrilla ad campaigns seek to place products in unexpected corners and count on those who spot the characters to "get" the gag.

But much of Boston was not in on this joke. The packages were discovered near the New England Medical Center, two bridges and a tunnel. Attorney General Martha Coakley said Peter Berdovsky, 29, of Arlington, Mass., had been arrested on a felony charge of placing a hoax device and a charge of disorderly conduct.

"We regret that they were mistakenly thought to pose any danger," said an e-mail message released by Turner spokeswoman Shirley Powell. "They have been in place for two or three weeks in Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Austin, San Francisco and Philadelphia."

The light boxes portrayed "mooninites," essentially juvenile delinquents from another galaxy making an obscene gesture.

Boston and Massachusetts officials were not amused. A train passenger spied the first magnetic object, which looked like circuit boards with protruding wires, attached to a girder under Interstate 93 in the Charlestown neighborhood of Boston. A police bomb squad responded and blew up the device, leading to the shutdown of a railway station and the highway. For a while, the Coast Guard blocked off a section of the Charles River.

"I am deeply dismayed to learn that many of the devices are a part of a marketing campaign by Turner Broadcasting," Massachusetts Gov. Deval L. Patrick said in a statement, vowing to consult with Coakley.

Boston Mayor Thomas M. Menino told the Associated Press he was ready to sue.

"It is outrageous, in a post-9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme," Menino said. "I am prepared to take any and all legal action against Turner Broadcasting and its affiliates for any and all expenses incurred during the response to today's incidents."

Bloggers were the first to notice that the boxes were not bombs but representations of late-night cartoon characters that have been around for six years. The lead character, Frylock, is a box of french fries and plays the straight man. Master Shake is a self-centered milkshake. Meatwad is, well, a wad of meat.

"Anyone recognize that?" asks BStu, who has a MySpace site. "I did. It's a Mooninite from Aqua Teen Hunger Force . . . that's what all this fuss is over."

The scare in Boston called to mind Orson Welles's CBS radio broadcast in 1938 of "War of the Worlds," which panicked listeners and triggered many calls to the police and the military. Some bloggers saw yesterday's events in a similar light, an unfortunate confluence of "idiot sensational media" and the "hilarious police overreaction."

And a corporate liability lawyer, R. Bruce Duffield of Brian Cave LLP in Chicago, argued that corporate free speech is protected and that "we're all too skittish in this post-9/11 era."

But W. David Stephenson, a former public relations executive now working as a homeland security adviser, said the world has changed and police must take such incidents seriously.

"It's amazing to me that Turner Broadcasting would think this is acceptable," Stephenson said. "They put these light boxes on bridges and tunnels, places you would clearly associate with terror attacks.

You just can't trivialize this," he said. "It's one of those moments where you just can't figure out what was going on in the brain of the advertising person."

Film Publicity Stunt Sends Bomb Squads Scrambling (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, February 1, 2007

BOSTON — A Cartoon Network publicity stunt gone awry sent police and bomb squads scrambling across Boston Wednesday to investigate at least 10 suspicious devices that turned out to be blinking advertising gimmicks.

Peter Berdovsky, 29, of Arlington, was arrested on one felony charge of placing a hoax device and one charge of disorderly conduct, state Attorney General Martha Coakley said later Wednesday. He had been hired to place the devices, she said.

At least 14 of the devices were found, Coakley said.

Worried that the unidentified items could have been part of a terrorist plot, authorities shut down a major highway, halted subway service and closed off part of the Charles River.

VIDEO: PR stunt sends panic over Boston

But the devices turned out to be harmless circuit boards with magnetic lights — part of an outdoor advertising campaign for a late-night cable TV cartoon called Aqua Teen Hunger Force. The show features a talking milkshake, a box of fries and a meatball.

"It's a hoax — and it's not funny," Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick said.

DOJ_NMG_0125547

Turner Broadcasting put out a statement apologizing for the confusion. The statement said the "packages" have been in place for two-to-three weeks in 10 cities: Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Ore., Austin, Philadelphia and San Francisco.

A movie based on the cartoon is scheduled to be released March 23. Characters from the film were pictured on the devices placed around Boston.

Boston police said they received four calls, all around 1 p.m., reporting devices seen at the Boston University Bridge and the Longfellow Bridge, both of which span the Charles River.

Others were spotted at a Boston street corner and at the Tufts-New England Medical Center.

The device near the Boston University Bridge was found attached to a structure beneath the span, police said. Another was found Wednesday evening just north of Fenway Park, police spokesman Eddy Chrispin said.

The Turner Broadcasting statement said the company was "in contact with local and federal law enforcement on the exact locations of the billboards" in question. "We regret that they were mistakenly thought to pose any danger," according to the statement.

Boston Mayor Thomas Menino urged residents to "go about your business" Wednesday.

But he had sharp words for those responsible, warning that anyone involved in a hoax could be punished — by up to five years in prison per item.

Most Boston-area residents weren't fazed. Wanda Higgins, 47, a nurse at Massachusetts General Hospital, watched TV news coverage of the threat while preparing to leave work at 4 p.m.

"I saw the bomb squad guys carrying a paper bag with their bare hands," Higgins said. "I knew it couldn't be too serious."

In Washington, D.C., Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said officials closely monitored the day's investigation.

"Whether it was intentional or not, the reality is these types of incidents put an enormous burden on law enforcement and counter-terrorism resources, and there's absolutely no room for that in a post-9/11 world," Knocke said.

TV Promotion Rattles Boston (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 1, 2007

BOSTON -- A bomb scare that brought much of this city to a jittery halt yesterday turned out to be a Cartoon Network promotion gone awry, angering Mayor Thomas Menino, who vowed to make Time Warner Inc.'s Turner Broadcasting Systems pay for the mass disruption.

Major arteries were closed. Commuters were booted off subways, river traffic was halted, and bomb squads combed the streets after nine suspicious blinking objects were found on a bridge, under an interstate, and in crowded public areas.

After hours of suspense and gridlocked traffic that began early in the morning, police declared the objects harmless. In late afternoon, Turner's Cartoon Network issued a statement saying the objects were part of a promotion for a TV show, which is a late-night cartoon with characters that are talking fast-food items.

Last night, Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley announced the arrest of Peter Berdvosky, 27 years old, an Arlington, Mass., artist, on felony charges. Mr. Berdvosky allegedly violated a relatively new state law, enacted after an anthrax scare, that prohibits placing a hoax device in a way that results in public panic. He also was charged with one count of disorderly conduct, Coakley said.

Turner hired a third-party marketing firm, Interference, to place the devices. The New York firm says on its Web site that it specializes in alternative and "guerilla" marketing. Representatives of the company couldn't be reached for comment.

Authorities said the devices were placed on public property without required permits.

The promotion went "haywire," said Turner spokeswoman Shirley Powell. The company said the "packages" are part of an outdoor marketing campaign in 10 cities for Adult Swim's animated television show "Aqua Teen Hunger Force." The devices "have been in place for two to three weeks in Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Seattle, Portland, Austin, San Francisco, and Philadelphia," the company said. Phil Kent, chairman and chief executive of Turner, said in a statement last night that "we apologize to the citizens of Boston that part of a marketing campaign was mistaken for a public danger."

Mayor Menino said in a statement that it is "outrageous, in a post 9/11 world, that a company would use this type of marketing scheme."

The boxes held light bulbs, Ms. Powell said. Each was about a foot square, with a top resembling a circuit board. At night, they would project images. One was placed on an overhang about 15 feet up at the busy Sullivan Square subway station in Charlestown. A morning commuter alerted authorities. The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority summoned an explosives unit of the transit police, and it shut down the Orange line from 8 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. Police were unable to immediately decide if the device posed danger, and they destroyed it, a spokesman said.

Emergency crews rushed to other scenes -- on bridges over the Charles River and at other locations. Part of Route 93 was closed, and nine agencies, from the Coast Guard to the FBI, were sprung into action.

An Atomic 9/11? (WP)

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

SINCE Sept. 11, 2001, Americans have maintained an understandable preoccupation with securing sensitive sites against airborne attack. Hence the appeal of the petition an advocacy group filed with the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission that, among other things, asks the federal nuclear authority to require plant operators to build protective "beamhenges" -- basically tall (and expensive) steel barriers -- around their power stations. This week the NRC's commissioners rejected the request, saying that there are far more cost-effective measures to secure such targets that plant owners and federal authorities have already applied.

It's a controversial decision. After all, without physical barriers to thwart airborne attacks, couldn't a hijacked plane smashing into a nuclear plant produce a widespread catastrophe?

That's not likely, says commission member Jeffrey S. Merrifield. After a $20 million study on the possible effects of an attempted airborne attack on a nuclear power plant, the NRC concluded that the chances of neighboring communities being exposed to radiological materials are extremely low -- the actual number is classified -- because of the strength of the containment domes that seal nuclear fuel from the outside world and because the chances of an errant plane even having the opportunity to approach a nuclear power plant are small.

Such assurances do not convince long-time critics of the NRC such as Daniel Hirsch, who says that a dangerous meltdown is still possible if terrorists on the ground manage to disrupt reactor cooling systems before a plane crash. It's fair to worry about a worst-case scenario, even if the NRC insists that Mr. Hirsch wildly overestimates the chances of any meltdown occurring. And it is difficult to fully trust the NRC's calculations as long as the study it touts remains classified.

But instead of forcing operators to pay for steel beamhenges, the federal government and others concerned about plant safety should focus on measures likely to be more beneficial. These include ensuring that nuclear power stations are well defended from land attack and that storage units for spent nuclear fuel are robust. Federal authorities must also finally establish a long-term storage facility for the spent fuel that continues to accumulate on nuclear plant sites, which is probably a more dangerous target than nuclear reactors themselves.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Foes Of Troop Buildup Join Forces (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 1, 2007

Two senators, a Republican and a Democrat, leading separate efforts to put Congress on record against President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq joined forces Wednesday, agreeing on a nonbinding resolution that would oppose the plan and potentially embarrass the White House.

Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., had been sponsoring competing measures opposing Bush's strategy of sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to the war zone, with Warner's less harshly worded version attracting more Republican interest. The new resolution would vow to protect funding for troops while keeping Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the buildup.

Levin replaced Warner as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when the Democrats took control of the Senate in January. Their resolution could well gain more support from members of both parties than their separate versions had been attracting. It lacks Levin's language saying the troop increase is against the national interest, and it drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he wants to begin debate Monday on the new measure, bypassing committee review. Levin's original resolution would no longer be considered unless offered as an amendment.

"I believe we have a better chance now" of passing a resolution against the president's plan, said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill.

DOJ_NMG_0125549

The resolution is likely to pose a threat to the White House because of its potential appeal to Republicans who have grown tired of the nearly four-year war and want a chance to express their concerns. The White House has been hoping to avoid an overwhelming congressional vote criticizing Bush's handling of the war.

"It's been a hard work in progress," Warner said of his resolution, which has been struggling to win support of 60 senators so as to prevent a filibuster.

The agreement comes as several leading Republicans who support the troop buildup said they will give the administration and the Iraqis about six months to show significant improvement. Many other Republicans say they are deeply skeptical additional troops in Iraq, rather than a political settlement, would help calm the sectarian violence.

The widely unpopular war has led to the deaths of more than 3,000 U.S. troops and is blamed for GOP losses in the Nov. 7 elections that handed control of Congress to the Democrats.

The House had planned on waiting for the Senate to vote as a way of testing the waters for Republican support of such a resolution. But according to a Democratic aide, the House may begin the process next week with a committee review. That would set the stage for a House floor debate the week of Feb. 12.

Warner had attracted at least seven other Republicans who were inclined to vote for his resolution. Scrambling to find additional support, Warner added language proposed by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., that would protect funding for troops.

As of late Wednesday, Gregg had not said whether he would support the revised resolution.

"Colleagues have come up to me and said, 'Can you assure me that this doesn't provide a cutoff of funds?'" Warner said.

Warner's resolution will now rival a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., that would identify benchmarks for the Iraqi government. McCain's measure is intended to give Republicans an outlet for expressing that the U.S. commitment in Iraq must not be open-ended, without openly criticizing the president.

McCain's measure also picked up steam Wednesday, with Sens. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., and GOP leaders saying they might support it.

"I don't think this war can be sustained for more than six months if in fact we don't see some progress," said Roberts. His comments came two days after Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said the new U.S. military push was the Iraqis' "last chance."

Bush on Wednesday objected to Iraq proposals from Republicans and Democrats alike and acknowledged that "there's a lot of pessimism" in Congress about his troop buildup.

In an interview with Fox News, Bush took issue with McConnell's statement that his plan needs to be successful over the next six to nine months.

"I think it's a mistake to put timetables on difficult missions because an enemy can adjust," Bush said. "On the other hand, I certainly understand the urgency in Mitch's voice. I also understand the skepticism on Capitol Hill. I mean, no doubt, there's a lot of pessimism there today."

In a statement after the president's interview, McConnell avoided mention of a specific time frame, but he stressed that the U.S. commitment in Iraq "is not open-ended."

"We will know in a relatively short period of time whether or not the Iraqis are committed, and initial results are positive," McConnell said. "Of course we would need to reconsider our strategy if this effort fails."

Bush also criticized a proposal by Sen. Barack Obama, a Democratic presidential candidate from Illinois, to have all U.S. combat forces out of Iraq by spring 2008. "I say that it's important to succeed and that failure in Iraq will cause chaos," Bush said. "My admonition to those who are speaking out is let us back the troops and let us hope for the success" of their mission.

Although deserted by some key Republicans, Bush said: "I don't feel abandoned. ... When times are good, there's millions of authors of the plan. When times are bad, there's one author, and that would be me."

Senate Closer To Rebuke For Troop Increase (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate opponents of President Bush's decision to deploy additional troops in Iraq were unifying Wednesday night behind a single resolution criticizing the plan, increasing the chances that Congress will vote to formally rebuke the White House.

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) announced that he was amending his nonbinding resolution that says the Senate "disagrees" with the buildup, adding clauses opposing any cutoff of funds for troops in the field and calling for written commitments from the Iraqi government to achieve certain goals.

DOJ_NMG_0125550

The revised resolution drew the immediate endorsement of Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine). Both had been pushing an alternative resolution that more forcefully opposed the president's plan.

And Senate Democratic leaders indicated they would back the Warner proposal as well. "I believe we have a better chance now," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said there was "near unanimity" among Democrats, adding that he wanted to make the Warner proposal the basis for debate Monday, when the Senate is expected to consider the issue.

Reid acknowledged that an alternative resolution sponsored by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), as well as Levin and Snowe, could not garner the GOP support to reach the 60 votes needed to overcome a promised Republican filibuster.

Warner's changes appear designed to win over more Republicans, seven of whom have already expressed support for some legislative critique of the president's intention to increase troop levels by 21,500 to contain sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

In an apparent nod to many GOP lawmakers who have fretted publicly about Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, Warner and his cosponsors strengthened language calling for the prime minister to agree to written benchmarks.

These include deploying additional Iraqi security forces to work with U.S. troops, "ensuring equitable distribution" of oil resources and an end to "political intervention" in the tactical decisions of Iraqi commanders. The resolution does not spell out any consequences if the Iraqis fail to comply.

The amended resolution also includes criticism of the complicated command structure in Baghdad that creates two chains of command for Iraqis and Americans, an issue raised by several former military and government officials in the last week.

And it clarifies language in the resolution that some Democrats complained could be read to imply that the Senate might endorse an increase of fewer than 21,500 troops.

In an interview with Fox News on Wednesday, Bush acknowledged the opposition on Capitol Hill to his plan for a troop increase. But he remained firm.

"I say that it's important to succeed and that failure in Iraq will cause chaos," Bush said. "My admonition to those who are speaking out is let us back the troops and let us hope for the success" of their mission.

Warner, Levin and other lawmakers opposed to the White House plan have been working for more than a week to bridge differences between the Warner proposal and the more toughly worded Biden measure that was passed by the Foreign Relations Committee last week.

Meanwhile, other GOP lawmakers have been trying to persuade colleagues to vote against any resolution.

"We sure as heck have a responsibility to be for some plan," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) who was among a group of Republicans criticizing the resolutions as unproductive earlier Wednesday. Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who also was in the group, later acknowledged that he had not read the new Warner proposal.

Other conservative lawmakers have accused Democrats of undermining troop morale in their drive to pass a resolution. And the president has repeatedly said he would not be deterred by congressional opposition.

Drawing on popular dissatisfaction with the Iraqi government, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) also has been developing a resolution that would set benchmarks for Maliki to prove his commitment to reaching a political settlement among Iraq's warring sects.

McCain, who said Wednesday that he plans to finish his resolution by today, had been an outspoken supporter of a troop increase long before the president embraced the idea in a speech Jan. 10.

McCain's proposal has drawn little enthusiasm from Democrats, who have criticized it as a political ploy that would have little effect on the Iraqi government. The measure also does not identify any consequences should Maliki fail to meet his goals.

"This is a very calculated effort by the White House and Republicans to muddy the waters," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman. "They want to do anything to peel away the votes for a resolution."

Warner — whose original cosponsors included Sens. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) — has tried to position his effort in the middle ground between the fierce partisans of both parties.

"We want to see our armed forces succeed in Iraq to help bring about greater stability to that country … so the current elected government can take a firmer and firmer hand on the reins of sovereignty," Warner said on the Senate floor, casting his resolution as a tool to improve the chances of victory in Iraq.

The original resolution unveiled last week included language deferring to the president's authority as commander in chief and acknowledging the costs of failure in Iraq, a line often used by Bush and his congressional allies. It also acknowledged the need for additional forces to combat the Sunni insurgency in Al Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0125551

That helped draw in three more Republican backers — Sens. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sam Brownback of Kansas — as well as several moderate Democrats.

In the modifications announced Wednesday, Warner, a former Navy secretary and Marine who also chaired the Armed Services Committee, seemed to be trying to entice members of his own party who want to distance themselves from recent proposals to begin withdrawing troops.

(On Wednesday, Democratic Sen. Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, a leading antiwar critic, introduced legislation that would prohibit funding for most military combat operations in Iraq six months after enactment of his bill.)

The changes to the Warner resolution include the addition of this clause: "Congress should not take any action that will endanger the United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field."

Last week, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) proposed a similar amendment to Biden's resolution. And this week, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) circulated the same language that Warner incorporated into his proposal.

Gregg said Wednesday that he appreciated Warner's action but would not say whether he would support the resolution.

Senators Unite On Challenge To Bush's Troop Plan (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Democratic and Republican opponents of President Bush's troop-buildup plan joined forces last night behind the nonbinding resolution with the broadest bipartisan backing: a Republican measure from Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) announced the shift, hoping to unite a large majority of the Senate and thwart efforts by the White House and GOP leaders to derail any congressional resolution of disapproval of Bush's decision to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

Although the original Democratic language was popular within the party, it had little appeal among Republicans. Warner's proposal drew support from both sides, and it was retooled last night to maximize both Democratic and Republican votes.

The revised resolution would express the Senate's opposition to the troop increase but would vow to protect funding for the troops. The resolution does not include the Democratic language saying the Bush plan is against the national interest, but it also drops an earlier provision by Warner suggesting Senate support for some additional troops.

"It's been a hard work in progress," Warner said of the revised resolution, which will require the support of at least 60 senators to prevent a filibuster.

After reviewing the Warner revisions, Reid decided the new text would take the place of the original resolution, by Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). He said the Senate will begin debating the resolution next week, provided Democrats and Republicans can agree on a way to overcome some procedural hurdles.

House Democratic leaders reached the same decision, ordering committees to draft a resolution next week patterned on Warner's language. But House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) went further, publicly hinting she will push binding legislation that would begin bringing U.S. troops home from Iraq. "I believe that you'll see initiatives on the floor to this effect: that we have this year in which we should be able to drastically reduce the number of troops," she said in an interview broadcast on National Public Radio yesterday.

In both the House and the Senate, Democratic leaders decided to get the largest possible vote, even if it means embracing weaker language than the original Democratic resolution.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino responded to the announcement by saying: "The president wants to win in Iraq -- he's proposed a comprehensive plan to do so, and he's asked Congress to give the plan a chance to work. . . . These resolutions send mixed signals to our troops and our enemy."

The Warner and Biden resolutions reach almost identical conclusions, in that they oppose the president's deployment of 21,500 additional troops and call for existing troops to be reassigned to guard Iraq's borders, combat terrorism and train Iraqi security forces. Both measures call for regional diplomacy to draw Iraq's neighbors into a peace process.

But Warner revamped his original proposal, both to win over many reluctant Republicans who thought it was too tough and to reassure Democrats who complained he was not being tough enough on the administration.

He added language specifically opposing a cutoff of funding for U.S. troops in a targeted appeal to Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who had offered an identical separate measure.

The changes came after two meetings earlier in the day, involving Warner, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and authors of the Biden proposal. Levin was the first of the original authors to join Warner as a co-sponsor, offering a brief endorsement on the Senate floor after Warner unveiled the new version.

In the House, Pelosi suggested yesterday that the chamber may consider binding legislation. In comments aired yesterday by National Public Radio, Pelosi said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had told her during her visit to Baghdad last week that, with sufficient funds, his government could stabilize Iraq in four to six months and allow 50,000 U.S. troops to be deployed out of hotbeds of sectarian violence.

"That was his number," she stressed. "The Iraqis must build their own country," she added, "and we have paid a big enough price."

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said no specific decisions had been made related to binding troop withdrawals. Other House leaders said they will not rush toward a legislative confrontation. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense, are holding extensive hearings on the state of the U.S. military and the impact of further deployments, in the hope of building a political case for such a confrontation. But no proposals have emerged from those efforts.

"My position is and has been, we're holding hearings now. We need to hear from Mr. Skelton, Mr. Murtha and others as to . . . their conclusions and recommendations. Until then, the answer is no," House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said when asked if the House was ready for such legislation.

But Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of Murtha's subcommittee, said the parameters of the legislation are already coming together. Legislative language, to be attached to a forthcoming "supplemental" war spending bill, would stipulate that only troops deemed fully trained and ready could be deployed to Iraq, and that National Guard and reserve troops could be deployed only for about a year. Such language would initially restrict Bush's ability to fully man his planned troop increase and over time would force troops to come home.

"We need to finish these hearings and put together our recommendations, so it is a little premature to say how we're going to do this," Moran said. "But when the supplemental comes out, people are going to find the speaker has spoken consistently. I think the American people are going to feel they got exactly what they wanted when they voted in a new Congress. You're going to see some dramatic initiatives."

Many Democrats had already expressed support for Warner's effort and had intended to vote for both resolutions, in the event of a showdown on the Senate floor. "It's less important whose resolution and more important what message we send," said Sen. Jack Reed (R.I.), a senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee.

Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.), a conservative Democrat who had concerns about the Biden proposal, predicted that the Warner resolution will "receive very strong bipartisan support" in its modified form.

Although Bush would not be obliged to follow Congress's direction, should both chambers ultimately pass the Warner resolution, the White House has lobbied hard to prevent such a measure from passing. If the current drive succeeds, it will be the first formal, bipartisan affront to the administration's Iraq policy since the war began.

Not all Republicans are expected to sign on, however. Some believe that the buildup is a worthy cause that should be given a chance. "The critics stop short of offering any constructive alternatives," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). "All they have done is just criticize." Cornyn was assembling his own proposal that endorses Bush's strategy, while calling on the Iraqi government to assume responsibility for security throughout the country by November.

In Fighting Troop Increase, Senator Finds Few Old Allies (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Senator John W. Warner, a lawmaker often admired for his demeanor and experience, has long wielded influence on military policy given his own years at the Pentagon and his tenure as the Republican chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

So when the Virginian, a senator from central casting who turns 80 next month, offered a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq in more muted terms than one broadly backed by Democrats, people took notice. He appeared to have provided a center of gravity for lawmakers anxious about the war yet unwilling to challenge the White House too harshly.

But while Mr. Warner has won some support from within his party, he has also attracted unusually tough criticism from fellow Republicans who have suggested that he — a World War II veteran and former Navy secretary — is undercutting Mr. Bush, the new military command being installed in Iraq and the troops themselves.

It is a time of transition for Mr. Warner in the Senate. Not only are Republicans now in the minority, but he also lost the top Republican slot on the Armed Services Committee to John McCain of Arizona because of term limits and was not successful in efforts to win the top party seat on another panel. In addition, his fellow Republican, George Allen, lost his reelection bid in Virginia to a Democrat, Senator Jim Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0125553

So while Mr. Warner fights to stay relevant in the Iraq debate, he has fewer tools at his disposal even as he considers whether to run for re-election next year.

What some Republicans have said in recent days about Mr. Warner has been particularly harsh.

"It is clearly not an act of leadership," said Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina, who joined two of his colleagues Wednesday in dismissing Mr. Warner's proposal as they sought to hold off a Senate repudiation of the president's plan.

"To offer nonbinding resolutions which encourage our enemies and undermine our allies and deflate the morale of our troops is, to me, the worst of all possible worlds," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

Mr. Warner's approach has also caused a policy rift with Senators McCain and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, two Republicans he has often worked closely with on military matters and joined last year in confronting Mr. Bush over the treatment of terrorism detainees.

"John and I have been friends for more than 30 years, and we just disagree on this," said Mr. McCain, who is arguing for time to let the Bush plan work. "But he has held these concerns for a long time."

Mr. Warner, a fierce protector of the Senate as an institution, says his goal is to get the broadest bipartisan vote possible so the Senate makes a clear expression of its sentiment on Iraq.

"I feel strongly that the institution of the Senate has a responsibility, and I feel very strongly that responsibility can be best fulfilled if we are able to construct a document — be it a resolution or whatever — that is truly, and I underline truly, bipartisan," Mr. Warner said Wednesday.

He shrugs off internal opposition, saying time has made him immune. "Nothing bothers me," he said. "It is the blessing of old age."

Mr. Bush on Wednesday implied once again that those who were seeking to support resolutions critical of his war plan were undercutting the Senate's unanimous vote last week to confirm the nomination of Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new top American commander in Iraq.

"He goes up and testified on Capitol Hill; he says we need more troops," Mr. Bush said of General Petraeus in an interview on Fox News Channel. "The fundamental question is, will they back him up? They voted for him; will they back him up? Will they say, 'sure, we'll give you the support you need'?"

But the president said he did not begrudge fellow Republicans who were considering the resolutions, which could reach a vote next week.

"Look, I understand. It's a difficult time on Capitol Hill," he said. "There are people who are doubtful about whether or not the strategy that I've come up with and decided upon as commander-in-chief will work."

Mr. Warner and his partners in drawing up the resolution fought back Wednesday night, offering a refined proposal that they said had been shaped by new information from recent classified military briefings. The new wording spells out clearly that its backers believe Congress should not cut off or reduce any financing for troops in the field.

Mr. Warner's revised resolution retained language saying that the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment" American forces but drops what some Democrats had described as a loophole that might have been interpreted as support for a buildup of fewer troops than the 21,500 sought by the president. As Mr. Warner described his changes on the floor, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, who has sponsored a competing measure, asked to be listed as a co-sponsor.

Mr. Warner and other authors, clearly hoping to restore some momentum for their plan, also spelled out benchmarks the Iraqi government must meet and directed the Pentagon to clarify who is in command when American and Iraqi forces are working together.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and one of the resolution's authors, also took strong issue with suggestions that Mr. Warner was hurting the military.

"It is outrageous for anyone to question his support for our troops," she said. "There is no member of this body who cares more about our troops and the nation's defense than Senator Warner."

As he tried to regain the offensive with the adjustments in his resolution, Mr. Warner said on Wednesday evening that the changes were intended less to "grab votes" than to put forward the best conclusion on such a major issue as the war.

"We feel that if for political reasons all members of the Senate go over to vote with their party and the others go over to vote with their party, we will have lost and failed to provide the leadership that I feel this chamber can provide to the American people," Mr. Warner said.

GOP Members Pressured To Back War (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125554

House and Senate Republicans with reservations about President Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 are complaining of harsh criticism from their GOP colleagues. This intra-party squabbling, in some cases, has seen Republicans accusing fellow Republicans of undercutting the American effort in Iraq, a charge previously reserved for Democrats.

These lawmakers, several of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of retribution from party leaders or the White House, are stunned by the hostility expressed by fellow Republicans. They are particularly concerned that anyone who raises questions or challenges the Bush plan will be branded a defeatist who wants to see America lose the war.

They are also worried, especially on the House side, that party leaders haven't prepared their members for the Iraq floor debate that will take place there after the Senate votes on Bush's plan next week.

"We need a full-fledged debate on Iraq within the (House Republican) Conference and we haven't had that so far," said Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill. "This is the issue of our times, and so far, we haven't talked about it."

One GOP lawmaker, who declined to be named, said it is "starting to get really ugly" among Republicans when they try to talk about Iraq and the wisdom of the new Bush policy. This lawmaker said when a Republican stands up who has doubts on Iraq, he's immediately "beaten down" by other Republicans who believe that any deviation from the White House position is intolerable.

Said another Republican with concerns about Bush's new strategy: "It's as if we are stabbing the party in the back, and we are only trying to do what we think is right."

Similar passions were on display Tuesday, when Senate Republicans held a closed-door, members-only meeting to talk about Iraq, a debate that took place in front of Vice President Cheney, who has been one of the most strident voices on Iraq within the administration.

"It was contentious. People feel firmly, and many of us very passionately, in support of our position," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who is opposed to Bush's surge plan. "What really upsets me is that those of us who (are) opposed to the surge are somehow not supportive of our troops and General Petraeus." Gen. David Petraeus has been named to command U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Senate is preparing to debate a handful of non-binding resolutions on the Bush surge plan, and senior Republicans are still trying to develop a party strategy for the floor fight. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has approved a resolution drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., that criticizes Bush's policy.

But a number of Republican senators -- including John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia and Judd Gregg of New Hampshire -- are drafting their own proposals that, while criticizing the surge, would offer support for the president and the U.S. military campaign in Iraq.

"It is the most serious issue in my career. I don't view it as having gotten personal," said Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla. "Like Senator Warner; we have different views, but I am more cajoling him, trying to come to something that brings us together."

Senate Republicans will meet with Bush on Friday at the White House, and the president is expected to reiterate his message that the surge plan is the only way to end sectarian fighting in Baghdad and surrounding regions, as well as providing Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with time to create a stable political environment.

The Bush plan has infuriated opponents of the Iraq war, and some Democratic senators such as Barack Obama of Illinois, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Chris Dodd of Connecticut have introduced their own proposals to block the additional troops from being sent to Iraq or begin an phased "redeployment" of U.S. forces within a certain period.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, R-Ohio, has been able to garner only "about 50" Republicans to sign onto his proposed resolution establishing benchmarks to measure the progress of Bush's new strategy for Iraq.

The Boehner proposal is designed to provide political cover to GOP moderates, but senior Republicans admit that rank-and-file lawmakers have not shown much interest in it so far.

That is likely to change soon, though, as Boehner is planning to launch a "full-court press" in the words of one senior GOP lawmaker, to get more Republicans to sign onto the resolution.

Privately, Boehner believes that unless he provides his members with an alternative resolution, Republicans who are skittish about Iraq will sign on to whatever proposal is offered by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and the Democratic leadership, according to a top Republican.

If that were to happen, following the Senate's potential approval of an anti-surge resolution next week, it would be "a huge political blow to the president," said the Republican lawmaker, who would discuss leadership strategy only on the condition of anonymity.

"We have to get these guys to see the light here," the lawmaker said.

McCain Backs Away From Iraq Statement (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain backed away Wednesday from a statement issued on his behalf criticizing the Bush administration for not putting more pressure on the Iraqi government to secure its country.

A statement attributed to McCain, R-Ariz., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and quoted Tuesday by The Associated Press said, "America supplying more troops while Iraqi leaders simply supply more promises is not a recipe for success in Iraq."

The statement was issued by the office of Levin, chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

McCain spokeswoman Eileen McMenamin and Levin spokeswoman Tara Andringa said Wednesday that the statement had been erroneously signed off on by a staffer who works for McCain on the Armed Services Committee.

It is unusual for a senator to pull back a statement issued on his behalf. McMenamin said McCain had not seen the statement and did not endorse it.

McCain, the Armed Services Committee's top Republican, supports Bush's plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad and the volatile western Anbar province. But he also has been a critic of the Bush administration's handling of the war and is drafting a resolution that would identify benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

Senate Resolution Called 'Disgrace' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

Senate Republicans yesterday said those in Congress who have turned against the war in Iraq are forsaking the troops on the ground and are ensuring defeat with a resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send in reinforcements.

"This resolution is a resolution of defeat and disgrace," said Sen. Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican who, as a member of the House, voted in 2002 for the war.

"There's no other way it could come out," Mr. DeMint said of the two resolutions that have been authored. "That is the choice that they're making. That is the decision they're making because we know if we withdraw and leave this to the Iraqis when they're not ready, that we will lose all."

The "nonbinding" resolutions rebuke Mr. Bush and his plan for sending an additional 21,000 troops to Iraq. But neither has any force of law that would require troops to come home or cut off funding.

One resolution was co-authored by Senate Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, and Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican. A second was authored by Sens. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican; Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat; and Susan Collins, Maine Republican. All five senators voted to go to war in 2002.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, was not serving in the Senate for the vote authorizing the war but has been an ardent defender of it. He said Congress is sending mixed messages to the troops, to voters and to the world with a "no confidence" vote that carries no force.

"We can't claim to support the troops and not support their mission," he said in a floor speech yesterday. "If we don't support the mission, we shouldn't be passing nonbinding resolutions. We should be doing everything in our power to stop it."

Instead, Mr. Cornyn said, "we should send them the message that, yes, we believe you can succeed and it's important to our national security that you do." He has been drawing up a resolution to do that.

"That's just nonsense," said Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, who voted for the war in 2002. "What undermines the troops is keeping them fighting in a civil war, to keep them fighting for a mistake."

Republicans said the troops in Iraq want the full support of Congress rather than give up on a mission in which they have lost so many comrades. They pointed to an NBC News clip aired last week that has stormed the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0125556

"One thing I don't like is when people back home say they support the troops but not the war," one soldier interviewed said. "If they're going to support us, support us all the way."

Spc. Tyler Johnson said, "You're not supporting what they do. They died for you. It don't make sense to me."

The clip became one of the most-watched clips on YouTube yesterday with more than 38,000 views. William M. Arkin, a Washingtonpost.com columnist, took offense.

"These soldiers should be grateful that the American public ... do still offer their support to them, and their respect," wrote Mr. Arkin. "Through every Abu Ghraib and Haditha, through every rape and murder, the American public has indulged those in uniform, accepting that the incidents were the product of bad apples or even of some administration or command order."

The NBC report "is just an ugly reminder of the price we pay for a mercenary -- oops sorry, volunteer -- force that thinks it is doing the dirty work," he added.

Late last night, leaders of both parties were negotiating the wording and timing of votes for the resolutions. Mr. Warner made changes to his resolution in an effort to win more Democratic backing, picking up support from Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

The new resolution vows to protect funding for existing troops while being silent on funding for the troop surge. It keeps Mr. Warner's original language expressing the Senate's opposition to the troop buildup but not calling it contrary to the national interest.

Also yesterday, former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine K. Albright urged Mr. Bush in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to develop a regional strategy that goes beyond the Iraq troop surge, including talks with Iran and Syria, and more autonomy for Iraq's rival ethnic and religious factions.

Mr. Kissinger defended the addition of 21,000 U.S. troops, though, calling it "the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required."

Dems Split On Iraq Bill Strategies (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 1, 2007

Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), co-chairwoman of the Progressive Caucus, is vowing to use the appropriations process to force lawmakers to vote on separate parts of a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. soldiers from Iraq.

The resolution would pay Iraqis reparations of up to $10,000 for damages caused by the war if they made claims; ban American firms from pumping oil in Iraq; cut off funds to build long-term bases in Iraq; pay for the destruction of landmines; and create a House-Senate select committee to study the origins of the war in Iraq.

Lee and Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), the other co-chair of the House Democratic Progressive Caucus, introduced H.R. 508, and they have signed up 28 co-sponsors. Woolsey says she plans to meet next week with House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) to ensure the resolution is considered in committee.

“I want to see this move very quickly,” Lee said.

The start of the appropriations process would be a “turning point” in the debate on Iraq, said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a vocal opponent of the war who is running for president.

Meanwhile, debate in the House is shaping up to be just as contentious as it was in the Senate, where lawmakers are considering six resolutions with varying degrees of opposition to President Bush’s plan to send 21,500 more soldiers to Iraq.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has let it be known that she is leaning toward a resolution similar to Sen. John Warner’s (R-Va.) bill, said a member of the Democratic leadership. Warner’s resolution states that the Senate disagrees with Bush’s plan to add the soldiers and to come up with “benchmarks” to measure progress so that American forces can leave “expeditiously.”

“I think she would like to support a bipartisan resolution that has passed the Senate and is critical of the escalation,” said a senior Democratic leadership aide.

Finally, the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative, mostly Southern Democrats, introduced a resolution last week that would create an independent committee modeled on the Truman Committee of World War II to study waste and fraud in government contracting and require the Bush administration to submit quarterly reports on spending in Iraq. The resolution also would ban the administration from using supplemental spending bills to pay for the war.

But the Blue Dogs’ bill does not call for a redeployment or withdrawal of forces. Instead, the non-binding legislation asks that the Bush administration “condition further American financial, military and political resources upon steady improvement in Iraqi assumption of principal responsibility for internally policing Iraq.”

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) has proposed that Democrats put together a resolution based on President Bush’s words in a speech before the State of the Union Address, and thus force Republican lawmakers either to endorse the “surge” or openly repudiate the president’s policy.

DOJ_NMG_0125557

If Woolsey's resolution is not considered in committee, it is unlikely that members would have a chance to vote on it on the House floor. The more liberal House Democrats believe that if they don't act quickly and decisively to express their opposition to the Iraq war, they will alienate voters on the biggest issue that propelled them into office.

"Whether we recognize it or not, this Democratic Congress is the House that Iraq built. The Democratic Party will rise or fall on whether we keep faith with the American people," said Kucinich.

Rep. Carol Shea-Porter (N.H.), like many freshman Democrats, campaigned against the war in Iraq and called for a redeployment of troops. She said she would sign on to all the Democratic resolutions and support the strongest one offered.

Asked why the House is waiting for the Senate to finish considering as many as six non-binding resolutions, Woolsey rolled her eyes.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), leader of the Out of Iraq Caucus, said her goal was "to keep [Iraq] on the radar screen and keep a discussion going."

But she also was dismayed by the need to voice strong opposition even after the Democrats had taken control of Congress.

Kissinger, Albright Weigh In On Iraq (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 1, 2007

Former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright urged President Bush on Wednesday to go beyond a planned buildup of U.S. forces in Iraq to develop a comprehensive strategy for the area.

They called for wide-ranging talks with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased autonomy for clashing Iraqi groups. The administration has brushed aside the proposal to engage Syria and Iran.

Kissinger, who served under Presidents Nixon and Ford, said the planned buildup of 21,500 U.S. troops appears to be "the best way to get the maneuvering room to the changes in deployment and strategy that will be required by the evolving situation."

"I think the focus has been on the surge," he testified. "My focus is the other way around: to explain the surge in terms of the strategy to which we should go."

The two former officials testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Kissinger suggested a strategy that would permit large regional autonomy for the various Iraqi groups and a stronger Iraqi army.

And, he said, "All of this has to be in the context of a willingness to talk to Iran" because of its power, even though he did not think Iran "would help us in Iraq as such."

"What we cannot accept is an Iran that seeks to dominate the region," Kissinger said.

Albright, who was secretary of state under President Clinton, said she might have backed Bush's buildup in Iraq if it "had been tied to a clear and achievable mission, and if we were guaranteed our troops would have the best training and equipment."

"I think we need a surge in diplomacy," she said. But she also told the committee, "We are viewed in the Middle East as a colonial power and our motives are suspect."

Like Kissinger, she supported participation by Iran and Syria along with other nations in talks designed to keep Iraq from slipping into chaos. "One gains by communicating with countries with which one disagrees," Albright said.

She said the United States should avoid Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, but "there are ways for us to speak to other people" in Iran.

Kissinger said the U.S. should always be ready to negotiate with governments with which it disagrees.

Their views resonated with the committee, several of whose members have been calling for an international or regional conference on Iraq. Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said the heart of the administration's present strategy — building a strong central government — cannot succeed.

"There is not enough trust within the government, no trust of the government by the people, and no capacity of the present government to deliver services and security," Biden said.

The Iraq Study Group, a private panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., recommended in December that the administration engage in talks with Iran and Syria.

Wherever A Senator's Question Leads, Kissinger Gamely Follows (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

So now it can be told: President Bush has a secret plan to end the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0125558

Henry Kissinger, who as Richard Nixon's secretary of state learned something about secret plans, went before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday to argue that Bush, too, has such a proposal.

"I am convinced, but I cannot base it on any necessary evidence right now," Kissinger told the senators, "that the president will want to move toward a bipartisan consensus" to stabilize Iraq through diplomacy.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) was suspicious of such assurances. "Is there any place that you're familiar with where the administration has articulated this strategy?" he asked.

"I don't know any place where the administration has articulated this particular strategy," the octogenarian diplomat admitted. But he added: "From my acquaintances with some of the people, I think it is possible that they will come to this strategy."

Obama asked Kissinger if "you are suggesting that they have some secret strategy that we have not been made privy to."

"I would be disappointed and surprised," he reiterated, "if they did not accept some of the elements of what has been discussed here."

For Kissinger, the floating of a phantom plan for Iraq provided a deft way out of a tricky situation. Like James Baker, who went before the committee Tuesday, Kissinger was inclined to defend Bush's Iraq policy. But Bush had left the two men, both former Republican secretaries of state, with little ammunition.

The administration rejected the core recommendation from Kissinger and from Baker's Iraq Study Group: a massive diplomatic offensive involving Syria and Iran. And yet, neither man was prepared to turn against the White House.

Baker, testifying on Tuesday, acted as if Bush had, in fact, supported his ideas. He mentioned the "common elements" between the Bush and Baker plans and the "very important points of similarity." Rubbing his fingers together and making motions with his mouth as if sucking on a hard candy, Baker pleaded: "Look, the president's plan ought to be given a chance. Give it a chance."

Kissinger, the master of nuanced phrases such as "not incompatible," provided few such broad pronouncements yesterday. Indeed, he pronounced very little in his low, German-accented rumble.

"I want to make sure I heard you right, because it's hard to hear you, so tell me if I heard you right," Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) directed him.

Kissinger responded with a guttural sound that the transcript labeled "(inaudible)."

It must have been a terrifying hearing for stenographers, who recorded Kissinger's utterances with phrases such as "we should avoid its (inaudible) deployment" and "we should work in the direction that will (inaudible) for maximum stability."

But this hardly mattered. The senators heard in Kissinger's testimony whatever they wanted to hear. On the one hand, Kissinger spoke of "an upheaval that goes across the whole region" and an "explosion of violence." On the other hand, he stated that "I do not believe we can withdraw from Iraq" and he provided a lukewarm endorsement for Bush's proposed increase in troops.

That left each senator in the room with the impression that Kissinger was endorsing the lawmaker's own personal plan. And the venerable diplomat, now stooped and wearing a hearing aid but as shrewd as ever, did not disabuse the senators of these impressions.

Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the chairman, pitched his plan for an Iraq split into autonomous regions. "I'm sympathetic to an outcome that permits large regional autonomy," Kissinger concurred.

Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.), the ranking Republican, asserted that "we cannot be in a situation in which we say 'We're out of there,' " Lugar pointed out.

"I believe very strongly that we cannot withdraw from the region," Kissinger agreed.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) tried to pull the witness in his direction. "I certainly agree with you that we cannot disengage from the region -- but what about redeployment from Iraq?" he asked.

"Of course significant American forces can be withdrawn," Kissinger obliged.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) tugged Kissinger the other way. "Is it your belief that a precipitous withdrawal . . . would have a greater negative long-term impact?"

"That is my conviction," Kissinger said.

"Would you agree," Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) asked, that "every alternative carries with it some rather grave risks?"

"Absolutely," Kissinger complied.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) said he hoped Bush's troop buildup would allow for reconciliation and diplomacy. "Am I wrong?"

"The objectives you've stated are compatible with what the president is attempting to do," Kissinger assured him.

The secretary's agreeability had a calming effect. "I think what I'm seeing here is someone testifying and almost everyone on this committee agreeing," observed Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "It's an interesting thing to watch."

Maybe that's Bush's secret plan to end the war in Iraq.

The President Has Jumped The Shark (LAT)

By Andy Borowitz

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH'S decision to send additional troops to Iraq has puzzled many pundits. Is the president stubborn, isolated, out of touch with reality? While all three may be true, there is another explanation. George W. Bush has been on television for the last six years, and like many TV shows entering a seventh season, Bush has jumped the shark.

Wikipedia defines "jumping the shark" as "the tipping point at which a TV series is deemed to have passed its peak, or has introduced plot twists that are illogical in terms of everything that has preceded them." Three telltale signs:

Same character, different actor: For the first six seasons of the Bush administration, the character of the secretary of Defense was played by Donald Rumsfeld. Then, without warning (unless you count his preelection comment that Rumsfeld was doing a "fantastic" job), Bush replaced him with former CIA chief Robert Gates. Like the producers of "Bewitched" (two Darrins) or "Roseanne" (two Beckys), Bush may have thought that if he made the casting switch with no explanation, the viewers wouldn't notice. Unfortunately for the president, the Rumsfeld-Gates switcheroo was the most jarring since "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" (two Aunt Vivs).

New kid in town: Long-of-tooth TV series often resort to adding younger characters in the hope of breathing much-needed life into a moribund enterprise. Although this ploy almost never works, and the new characters usually wind up being reviled (Cousin Oliver on "The Brady Bunch," Stephanie on "All in the Family"), the decider in chief has ignored the lessons of television history and proposed adding not one but 21,500 new characters. Will the "surge" succeed where those other fresh faces didn't? I have just two words for you: Scrappy Doo.

Special guest star: A true sign of desperation is when a wheezing TV show with plunging ratings (in Bush's case, 30%) gives up on its regular cast altogether and tries to revive viewer interest by importing a guest star — often a celebrity from the world of sports who has no plausible relationship to the series regulars. (Reggie Jackson, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Muhammad Ali all turned up on "Diff'rent Strokes.") Those who harbored any lingering doubts about Bush's shark-jumping status surely became converts during his State of the Union address, when the president looked up into the gallery of the House and introduced, on national television, Dikembe Mutombo.

Now that it is clear that Bush has jumped the shark, one question remains: Have we seen the worst of the president's bizarre stunts and desperate Hail Marys, or are there more to come? On that front, the news is not good: This week marks the beginning of February sweeps.

U.S.-Iran Tensions Could Trigger War (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, February 1, 2007

Citing Iranian involvement with Iraqi militias and Tehran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration has shifted to offense in its confrontation with Iran — building up the U.S. military in the Persian Gulf and promising more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq and Lebanon.

The behind-the-scenes struggle between the two nations could explode into open warfare over a single misstep, analysts and U.S. military officials warn.

Iraq has become a proxy battleground between Washington and Tehran, which is challenging — at least rhetorically — America's dominance of the Gulf. That has worried even Iraq's U.S.-backed Shiite prime minister, who — in a reflection of Iraq's complexity — also has close ties to Iran.

Iran and the United States are already sparring on the ground.

On Jan. 20, militants kidnapped and killed four American soldiers in a raid in Karbala, and a fifth was killed in the firefight. A U.S. defense official said one possibility under study is that Iranian agents either executed or masterminded the attack, a suspicion based on the sophisticated and unusual methods used in the attack, including weapons and uniforms that may have been American.

He spoke on condition of anonymity because the probe is ongoing.

There has been speculation that the Karbala assault may have been in retaliation for the arrest of five Iranians by U.S. troops in northern Iraq.

Those five Iranians, who were arrested in the northern city of Irbil, included two members of an Iranian Revolutionary Guard force that provides weapons, training and other support to Shiite militants in the Middle East, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said last week. Iraqi and Iranian officials maintain the five were diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0125560

Since the Karbala raid, U.S. saber-rattling has intensified. President Bush said this week that U.S. forces in Iraq would take action against Iranian operatives in the country, while insisting he had no intention of attacking Iran.

"If Iran escalates its military action in Iraq to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly," Bush told National Public Radio.

Although little evidence has been made public, U.S. officials have long insisted that Iran was supplying weapons and training to Shiite militias in Iraq, including some that have killed American troops.

The No. 2 U.S. general in Iraq told USA Today in an interview published Tuesday that Iran was supplying Iraqi Shiite militias with a variety of powerful weapons, including Katyusha rockets and armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades.

"We have weapons that we know through serial numbers ... trace back to Iran," Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said.

The Air Force is considering more forceful patrols on the Iraqi side of the border with Iran to counter the smuggling of weapons and bomb supplies, the Los Angeles Times reported, citing senior Pentagon officials.

The U.S. is also building up its military presence in the Gulf in what it says is a show of strength directed at Iran. A second aircraft carrier is heading for the region, and Patriot missile batteries are being deployed.

Since Bush announced his new Iraq strategy in early January, Iranian officials have raised the alarm repeatedly that the U.S. intends to attack. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran is "ready for anything" in its confrontation with the United States.

A newspaper close to Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei last week threatened retaliation for any U.S. military action — including stopping oil traffic through the Gulf's strategic Hormuz Straits and attacks on U.S. interests. The top editor of the Kayhan daily warned that Iran will turn the Middle East into "hell" for the United States and Israel if America attacks.

Iran expert Ray Takeyh said the risks are all the greater because Tehran has an "unhealthy" disregard for American power, which "enhances the prospect of a miscalculation."

Prof. Gary Sick, a leading authority on Iran, believes the U.S. is seeking to divert world attention from the crisis in Iraq and organize a coalition of Israel and conservative Sunni Arab states to confront Iran.

"I see this as a very dangerous long-term policy because it promotes the idea that Sunnis and Shiites should be distrustful of each other, and I think that could come back and bite us later on," he said.

Iran and the U.S. also are in dispute over Tehran's nuclear program. The United States accuses Iran of secretly developing atomic weapons — an allegation Tehran denies. Iran's defiant refusal to suspend uranium enrichment prompted the U.N. Security Council to impose limited economic sanctions.

The U.S. has also beefed up support for Lebanon's government in its power struggle with Hezbollah, the Shiite militia that Washington accuses of acting in Iran's interests.

But Lee Feinstein of the Council on Foreign Relations said the U.S. was finding it hard "to calibrate its message" to distinguish "between a stern message and a warning of attack."

The war of words has raised fears among both Democrats and Republicans in Congress that the United States and Iran are drifting toward armed conflict at a time when America is struggling against determined foes in Iraq and Afghanistan.

It has also unnerved the Iraqi government, many of whose members have close ties to Iran.

"We have told the Iranians and the Americans, `We know that you have a problem with each other but we're asking you, please, solve your problems outside of Iraq,'" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, told CNN on Wednesday. "We do not want the American forces to take Iraq as a base to attack Iran ... we will not accept Iran using Iraq to attack American forces. But does this exist? It exists and I assure you it exists."

As the rhetoric grows more strident, a U.S. military official in the Gulf likened the U.S.-Iran standoff to the buildup in hostility in Europe before World War I, when the assassination of the heir to the Austrian throne triggered a tragic war that engulfed a continent.

"A mistake could be made and you could end up in something that neither side ever really wanted, and suddenly it's August 1914 all over again," the U.S. officer said on condition of anonymity, because of the sensitivity of the issue. "I really believe neither side wants a fight."

Iranian coast guard vessels recently veered into territorial waters on the Arab side of the Gulf, an event that could have been viewed as either a mistake or a provocation, the officer said. Both sides are on tenterhooks. "A boat crosses a line ... but what does it mean? You've got to be very careful about overreacting," the officer said.

Even if Iran pulled back from Iraq's conflict, it might not end the country's violence, said Kenneth M. Pollack, research director at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy.

"The truth is that Iraq is a mess. It is in a state of low-level civil war. And all of these groups are largely self-motivated," he said on the Council on Foreign Relations Web site. "But its much easier to blame it on the Iranians."

DOJ_NMG_0125561

In Tehran, political analyst Hermidas Bavand said U.S. force increases were leading many Iranians to believe Washington is looking to pick a fight.

"It's an extremely dangerous situation," Bavand said. "I don't think Tehran wants war under any circumstances. But there might be an accidental event that could escalate into a large confrontation."

U.S. Delays Report On Iranian Role In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration has postponed plans to offer public details of its charges of Iranian meddling inside Iraq amid internal divisions over the strength of the evidence, U.S. officials said.

U.S. officials promised last week to provide evidence of Iranian activities that led President Bush to announce Jan. 10 that U.S. forces would begin taking the offensive against Iranian agents who threatened Americans.

But some officials in Washington are concerned that some of the material may be inconclusive and that other data cannot be released without jeopardizing intelligence sources and methods. They want to avoid repeating the embarrassment that followed the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, when it became clear that information the administration cited to justify the war was incorrect, said the officials, who described the internal discussions on condition of anonymity.

"We don't want a repeat of the situation we had when [then-Secretary of State] Colin L. Powell went before the United Nations," said one U.S. official, referring to Powell's 2003 presentation on then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's unconventional weapons program that relied on evidence later found to be false. "People are going to be skeptical."

The current debate pits some U.S. diplomatic and military officials in Iraq, who are seeking to compile an aggressive case on Iran, against other officials in Washington, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who are urging greater caution, according to the officials, who spoke in the last several days.

The Bush administration has charged repeatedly that Iranian agents and military personnel have been bringing in explosives and other weaponry for use in Iraq by Shiite Muslim militants. U.S. intelligence and military officials have said they have substantial evidence of Iranian involvement, but have not made it public.

The mounting U.S. charges against Iran have been accompanied by the movement of American warships into the Persian Gulf, giving rise to fears of a possible U.S. attack.

U.S. forces arrested a group of Iranians in Baghdad in December and are holding five Iranian officials who were detained Jan. 11 in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. At the same time, the administration has shunned a proposal by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to open direct talks with Iran and Syria as part of a plan to quell the violence in Iraq.

The U.S. claims led Tehran's ambassador to Iraq, Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, to challenge American officials last month to show "any shred of evidence" of Iranian meddling.

The U.S. ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, promised last week to do so, and American officials initially planned to release their dossier Tuesday.

But the release was delayed, and Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, declined Wednesday to predict when the report would be issued.

"We'll do this on our own timeline," he told reporters. "And we're going to do it in such a way that it is properly presented, it is clear, and that it is done in such a way that … we don't in any way jeopardize [U.S. officials'] ability to further collect information about these networks."

This week, McCormack denied that U.S. intelligence failures and erroneous pre-Iraq war claims had made the job of preparing the new dossier more difficult.

The administration's quandary is one more indication of the difficulties the United States faces in Iraq as it tries to limit the influence of the Iranians, whom it increasingly views as its chief regional rival. There are thousands of Iranians in Iraq. Some of them have strong ties to the U.S.-backed government.

One former senior U.S. defense official said that preparing such a case would involve trying to cull sensitive data for presentation to a skeptical American public.

"It's a losing proposition for the administration," said the former official, who declined to be identified when addressing intelligence issues.

U.S. military and embassy officials in Baghdad have been trying to build a case with a variety of evidence, according to officials.

But officials involved in interagency meetings on the issue in Washington, including some in the State Department and intelligence agencies, believe that some of the material overstates murky evidence and casts a negative light on Iranians who may not be guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0125562

Another difficulty is that if some of the most sensitive information is withdrawn to protect intelligence sources, the result could be a weak and unconvincing report, the officials said.

The American official who requested anonymity said that although there were differences over the evidence, there was wide agreement within the U.S. government that Iran's actions were a threat and that the United States, while avoiding war, should be more aggressive in confronting Iran in Iraq.

"But that doesn't mean you want to go overboard," the official added. "Everyone at the Iranian Embassy isn't some kind of spy or revolutionary."

The official said that Rice, despite strongly agreeing that the United States should take a more aggressive approach, was urging caution on the tone of the report.

U.S. military officials in Iraq long have been concerned that Iranian Revolutionary Guards and other military and intelligence personnel are present in Iraq, and have been urging a stronger stance against the Iranians. On several occasions, they have requested broader authority to engage the Iranians, the U.S. official said.

This week the No. 2 U.S. military commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, said in an interview with USA Today that Iranians were supplying Iraqis with truck-mounted Katyusha rockets, armor-piercing rocket-propelled grenades and armor-piercing roadside bombs.

Odierno said serial numbers linked the rockets to Iran.

The growing hostility is angering Iraqi leaders, who have begun speaking out against the prospect of conflict between the United States and Iran in their country.

Bullying Iran (NYT)

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Given America's bitter experience in Iraq, one would think that President Bush could finally figure out that threats and brute force aren't a substitute for a reasoned strategy. But Mr. Bush is at it again, this time trying to bully Iran into stopping its meddling inside Iraq.

We have no doubt about Iran's malign intent, just as we have no doubt that Mr. Bush's serial failures in Iraq have made it far easier for Tehran to sow chaos there and spread its influence in the wider region. But more threats and posturing are unlikely to get Iran to back down. If Mr. Bush isn't careful, he could end up talking himself into another disastrous war, and if Congress is not clear in opposing him this time, he could drag the country along.

The drumbeat began during Mr. Bush's recent speech on Iraq, when he vowed to "seek out and destroy" Iranian and Syrian networks he said were arming and training anti-American forces. Mr. Bush also announced that he was sending a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. Hours earlier, American troops raided an Iranian diplomatic office in Iraq. If anyone missed the point, aides let it be known that the president had authorized the military to kill or capture Iranian operatives in Iraq.

Iran certainly is helping arm and train Shiite militias. But the administration is certainly exaggerating the salutary effect of any cutoff as long as these militias enjoy the protection of Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. If Mr. Bush is genuinely worried — and he should be — he needs to be as forceful in demanding that Mr. Maliki cut ties to these groups and clear about the consequences if he refuses.

In what passes for grand strategy in this administration, the president's aides say he is betting that bloodying Iranian forces in Iraq, and raising the threat of a wider confrontation, will weaken Tehran's regional standing and force its leaders to rethink their nuclear ambitions. Never mind that Mr. Bush's last big idea — that imposing democracy on Iraq would weaken Iran's authoritarians — has had the opposite effect.

Mr. Bush seems to be grossly misreading Iran's domestic politics and ignoring his own recent experience. In a rare moment of subtlety, the Treasury Department has quietly persuaded some banks and investors to rethink their dealings with Tehran. That has made some in Iran's permanent religious elite — already worried about future oil production — express doubts about President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiance of the Security Council.

As ever, the one tactic the administration is refusing to consider is diplomacy. Mr. Bush has resisted calls to convene a meeting of Iraq's neighbors to discuss ways to contain the crisis. There is no guarantee that Mr. Ahmadinejad can be persuaded that Iraq's further implosion is not in Iran's interest. But others in Tehran may have clearer heads. And any hope of driving a wedge between Iran and Syria will have to start by giving Damascus hope that there is a way in from the cold.

Mr. Bush's bullying may play well to his ever shrinking base. But his disastrous war in Iraq has done so much damage to America's credibility — and so strained its resources— that it no longer frightens America's enemies. The only ones really frightened are Americans and America's friends.

Chirac Unfazed By Nuclear Iran, Then Backtracks (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino And Katrin Bennhold

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 31 — President Jacques Chirac said this week that if Iran had one or two nuclear weapons, it would not pose a big danger, and that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran.

The remarks, made in an interview on Monday with The New York Times, The International Herald Tribune and Le Nouvel Observateur, a weekly magazine, were vastly different from stated French policy and what Mr. Chirac has often said.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chirac summoned the same journalists back to Élysée Palace to retract many of his remarks.

Mr. Chirac said repeatedly during the second interview that he had spoken casually and quickly the day before because he believed he had been talking about Iran off the record.

"I should rather have paid attention to what I was saying and understood that perhaps I was on the record," he said.

The tape-recorded, on-the-record interview was conducted under an agreement that it would not be published until Thursday, when Le Nouvel Observateur appears on newsstands.

On Monday, Mr. Chirac began by describing as "very dangerous" Iran's refusal to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used to produce electricity or to make nuclear weapons. Then he made his remarks about a nuclear-armed Iran.

"I would say that what is dangerous about this situation is not the fact of having a nuclear bomb," he said. "Having one or perhaps a second bomb a little later, well, that's not very dangerous.

"But what is very dangerous is proliferation. This means that if Iran continues in the direction it has taken and totally masters nuclear-generated electricity, the danger does not lie in the bomb it will have, and which will be of no use to it."

Mr. Chirac said it would be an act of self-destruction for Iran to use a nuclear weapon against another country.

"Where will it drop it, this bomb? On Israel?" Mr. Chirac asked. "It would not have gone 200 meters into the atmosphere before Tehran would be razed."

It was unclear whether Mr. Chirac's initial remarks reflected what he truly believes. If so, it suggests a growing divide with American policy, which places the highest priority on stopping Iran from gaining the capacity to produce nuclear weapons.

Mr. Chirac has privately expressed the view occasionally in the past year that a nuclear-armed Iran might be inevitable and that it could try to sell the technology to other countries. But publicly the policy has been very different. In fact, Élysée Palace prepared a heavily edited 19-page transcript of the Monday interview that excluded Mr. Chirac's assessment of a nuclear-armed Iran.

The transcript even inserted a line that Mr. Chirac had not said that read, "I do not see what type of scenario could justify Iran's recourse to an atomic bomb."

There are divisions within the French government — and between Europe and the United States — about how much Iran should be punished for behavior that the outside world might not be able to change. Some French officials worry that the more aggressive course of action by the United States toward Iran will lead to a confrontation like the Iraq war, which France opposed.

In noting the sanctions against Iran that were imposed last month by the Security Council, Mr. Chirac warned Tuesday that escalation of the conflict by both sides was unwise. "Of course we can go further and further, or higher and higher up the scale in the reactions from both sides," he said. "This is certainly not our thinking nor our intention."

Mr. Chirac argued that Iran's possession of a nuclear weapon was less important than the arms race that would ensue.

"It is really very tempting for other countries in the region that have large financial resources to say: 'Well, we too are going to do that; we're going to help others do it,' " he said. "Why wouldn't Saudi Arabia do it? Why wouldn't it help Egypt to do so as well? That is the real danger."

Earlier this month, Mr. Chirac had planned to send his foreign minister to Iran to help resolve the crisis in Lebanon. The venture collapsed after Saudi Arabia and Egypt opposed the trip and members of his own government said it would fail.

Mr. Chirac, who is 74 and months away from ending his second term as president, suffered a neurological episode in 2005 and is said by French officials to have become much less precise in conversation.

In the second interview, Mr. Chirac retracted his comment that Tehran would be destroyed if Iran launched a nuclear weapon. "I retract it, of course, when I said, 'One is going to raze Tehran,' " he said.

He added that any number of third countries would stop an Iranian bomb from ever reaching its target. "It is obvious that this bomb, at the moment it was launched, obviously would be destroyed immediately," Mr. Chirac said. "We have the means — several countries have the means to destroy a bomb."

Mr. Chirac also retracted his prediction that a nuclear Iran could encourage Saudi Arabia and Egypt to follow suit.

"I drifted — because I thought we were off the record — to say that, for example, Saudi Arabia or Egypt could be tempted to follow this example," he said. "I retract it, of course, since neither Saudi Arabia nor Egypt has made the slightest declaration on these subjects, so it is not up to me to make them."

DOJ_NMG_0125564

As for his suggestion in the first interview that Israel could be a target of an Iranian attack and could retaliate, Mr. Chirac said: “I don’t think I spoke about Israel yesterday. Maybe I did so but I don’t think so. I have no recollection of that.”

There were other clarifications. In the initial interview, for example, Mr. Chirac referred to the Iranian Islamic Republic as “a bit fragile.” In the subsequent interview, he called Iran “a great country” with a “very old culture” that “has an important role to play in the region” as a force for stability.

Mr. Chirac’s initial comments contradicted the long-held French policy of deterrence, which holds that Iran must not go nuclear. The thinking is that a nuclear-armed Iran would give Iran the ability to project power throughout the region and threaten its neighbors — as well as encourage others in the region to seek the bomb.

Under Mr. Chirac’s presidency, France has joined the United States and other countries in moving to punish Iran for refusing to stop enriching uranium, as demanded by the International Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations Security Council.

Iran insists that the purpose of its uranium enrichment program is to produce energy; France, along with many other countries, including the United States, is convinced that the program is part of a nuclear weapons project.

The purpose of the initial interview was for Mr. Chirac to talk about climate change and an international conference in Paris later this week that parallels a United Nations conference on the global environment.

The question about Iran followed a comment by Mr. Chirac on the importance of developing nuclear energy programs that are transparent, safe and secure.

In the midst of his initial remarks on Iran, Mr. Chirac’s spokesman passed him a handwritten note, which Mr. Chirac read aloud. “Yes, he’s telling me that we have to go back to the environment,” Mr. Chirac said. He then continued a discussion of Shiite Muslims, who are by far the majority in Iran but a minority in the Muslim world.

“Shiites do not have the reaction of the Sunnis or of Europeans,” said Mr. Chirac, who over the years in private meetings has expressed distrust of Shiite Muslims.

The president had a different demeanor during the two encounters.

In the first interview, which took place in the late morning, he appeared distracted at times, grasping for names and dates and relying on advisers to fill in the blanks. His hands shook slightly. When he spoke about climate change, he read from prepared talking points printed in large letters and highlighted in yellow and pink.

By contrast, in the second interview, which came just after lunch, he appeared both confident and comfortable with the subject matter.

The attempt by Élysée Palace to change the president’s remarks in a formal text is not unusual. It is a long-held tradition in French journalism for interview subjects — from the president to business and cultural figures — to be given the opportunity to edit the texts of question-and-answer interviews before publication.

U.S. Cautions Europeans To Avoid Oil, Gas Deals With Iran (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, February 1, 2007

The Bush administration is warning European oil and gas companies against investing in Iran, trying to head off a push by Tehran to attract new investment by international petroleum giants.

In the past two weeks, the administration has met with European oil company executives about the Middle East, and during one session a senior State Department official cautioned that the situation with Iran was "hot and is going to get hotter," one executive said.

An executive from another major European company said, "The administration is putting the full-court press on foreign companies and is going all out to impress upon them that it would be a mistake to do anything with" Iran.

Despite the administration's pressure, however, many of the world's biggest oil companies were expected to attend a meeting in Vienna today and tomorrow held by National Iranian Oil Co. to drum up interest in 12 onshore and five offshore blocks. Executives from Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Russia's Lukoil, China's Sinopec International Petroleum Exploration and Production Corp. and Austria's OMV will give presentations.

"Obviously Iran is very interesting oil territory for everybody," said Patricia Marie, spokeswoman for the French oil company Total S.A., which invested about $4 billion in Iran between 1995 and 2002 and is sending a representative to the meeting. As for U.S. admonitions, Marie said, "We are listening. . . . But we respect the French law, the European laws; we are not obliged to respect American law."

Marie said Total will decide this year whether to proceed with a liquefied natural gas (LNG) project in the south of Iran.

Last week, Royal Dutch Shell and the Spanish company Repsol YPF S.A. signed a preliminary agreement with Iran to explore the possible development of another multibillion-dollar LNG project.

DOJ_NMG_0125565

Oil company executives and consultants said any reluctance to invest in Iran ultimately has more to do with the stingy terms Iran offers than with arm-twisting by the U.S. government. Generally, Iranian contracts let foreign companies recoup costs and give them enough oil for them to make a small profit before control of the fields is turned over to National Iranian Oil.

"In effect, the Iranians have made our sanctions work better than we have," said Gary G. Sick, an expert on Iran at Columbia University.

One international executive said Iranians usually offer single-digit rates of return for investments in the oil sector, far less than what companies can make elsewhere.

"The Iranians always argue that there is no need for them to offer more because of the very low geological risk in Iran, because they know it's a country with substantial reserves," he said. "But you have to factor in political risk and all sorts of other things."

The struggle over oil investment is part of the Bush administration's campaign to isolate Iran and curtail its funds because of its pursuit of nuclear technology that might help it build nuclear weapons.

U.S. companies are barred from doing business with Iran. In 1995, an executive order stopped them from even bringing Iranian oil to Europe. In 1996, Congress passed the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, enabling the U.S. government to sanction foreign firms doing business with Iran. Though the United States has issued waivers to European companies involved in Iran's oil sector, one European executive said the Bush administration might change that stance.

On Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said of Shell's Iranian negotiations: For investments over a certain level, "policymakers take a look at it and see if there's any further steps that we, as a government, take."

A Shell spokesman said yesterday that "nothing has been decided" and that a decision on the project was "a year or so away."

EU Resisting US Calls To Up Financial Pressure On Iran (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, February 1, 2007

US demands to toughen financial sanctions against Iran are opening fault lines in the US-European stand to punish Tehran for defying calls to rein its suspect nuclear program.

Although European countries have agreed with the United States to impose sanctions on Iran in line with a UN resolution adopted in December, they are resisting US calls to go even further and force global financial institutions to sever all ties with the Islamic Republic.

US Under Secretary in charge of fighting terrorist funding, Stuart Levey, has made several whirlwind trips to Europe over the past months to try to persuade European multinationals and banks to stop investing in Iran.

But so far he has run into a brick wall, with European countries maintaining they are not ready to cut off banking links with Iranian companies, arguing that such a move goes beyond the spirit of the UN resolution.

"We are going to do the utmost to apply the content of the resolution. We are not going to go beyond what is in the resolution as states," a senior European official told AFP.

The stand is beginning to frustrate the US administration of President George W. Bush which has accused Tehran of making a covert grab for nuclear weapons under the guise of its civilian atomic energy program.

Iran has scoffed at the suggestions saying its program is merely for peaceful purposes, and has refused to stop its controversial uranium enrichment process despite the UN sanctions.

Iranian officials are even promising to unveil a major advance in its nuclear drive this week as part of the celebrations to mark the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

US officials this week gave vent to their mounting frustration, which comes as Bush has accused Iranian leaders of helping to foment the mounting sectarian violence in Iraq, fuelling fears that the US could be preparing some kind of military response against Tehran.

"The European response on the economic side has been pretty weak," one unnamed senior US official said quoted in The New York Times in an article headlined "Europe Resists US Push to Curb Iran Ties."

"We are telling the Europeans that they need to go way beyond what they've done to maximize pressure on Iran," he added.

However, this position does not seem to completely reflect the view of the US administration.

"I think that the concerns that European governments are expressing have to do with their legal requirements. They have a set of legal requirements that they have to abide by," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"And I'm not sure I would call that resistance to discussing or cooperating on these various measures."

DOJ_NMG_0125566

European Union foreign ministers last week agreed to implement the full raft of UN sanctions against Tehran and deplored "Iran's failure to take the steps repeatedly required by the IAEA board of governors and the United Nations Security Council."

A new EU meeting is planned in mid-February to put in place European regulations on the Iran sanctions which suspend all exports of material and technology to the Islamic Republic.

The UN resolution also freezes Iranian assets abroad and restricts foreign travel by Iranians deemed to be involved in the suspect programs.

Earlier this month the US Treasury Department blacklisted Iran's fifth largest state-owned bank, Bank Sepah, alleging it had helped finance weapons proliferation.

That measure came after another of Iran's largest banks was blacklisted in September because of its "support for terrorism."

"Bank Saderat facilitates Iran's transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to Hezbollah and other terrorist organizations each year," Levey said then.

However, neither of the two banks figure on the lists of organizations and people targeted by UN resolution 1737, and Bush had to use a presidential decree to prohibit their financial activities in the US.

Sanctions Rattle Iran, Spur Talk Of Shake-up (WT)

By Iason Athanasiadis

The Washington Times, February 1, 2007

TEHRAN -- The unanimous passage of U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran in December has shaken the nation's public and ruling elite, prompting talk of a shake-up of top officials and fears of a U.S. attack.

Even before the sanctions were approved, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had been weakened by his inability to fulfill campaign promises to stem rising inflation and by doubts over the wisdom of his statements questioning the Holocaust and threatening Israel.

Now, suggestions are being raised that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, is to change several key officials, including Ali Larijani, the head of the National Security Council; Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki; and Ambassador to the United Nations Javad Zarif.

"There is a deep concern and uncertainty on behalf of the Iranian leaders about the consequences of the nuclear program of Ahmadinejad's administration," said Hossein Bastani, the former general secretary of the Association of Iranian Journalists.

"In short ... the passage of such a resolution against the Islamic republic caught them by surprise."

Western officials have also noted rising domestic criticism of Mr. Ahmadinejad since the U.N. Security Council approved the relatively mild sanctions, which had been watered down to win the approval of Russia and China.

"You're starting to see voices in Iran that are concerned about the isolation that Iran's president and Iran's program are bringing," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a German television interview last week.

And French Ambassador to Washington Jean-David Levitte said in an interview with The Washington Times on Monday: "We have noted in the Iranian media the beginning of a debate about the situation that Iran is in now -- more isolation and confrontation."

A senior diplomat from the region, speaking to The Washington Times last week, said after a visit to Tehran that Iranians were troubled less by the specific economic sanctions than by the lineup of countries that had supported them, including Russia and China.

An alliance of reformists and conservative "realists" has emerged to say the president's actions are leading the country to the brink of war.

In recent days, there has been speculation that Ayatollah Khamenei is refusing even to see the president as a signal of his disquiet at Iran's growing isolation.

Reports also say the ayatollah is upset at Mr. Mottaki's inability to win allies among Iran's Arab neighbors at a time when the United States is encouraging moderate Arab states to line up against Iran.

Officials also are concerned that Mr. Larijani, the chief nuclear negotiator, has unnecessarily angered the European Union's foreign-policy chief, Javier Solana, with his inconsistent approach to the talks.

"What Larijani may not have understood is that he cannot treat Solana in that way and expect not to be burned by the European Union," a European diplomat in Tehran said on the condition of anonymity.

Iranians also are giving greater weight to the threat of a U.S. military attack after a former chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards said on the state television monopoly, Sedaosima, last week that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0125567

"When we saw [Mohsen] Rezai openly say on Sedaosima that the Americans will try to strike and that he's willing to become a martyr, we were shocked," said Sahand, a young Iranian filmmaker who, like some others interviewed asked not to be fully identified. "It was the first time that it was being stated on national television."

The interview rang alarm bells for well-informed Iranian analysts, who point out that official Iranian news outlets tend not to report much bad news.

"On the night that sanctions were imposed last month, a commentator was telling people that they mean nothing and that Iranians have been through tougher times during the Iraq war," said Leila, a producer for Sedaosima. "I'm scared that Rezai's appearance is ... preparing people for a military strike on Iran."

Public anxiety has been further fed by the build-up of U.S. forces in Iraq and the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier, the USS John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf.

The Iranian military has responded with a three-day military drill testing its Zalzal and Fajr-5 missiles in the desert southeast of Tehran.

Last week, Russia completed delivery of 29 advanced TOR-M1 surface-to-air missile-defense systems, which will be deployed around Iran's nuclear facilities in central Iran, said European diplomatic sources in Tehran.

Latest Violence Claims At Least 24 Iraqis (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD — At least 24 Iraqis were killed and dozens injured today in bomb blasts, gunfire and other violence. The heaviest toll was inflicted in Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two soldiers and one Marine in combat in Al Anbar province on Tuesday. At least 3,084 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the website icasualties.org.

In the day's worst attack, a car bomb exploded in a downtown street where a crowd was waiting to catch minibus taxis to areas of Shiite Muslim-dominated east Baghdad. At least five people were killed and 12 injured, police said.

Naim Zamel, a 38-year-old father of three, was delivering goods to a shop across the street when the blast happened.

"The sound and the pressure were hard. Shrapnel was flying all over the place," he said from his bed at the Medical City Hospital, where he was treated for injuries to his neck, ear and leg. "I saw three cars on fire, people injured and shops destroyed."

Onlookers rushed to help the wounded, loading Zamel into the back of a pickup truck and rushing him to hospital before ambulances arrived at the scene.

Another car bomb exploded this morning in the mostly Shiite east Baghdad neighborhood of Amin, killing at least two people and injuring 10, police said.

The bullet-riddled bodies of four missing scholars, all Sunni Arabs, were found in the mostly Shiite neighborhood where they were kidnapped Monday as they left the Naharain University College of Law, university officials said.

Officials at Yarmuk Hospital said they received 10 more unidentified bodies from two mostly Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads.

North of the capital, a car bomb targeting an Iraqi police convoy exploded on a main road in the city Mosul, killing at least one officer and injuring four people, including a civilian, police and hospital officials said.

Iraqi soldiers confronted a suicide attacker they said was trying to drive an explosives-rigged fuel tanker into a small base in Muqdadiyah. The tanker exploded outside the base, injuring nine soldiers and causing a large fire, the military said.

South of Baghdad, police responding to reports of a car bomb in a mostly Sunni village near Suwayrah were targeted by a roadside bomb, officials said. Three policemen were injured and four suspects detained, they said.

Iraq's army and police are frequent targets of Sunni insurgents, who view them as collaborators with the United States.

A U.S. helicopter fired on four men planting a bomb in the shoulder of a road south of Baghdad, killing two of them, the military said in a statement.

Iraq Prepares For New Security Crackdown (USAT)

USA Today, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown aimed at crushing violence in the capital and surrounding regions, a member of the parliament and an airport official said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0125568

The airport official told the Associated Press that flights to and from Syria will be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted Tuesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to reveal the information.

Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's Defense and Security Committee, said the move "was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume."

President Bush recently warned Iran and Syria not to interfere in Iraq's affairs as U.S. and Iraqi forces prepare for the major crackdown on armed groups in the capital.

Across Iraq on Wednesday, at least 47 people were reported killed.

The United States has accused Syria of harboring former Baath Party officials who support the Sunni insurgency and allowing foreign fighters to slip across its border with Iraq. Bush has also complained that Iran smuggles weapons to Shiite extremists who have killed Americans and provides Shiite militias with training and support. Iran denies doing so.

Meanwhile, Iraq's prime minister pleaded Wednesday with Iran and the United States not to use his country as a place to fight each other.

"We have told the Iranians and the Americans: 'We know that you have a problem with each other, but we are asking you, please solve your problems outside Iraq,' " Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told CNN.

Bush has authorized U.S. troops to take action against Iranian agents allegedly operating in Iraq.

"We will not accept Iran to use Iraq to attack the American forces," al-Maliki said. However, "we don't want the American forces to take Iraq as a field to attack Iran or Syria," he said.

Iraq Restricts Air, Land Passages To Syria, Iran (WP)

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 -- Iraq indefinitely halted all flights to and from Syria and closed a border crossing with Iran as the government prepares for a security crackdown, a parliament member and an airport official said Wednesday, the Associated Press reported.

The airport official said that flights to and from Syria would be canceled for at least two weeks and that service had been interrupted on Tuesday, the AP said.

Hassan al-Sunneid, a member of the parliament's defense and security committee, told the AP that the move "was in preparation for the security plan. The state will decide when the flights will resume."

Also on Wednesday, the U.S. military said two soldiers and a Marine died Tuesday in Anbar province from "wounds sustained due to enemy action." A soldier from Task Force Lightning was killed in combat Wednesday in Salahuddin province, the military said in a statement. The service members' names will be released after relatives are notified.

In Baghdad on Wednesday, scholars and students at al-Nahrain University were protesting the kidnapping earlier this week of three law professors when they learned that their bodies had been found in a morgue. "They are innocent professors, good instructors," said Adnan al-Janabi, the director of the university, noting that one was over 70. One of the professor's sons, a student at the university, was also killed, he said.

Also Wednesday, a car bomb exploded southeast of Baghdad, killing four people and injuring nine, according to Col. Hasson Salman, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

Elsewhere in the country at least nine people were killed in shootings and mortar attacks, Salman said.

General: Shiite Militia Leaders Leaving Baghdad Strongholds (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Shiite militia leaders already appear to be leaving their strongholds in Baghdad in anticipation of the U.S. and Iraqi plan to increase the troop presence in the Iraqi capital, according to the top U.S. commander in the country.

"We have seen numerous indications Shia militia leaders will leave, or already have left, Sadr City to avoid capture by Iraqi and coalition security forces," Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. said in a written statement submitted to the Senate Armed Services Committee as part of his confirmation hearing today to be Army chief of staff.

Casey, who has been the senior U.S. military officer in Iraq since summer 2004, also stated that as part of the campaign to improve security in Baghdad, he expects that U.S. troops will be stationed in Sadr City with Iraqi army and national police units. U.S. plans call for five combat brigades, or about 17,500 troops, to move into Baghdad over the next four months and help occupy about 35 outposts across the city.

DOJ_NMG_0125569

Sadr City is the huge slum on the east side of Baghdad that has about 2.5 million inhabitants and also is the home of the Mahdi Army, the most powerful militia in Iraq. The Mahdi Army is largely controlled by Moqtada al-Sadr, a radical cleric who is sharply anti-American.

If Sadr's militia does indeed attempt to wait out the security crackdown, Casey said, that "would clearly present a challenge" to the Iraqi government, which he said underscores the need to have Iraqi forces capable of bringing security to the country. Developing effective Iraqi forces has been a U.S. goal for more than three years. Casey noted earlier in his 46-page statement, which was filed yesterday with the committee, that one of the most significant mistakes that U.S. officials made in Iraq was overestimating the speed with which Iraqi forces could be developed.

While the Shiite militias appear intent on waiting out the Iraqi-American security offensive by moving out of the city and lying low, Sunni insurgents will take a different course, Casey predicted. Sunni leaders are likely to relocate to areas northwest and south of Baghdad, he said, while Sunni fighters "will attempt to go to ground" in the parts of the city where they live.

He said he considers it "unlikely" that violence would spread much beyond greater Baghdad because the battle for the city is "the central struggle" for control of Iraq.

As with other recent nominees appearing before the Armed Services panel, Casey listed a series of mistakes that he believes have been made in Iraq. While some Bush administration officials still cite Iraq's elections as a great success, for example, he said that he thinks they "seem to have promoted increased sectarian divisions within the country."

Lie Low, Fighters Are Told (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londo?o

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 -- The instructions delivered by emissaries of anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr at a recent meeting in Baghdad were clear to militiaman Massan Abdul Hussein.

"They informed us to hide the weapons," Abdul Hussein recalled of the Jan. 21 meeting in the Shula neighborhood. "They said: 'We will not allow anyone to carry any arms, even if it's a pistol under their shirt. This is not acceptable.' "

Abdul Hussein, 30, considers himself a minor figure in the Mahdi Army, the powerful yet amorphous band of thousands of Sadr followers that the Pentagon said in November had "the greatest negative effect on the security situation in Iraq." But Abdul Hussein said the militia's foot soldiers had received a clear message from Sadr's headquarters in southern Iraq as Iraqi and U.S. troops prepared an intensified security crackdown in the capital.

"We should try at all costs to avoid any confrontation with the American forces, and even if they raid our offices or our houses, we should try to avoid a confrontation," he said. "We do not want this to lead to a larger outbreak of violence."

Sadr's followers waged fierce battles against the U.S. military in 2004, but militiamen and Iraqi politicians close to Sadr say this time he wants to avoid violent clashes and maintain a lower profile.

In recent weeks, Mahdi Army leaders have left Baghdad to avoid being targeted, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office has received reports that some Mahdi Army leaders are moving to Iran and Syria, according to an aide to Maliki who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The U.S. military has stepped up operations against Shiite militias and said recently that 600 Mahdi Army members, including 16 high-level figures, are in detention. The arrest of senior Sadr spokesman Abdul Hadi al-Daraji on Jan. 19 by U.S. and Iraqi forces has concerned Sadr followers, said Nassir al-Saedi, one of 30 parliament members in Sadr's bloc.

"We asked the leadership to leave their houses, because we do not trust the Americans," he said.

Sadr's followers say publicly that they embrace the new Baghdad security plan and are willing to support the Iraqi government's efforts to impose the rule of law in this chaotic city. But some Iraqi and U.S. officials said they are concerned that the stance is a pose and that Shiite militias intend to lie low only until U.S. forces withdraw.

"There's absolutely no reason to believe that these groups have changed their tune in any significant way" since the 2004 battles, said a U.S. official in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. "You could make an argument that there's just a level of exhaustion that's set in, but I find that not believable."

A more likely scenario is that the militia leaders believe they can "win the whole thing" if they are not too damaged by the time the United States withdraws, the official said.

Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaee, who oversees security affairs, said he is skeptical of statements by Mahdi Army leaders indicating a passive posture. "The Mahdi Army should hand over its weapons to the government, not put down their weapons or hide them," Zobaee said in an interview Wednesday. "This should go for every armed group. I don't think I can say I see that in the horizon."

Maliki is aware of concerns that the militias may be biding their time rather than sincerely taking peaceful steps, his aide said.

"This is a classic insurgency tactic, to hide when the troops are around and then reappear when the troops are gone," the aide said. "This is very much understood by the government and by the prime minister, and measures are being taken to make it a failure."

A Mahdi Army neighborhood leader from the Dakhil area of Baghdad's Sadr City slum, Ahmed Khawam, said the militias are not making major preparations for the security plan because they do not know what it will entail.

"As for targeting our city, by God's will, this will not happen, because the Imam Mahdi's army is in control of the whole area," he said. "But in case anything happens, we will get ready. We will not let any arrests take place."

For now, he said, the Mahdi Army is primarily concerned with providing services -- food, cooking gas, religion lessons -- to the impoverished people of Sadr City.

Another Mahdi Army member in Sadr City, Laith Abu Baqir, said he is willing to give the Iraqi security forces a chance to impose order and protect his neighborhood. "If they provide security for me from the terrorists, why not?"

"The only threat we have is from the American army," Abu Baqir said. "As for the others, we are not concerned."

North Iraq City Could Be A New Front (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

KIRKUK, Iraq — American officials, regional leaders and local residents are increasingly worried that this oil-rich city in northern Iraq could develop into a third front in the country's civil war just as increased numbers of U.S. troops arrive in Baghdad and Al Anbar province as reinforcement for battles there.

Al-Qaida-linked fighters have recently surfaced here, launching a wave of lethal attacks, U.S. and Iraqi officials say. The attacks come amid a rise in communal tensions in the months before a referendum on the status of the city and the surrounding province.

Meanwhile, Kurdish bureaucrats are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs.

Elsewhere in Iraq, Sunni and Shiite Muslim Arabs are locked in a bitter civil war. Here, the two groups have common cause against the Kurds, a non-Arab minority group that dominates Iraq's far-northern provinces.

The Kurds, Arabs and members of a third minority group, the Turkmens, each want control of this city and its surrounding region. At stake are land, water and control of some of Iraq's richest oil reserves.

None of the groups want war, they say. Yet everyone here appears to be preparing for it.

"They are right when they call it a time bomb," said Sheik Abdel Rahman Obeidi, a prominent Sunni Arab leader in Kirkuk. "We will not leave, and we will not let anyone take Kirkuk. We are ready to fight. We hope we won't have to, but we're ready."

Kurdish leaders, in turn, warn that they will take the city by law or by force.

"People don't have any more patience," said Kurdish Councilman Rebwar Faiq Talabani, sitting inside Kirkuk's heavily fortified provincial council building. "They are telling the government, 'If you can't get our rights back, we'll do it by ourselves.' "

Neighboring countries, especially Turkey and Iran, fear that if the Kurds do gain control of Kirkuk, Iraq's Kurdish region, which is already semiautonomous, would have the confidence and economic power to move toward independence. That could embolden Kurdish militants in the surrounding countries and further destabilize the region. In recent weeks, Turkish officials have threatened to intervene if the Kurds take over Kirkuk and have warned against efforts to change the city's population balance.

"Turkey cannot stand idly by, watching the efforts to change the demographic structure of Kirkuk," Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said last month, according to the Cihan News Agency.

Against this backdrop of ethnic, political and regional tensions, Iraq's new constitution mandates that a referendum be held by the end of this year on control of Kirkuk. If the vote goes ahead as scheduled, most analysts expect the Kurds to win.

Last year, at least 325 people were killed and 1,390 wounded in this city of about 1 million. During the first three weeks of this year, bombings and assassinations left 23 dead and injured 102, local police say.

"We expect increased violence when we get closer to" the referendum, said Maj. Gen. Anwar Mohammed Amin, the top Iraqi commander in Kirkuk.

The emergence of fighters from two radical Islamic groups with ties to al-Qaida after years of lying low is especially troublesome, officials say. The groups, known as Ansar al Sunna and the Islamic Army in Iraq, have launched a bombing campaign targeting politicians and civilians. Their aim is to foment violence between ethnic and sectarian groups much as they have done in Baghdad and elsewhere, officials say.

Painting Iraq's Sunni Arab guerrillas as al-Qaida associates serves Kurds in their goal of taking control of Kirkuk and its environs by making the aims of their rivals seem less legitimate.

DOJ_NMG_0125571

Assassinations, bombings and attacks on Kurdish parties' headquarters by Shiite militias and Sunni groups linked to al-Qaida "are now all part of Kirkuk's violent landscape," said a report last month from the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Turkmen and Arab politicians, too, have been targeted in apparent retaliation by Kurds.

"Kirkuk is as likely as Baghdad to produce a calamity that can fracture Iraq," the report's authors wrote, recommending a delay of the referendum. The International Crisis Group, a nonprofit think tank based in Belgium, and the U.S. government's bipartisan Iraq Study Group have also recommended postponement.

But for Kurds, this year presents a historic opportunity they won't part with willingly.

Once a distant dream carried in the heart of Kurdish peshmerga fighters as they battled onetime Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's army in the mountains, full independence is now tantalizingly within reach.

If the timetable leading to the referendum is not followed, Kirkuk will be thrust into chaos, said Talabani, the provincial councilman. "It will be a civil war," he said. "Worse than Baghdad, because it will be a battle of ethnicities."

For nationalist Arabs and minority Turkmen, meanwhile, Kurdish appropriation of Kirkuk would signify the first step toward Iraq's disintegration. Turkmen do not want to become part of an independent Kurdistan, but they don't want to be controlled by Baghdad either. Most Arabs want to remain part of a unified Iraq.

As both sides maneuver for the coming referendum, the issue of who has the right to vote is emerging as a major flashpoint.

In 1957, the year of Kirkuk's last reliable census, Turkmen made up 40 percent of the population, while Kurds made up 35 percent, Arabs 24 percent and Christians 1 percent. In the surrounding province, Kurds constituted a majority with 55 percent of the inhabitants.

During the 1970s, however, Saddam forcibly removed 250,000 Kurds from Kirkuk, giving their property to Arabs in an effort to "Arabize" the city and its oil. Many of the new residents were Shiites moved here from villages in the south of Iraq.

Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, the demographics have shifted again. Thousands of Arabs and Turkmen have left because of political pressure and violence. And as many as 350,000 Kurds have come to Kirkuk, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. In dilapidated camps throughout the city, thousands of Kurds now wait for property claims to be resolved while Kurdish officials complain that the government in Baghdad is slowing the process.

The Kurds want Arabs who moved here under Saddam to return to the south, and are pushing through little-noticed administrative decisions that will take away the voting rights of tens of thousands of Arabs before the referendum.

Kurdish officials have recently proposed a cash incentive to Arabs, compensation of about $19,000 to each family who will give up their property and voting rights in the city. The tens of thousands of Arabs affected would be allowed to stay but would not be able to vote on Kirkuk's future, Kurdish officials said.

"I don't believe they have the right to vote in the referendum," said Adnan Mufti, the powerful speaker of Kurdistan's regional parliament. Even Arabs born in Kirkuk to parents who came from the south will be ineligible, he said. "It's the mistake of their fathers."

Arabs and Turkmen accuse Kurdish politicians of gerrymandering and administrative jiu-jitsu.

"Many of the Kurds who returned to Kirkuk are not the original residents of the city," said Abass Ahmed, a 60-year-old Turkman. "They are actually Kurds from other Kurdish regions."

Because of the demographic shifts and the Sunni Arab boycott of the 2005 election, Arabs already have little representation in the city. Kurds control 26 of the 41 provincial council seats as well as the army, police and intelligence services in the city.

"We are all arming ourselves," a politician from Kirkuk recently told the International Crisis Group. "We are afraid. There is talk of civil war. Anything could start it."

A special correspondent in Sulimaniyah contributed to this report.

U.S. Tries To Put Its Best Foot Forward In Kirkuk Province (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

A U.S. Army colonel danced the debka at a garden party in this rural village last month, hand in hand with half a dozen former Kurdish guerrillas.

They were a study in contrasts: Col. Patrick Stackpole with crisp fatigues and a blond buzz cut, pistol strapped to his thigh, stomping along with swarthy peshmerga fighters with thick black mustaches, baggy shirwal pants and Muslim prayer beads.

Stackpole's soldiers, based in nearby Kirkuk, joined in or sat cradling automatic rifles as a military interpreter explained the dual purpose of the dance.

"They do it for a wedding or a ceremony, something like that," he said. "Or when they want to go to war."

DOJ_NMG_0125572

Resource-rich Kirkuk and its surrounding province are prized by Iraq's various ethnic groups and could soon become another full-blown battleground in the widening civil war. The rolling hills produce 40% of the country's oil and 70% of its natural gas.

This year, Kirkuk residents face landmark votes that military experts say could spark sectarian violence: on how to draw provincial borders, and whether to conduct a census and join the semiautonomous Kurdish regional government.

The party Stackpole attended was held on land that had been seized from a Kurdish family and settled by Shiite Muslims. The property recently was returned to the original owners. Nearby, dozens of other Kurdish refugees are camped out in some of Saddam Hussein's former forts.

Goal of stabilizing area

Stackpole and his troops are attempting to forestall violence with a hearts-and-minds campaign that includes reaching out to both Kurds and Arabs, doling out reconstruction money and reinforcing political parties. And dancing.

"Never in my life did I think I would see a brigade commander from an infantry unit doing this," said Army Maj. Frank Strong, a burly reservist from McLean, Va., before joining the dance party.

The fete in this town, population 20,000, was orchestrated by a politician who has been one of the most receptive to U.S. overtures — provincial council Chairman Rizgar Ali Hamajan.

The Americans are counting on Hamajan, a Kurd and former peshmerga, to hold Kirkuk's provincial council together. Arab and Turkmen politicians are boycotting the council, citing a list of grievances.

Hamajan meets with them privately to sign off on legislation and the local budget. This month, Hamajan is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, President Jalal Talabani, who is Kurdish, and the country's two vice presidents to discuss the upcoming votes, mandated by Iraq's new constitution.

During the party, Hamajan explained to Stackpole why he needed more reconstruction money. Sunni Arab insurgents are scaring off workers and investors, he said.

"We need to have opportunities for young people other than doing bad things, so they have someplace to go; not just the imam from Mosul coming to teach them bad things," Hamajan said as the electricity flickered off and on. "We may have lost the older generation, but we need to work with the younger generation."

Discussion over dumplings

As they sat down to lunch at two long tables laden with freshly grilled lamb kebabs, grilled bass, kifta meat dumplings, bulgur wheat and rice sprinkled with paprika, Hamajan said he was not optimistic that violence could be controlled in Kirkuk. After Hussein's execution in December, he said, attacks by Sunni insurgents started to increase.

"Now, it is chaos in Iraq," Hamajan said. He began eating with his hands; Stackpole followed suit.

After lunch, as the military guests piled back into their Humvees for the convoy back to their base, they pronounced the party an exceptional occasion, a rare chance to speak freely with politicians and learn something about local culture.

Stackpole, who would be taunted mercilessly back at the base about his prowess on the dance floor, declared it "a history lesson of sorts."

Sunnis, Shiites Plan To Form 2 Legislative Blocs (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim lawmakers announced plans Wednesday to form two new blocs in Iraq's parliament they hope will break away from the ethnic and religious mold of current alliances and ease sectarian strife.

But while both blocs said they hope eventually to draw in members of all ethnic and religious groups, one initially will be made up entirely of Shiite politicians and the other of Sunnis.

Moderate politicians across the sectarian divide have voiced mounting frustration at parliament's seeming impotence in the face of escalating violence that killed at least 32 Iraqis and injured dozens Wednesday. The U.S. military announced the deaths of three soldiers and one U.S. Marine in fighting north and west of the capital.

A group of mostly independent legislators in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite faction, said that within days they will launch a new "Solidarity bloc" intended to be a voice of moderation within parliament's largest political formation.

Members hope to appeal "to Iraqis' patriotism and not their sect or ethnicity," said Shatha Moussawi, one of Solidarity's founding members.

Organizers claimed the support of at least 10 of the UIA's 128 legislators, but said others had expressed interest in joining them. For now, the group plans to remain within the alliance. But members said they would reach out to representatives of other ethnic and religious blocs and could unite with them in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0125573

On the Sunni side, a number of independent lawmakers said they had already broken away from the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament with 44 members. The new "Gathering of Independent Iraqis" is lead by Abid Mutlaq Jabouri, a former major general in Saddam Hussein's army, said Abdullah Eskandar, another founding member.

"We were hoping that the major blocs like the Accordance, the UIA and Kurdish alliance would get us out of this crisis we are facing, but these groups have also turned to sectarianism," Eskandar said. "We are trying to break out of these alliances in order to serve the interests of Iraqis."

He claimed the support of more than 10 Sunni lawmakers, but said the group hopes to become a major opposition party drawing in representatives of other communities.

Disputes both within and between the main blocs have paralyzed parliament for months, blocking final legislation governing key issues such as the division of responsibilities between Iraq's central government and provinces, the re-integration of former members of Saddam's regime into the government and security forces, and the distribution of the country's massive oil wealth.

U.S. officials had urged Iraqi politicians to look beyond their traditional formations in hopes of isolating more extreme leaders such as anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls one of the two largest groups in the leading Shiite alliance and is backed by a powerful militia often blamed in the sectarian violence.

But members of both new blocs insisted U.S. officials had nothing to do with their ventures.

"I really hate that question," said Qassim Daoud, a member of the coming Solidarity bloc. "Our allegiance is to Iraq and the Iraqi people."

Meanwhile, Iraqi officials released new details about an obscure messianic sect they said had been poised to attack Shiite clergy and religious sites in Najaf when it was decimated Sunday in an offensive by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Brig. Gen. Qais Mamoory, chief of the Babil provincial police force, told reporters that members of the Heaven's Army cult led by Dhyaa Abdul-Zahra, a charismatic man in his 30s, had infiltrated Iraq's security forces and were able to bring advanced weapons into their compound.

"It seemed that they prepared themselves well, and it seemed that they received training outside Iraq," Mamoory said.

The sect's gunmen were organized into snipers and attackers, who fought under the slogan "Victory or Martyrdom," he said.

"They surprised our forces in Najaf and they captured some of our troops and vehicles," he said.

But members of the elite Scorpion force freed 20 of them and retrieved five bodies, he said.

Most of the cult's 1,000 to 1,500 followers came from Kut, Diwanyia and Hillah, he said. They apparently hoped to establish an emirate under another cult leader, Ahmed Alagh, identified by police as an advocate of their Wahhabi of Sunni Islam practiced by al-Qaida. But literature viewed by a journalist inside the compound dismissed both Sunni and Shiite teachings. Abdul-Zahra and Alagh were believed to be killed in the fighting.

At least 2,067 Iraqis were killed in insurgent and sectarian violence in January, according to figures compiled by the ministries of health, defense and health.

The heaviest toll in Wednesday's violence was inflicted in Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi forces are promising to clear out Sunni Arab insurgents and sectarian militias in a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep.

A car bomb exploded in a downtown street where a crowd was waiting to catch minibus taxis to areas of Shiite Muslim-dominated east Baghdad. At least five people were killed and 12 injured, police said.

A car bomb in a mostly Shiite neighborhood of the capital and mortar attacks on a mostly Sunni area killed at least eight people and injured 28 more.

One U.S. soldier was killed and another injured in combat Wednesday in Salahuddin province, U.S. command said. Two more soldiers and a Marine were reported killed the previous day in al-Anbar province.

At least 3,084 U.S. personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Times special correspondents in Baghdad, Baqouba, Mosul, Najaf and Hillah contributed to this report.

U.S. Agency Finds New Waste And Fraud In Iraqi Rebuilding Projects (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 31 — A federal oversight agency reported Wednesday that despite nearly $108 billion that had been budgeted for the reconstruction of Iraq since the 2003 invasion, the country's electrical output and oil production were still below prewar levels and stocks of gasoline and kerosene had plummeted to their lowest levels in at least two years.

The United States alone has accounted for nearly $38 billion of the rebuilding money, according to the agency, the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction.

Even as the flow of reconstruction money from the United States is coming to an end, the litany of major American contractors that are suspected of having wasted large amounts of the money has lengthened, new investigations by the inspector general have found.

One of the reports released on Wednesday found that an American company, DynCorp, appeared to act almost independently of its contracting officers at the Department of State at times, billing the United States for millions of dollars of work that was never authorized and starting other jobs before they were requested.

The findings of misconduct against the company, on a $188 million job order to build living quarters and purchase weapons and equipment for the Iraqi police as part of a training program, were serious enough that the inspector general's office began a fraud inquiry.

"As a result of that audit, matters meriting investigation were uncovered," Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who is in charge of the office, said on Wednesday.

Mr. Bowen declined to give further details but said that he was also initiating a countrywide review of DynCorp's work in Iraq. The company has also received major contracts to train police in Afghanistan.

Gregory Lagana, a DynCorp spokesman, said the company would investigate the report's findings. "We are looking into the issues raised by the inspector general with the goal of providing as full an accounting as possible," Mr. Lagana said. "We believe we acted responsibly and with all due concern for the expenditure of public funds."

One major investigation begun by Mr. Bowen's office came to an end on Monday when Robert J. Stein Jr., a former Pentagon contractor who confessed to stealing millions of dollars in a bribery and fraud scheme in the southern Iraqi city of Hilla in 2004, was sentenced to nine years in federal prison.

But Mr. Bowen said Wednesday that his office had 80 active investigations of potential criminal activity in Iraq. Some 23 cases have been handed over to the Justice Department, "and they are making progress on those," he said.

The latest reports by Mr. Bowen's office appear to show that it is not for lack of money that the performance of Iraq's basic infrastructure has fallen to disastrous levels in some cases; if anything, the rebuilding program seems to have been given more money than it has been able to use to any effect.

In a sweeping breakout of financing sources, one analysis, in a quarterly report released Wednesday, shows that Congress has now passed eight bills that have provided $38.2 billion for the rebuilding effort, while Iraq itself has dedicated $50.5 billion to the effort. International donors have pledged $15.2 billion, although only a small portion of that has so far materialized.

One example of the problems Iraq has faced in using those enormous amounts of money can be seen in connection with the $24.8 billion in Iraqi money that the Iraqi government has appropriated for the capital budget of its ministries from 2004 to 2007 — in essence, a homegrown reconstruction budget.

Despite the threadbare state of the oil, electricity, water, transportation and communications infrastructure here, the ministries managed to spend as little as 15 percent of those appropriated funds because of problems finding companies to do the work in dangerous places, a lack of skilled contracting officers and American-sponsored anticorruption programs that have intimidated Iraqi bureaucrats.

Iraq faces those problems as the American money begins to run out. But even though American officials have managed to spend most of this money, its lasting impact on the quality of life in Iraq is highly debatable.

Despite the allocation of more than $4 billion in American taxpayer money to electricity projects in Iraq, the nationwide electricity output recently dipped below the prewar level of about 4,200 megawatts after a brief period above it. The performance is so embarrassing to the United States that late last year, with no formal notice, the State Department eliminated the line indicating prewar output from its weekly report on electricity production in Iraq.

After a rally in the middle of 2006, the inspector general's quarterly report shows, Iraq's crude oil production has also been steadily slipping, a serious concern because oil is the basis of the Iraqi economy.

Al Qaeda 2006: Fighting In Iraq, Regrouping In Afghanistan, Enlisting In Europe (CSM)

By Carol Huang

The Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 2007

In 2006, agents of Al Qaeda, as well as those inspired by its ideology, continued their attacks. Violence in Iraq intensified, and Afghanistan saw its most violent year since 2001.

Despite worsening chaos on those fronts, counterterrorist forces arrested and killed high-profile terrorists and kept the West free from attack. But these actions don't appear to have weakened the appeal of Al Qaeda's agenda. "Home-grown" militants around the world joined its jihad, as regional fighting heightened perceptions of a global war on Islam.

Here's an assessment of some of the most significant gains and losses for Al Qaeda last year:

Afghanistan

DOJ_NMG_0125575

Terrorism experts say that militant jihadists shifted focus to the original Al Qaeda base to utilize experience and tactics gained in Iraq – as reflected in the increase in suicide bombings from 27 in 2005 to 139 in 2006, according to US estimates. Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and his No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the border region between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Algeria

Algeria's Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat declared an alliance with Al Qaeda in September.

Britain

In August, authorities foiled a terrorist plot with all the hallmarks of an Al Qaeda attack. British security arrested dozens of suspects whom they allege were participating in a plan to bomb up to 10 passenger flights from England to the US.

But Europe's major problem in 2006, experts say, was "home-grown terrorism." Britain's spy chief, Eliza Manningham-Buller, warned in November that the security service MI5 was "working to contend with some 200 groupings or networks, totaling over 1,600 identified individuals."

Europe is a primary recruiting base for Al Qaeda as Muslim communities there have access to wealth and freedom of movement, says Rohan Gunaratna, author of "Inside Al Qaeda: Global Network of Terror."

Islamic militants are "busy recruiting from the Muslim diaspora," adds Paul Wilkinson, chairman of the advisory board of the Centre for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland. "It's very clear that the organization is still very much in business.... And that recruitment has been going on quite rapidly."

Egypt

An April 24 attack in a Sinai resort town was not claimed by Mr. bin Laden, but the hotel bombings had many similarities to an Al Qaeda strike. The attacks were a sign that the group's tactics have gained a foothold among other radical groups.

Indonesia

Hundreds of members of Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), a major terrorist group linked to Al Qaeda, were arrested, while more radical members split from the group in early 2006 to form Tanzim Qaedat al-Jihad. The biggest blow to counterterrorism efforts was the release of Abu Bakar Bashir from jail in June 2006 after he spent 26 months in prison. The radical Islamic cleric, who is said to lead JI, was cleared of conspiracy charges in December for his role in the 2002 Bali hotel bombings. "Indonesian counterterrorism law is gravely weak," says Mr. Gunaratna. "Abu Bakar Bashir is the leader of the most dangerous group in Southeast Asia. His group has killed more than 250 people."

Iraq

The most violent offshoot of bin Laden's global organization, Al Qaeda in Iraq, seemed to suffer a major blow in 2006 with the killing of former chief Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June.

But the loss of his leadership may have actually strengthened the group, says Gunaratna. "Zarqawi was a very able and ruthless man," he says, but "not a politician." His successor, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, "is following exactly the instructions of bin Laden and al-Zawahiri."

Al Qaeda in Iraq is small but vicious, says Gunaratna. It was linked to the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra – the impact of which ratcheted up sectarian killings in 2006.

In January, the UN said that more than 34,000 Iraqi civilians were killed last year, most in Sunni-Shiite violence that Al Qaeda is bent on fomenting.

Pakistan

In September 2006, President Pervez Musharraf arranged his most recent peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in Pakistan's remote Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the Afghan border. Mr. Musharraf's peace-brokering, critics warn, has allowed the Taliban to move freely between Afghanistan and Pakistan. John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence who is expected to be confirmed as deputy secretary of state, said that the deal is allowing Al Qaeda operatives to reorganize in the area and to cultivate "stronger operational connections and relationships that radiate outward from their leaders' secure hideout in Pakistan to affiliates throughout the Middle East, North Africa, and Europe."

Palestinian territories

In March, Israel for the first time charged two Palestinians for being members of a group possibly connected to Al Qaeda. Journalist kidnappings raised concerns that the group was infiltrating the territory or inspiring copycats.

Philippines

The Philippine military killed two top members of the Al Qaeda-linked militant group Abu Sayyaf. Military officials say that the killing of the group's leader, Khadaffy Janjalani, in September 2006, and his deputy Abu Sulaiman, who was killed in January 2007, have rendered the group ineffective. Still, US-trained Philippine soldiers continue to regularly engage Abu Sayyaf militants.

Saudi Arabia

DOJ_NMG_0125576

In February, Saudi Arabia thwarted a bombing on an oil-processing plant. Raids and gun battles throughout the country netted more than 100 suspected Al Qaeda militants, but US officials have said that the kingdom could do more to curb terrorism, including stopping the flow of militants and funds across its borders.

Somalia

In June, Islamists suspected of harboring key Al Qaeda operatives overran Mogadishu and took over most of the country except Baidoa, the seat of a weak transitional government. US-backed warlords could not stop the Union of Islamic Courts, which denies charges of ties with Al Qaeda. The country saw its first suicide bombing – which Somali officials blamed on Al Qaeda – on Sept. 19, a failed attempt to kill the interim president. The Islamists fled in the wake of an Ethiopian and Somali offensive that began Dec. 26.

USA

North America saw no Al Qaeda attacks. American security forces working around the world have seen "an awful lot of victories," says Arnaud de Borchgrave, director of the Transnational Threats Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "The CIA has carte blanche to track terrorists around the world," he says. Critics say that this has led to the use of secret prisons used to interrogate Al Qaeda suspects.

On the domestic front, officials say that they thwarted attacks on Chicago's Sears Tower and New York's transit system over the summer and arrested several people in the process – although it was unclear how serious such plans were.

Yemen

Yemen prevented bomb attacks at two oil facilities on Sept. 15 that were, according to intelligence consulting firm Stratfor, probably commissioned by Al Qaeda. Twenty-three suspected Al Qaeda fighters escaped from prison in February. The government killed or captured many of them, but officials say that those remaining may help Al Qaeda in Yemen to regroup.

The Iraq Syndrome, R.I.P. (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

After Vietnam, Americans turned inward. Having lost faith in their leadership class, many Americans grew suspicious of power politics and hesitant about projecting American might around the world.

The Vietnam syndrome was real. It lasted all of five years — the time between the fall of Saigon and the election of Ronald Reagan.

Today, Americans are disillusioned with the war in Iraq, and many around the world predict that an exhausted America will turn inward again. Some see a nation in permanent decline and an end to American hegemony. At Davos, some Europeans apparently envisioned a post-American world.

Forget about it. Americans are having a debate about how to proceed in Iraq, but we are not having a strategic debate about retracting American power and influence. What's most important about this debate is what doesn't need to be said. No major American leader doubts that America must remain, as Dean Acheson put it, the locomotive of the world.

Look at the leaders emerging amid this crisis. The two major Republican presidential contenders are John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, the most aggressive internationalists in a party that used to have an isolationist wing.

The Democrats, meanwhile, campaigned for Congress in 2006 by promising to increase the size of the military. The presidential front-runner, Hillary Clinton, is the leader of the party's hawkish wing and recently called for a surge of U.S. troops into Afghanistan. John Edwards, the most "leftward" major presidential contender, just delivered a bare-knuckled speech in which he castigated the Bush administration for not being tough enough with Iran. "To ensure that Iran never gets nuclear weapons, we need to keep all options on the table," Edwards warned.

This is not a country looking to avoid entangling alliances. This is not a country renouncing the threat of force. This is not a country looking to come home again. The Iraq syndrome is over before it even had a chance to begin.

The U.S. has no material need to reconsider its dominant role in the world. The U.S. military still has no serious rivals, even after the strains of Iraq. The economy is humming along nicely.

The U.S. has no cultural need to retrench. Vietnam sparked a broad cultural revolution, a shift in values and a loss of confidence. Iraq has not had the same effect. Many Americans have lost faith in the Bush administration and in this particular venture, but there has been no generalized loss of faith in the American system or in American goodness.

There hasn't even been a broad political shift in favor of the doves. The most important war critics are military types like Jack Murtha, Chuck Hagel and Jim Webb, who hate this particular war but were superhawks in other circumstances.

Finally, there has been no change in America's essential nature. As Robert Kagan writes in his masterful book "Dangerous Nation," America has never really been an isolationist or aloof nation. The United States has always exercised as much power as it could. It has always coupled that power with efforts to spread freedom. And Americans have always fought over how best to fulfill their mission as the vanguard of progress.

What's happening today is just another chapter in that long expansionist story. Today's debate in the Senate flows seamlessly from the history Kagan describes. Most senators agree that the tactical question of sending 20,000 more troops is not the central issue. Their core concern, they say, is finding a new grand strategy to stabilize the region.

Most senators want a much more aggressive diplomatic effort to go along with the military one. (If President Bush said his surge was part of an effort to establish a regional diplomatic conference, he'd have majority support tomorrow.) But they don't question the need for America to play a leading role. They take it for granted that the U.S. is going to be in the Middle East for a long time to come.

When you look further into the future, you see that the next president's big efforts will not be about retrenchment, but about expansion. They'll be about expanding the U.S. military, expanding the diplomatic corps, asking for more shared sacrifice, creating new interagency bureaus that will give America more nation-building capacity.

In short, the U.S. has taken its share of blows over the past few years, but the isolationist dog is not barking. The hegemon will change. The hegemon will do more negotiating. But the hegemon will live.

Pentagon Restructuring May Threaten Special Ops Oversight (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 1, 2007

A major reorganization of the Pentagon's policy shop is raising concerns among defense authorizers, who say the move could dilute the efficacy of a congressionally mandated civilian office tasked with oversight and support of special operations.

A report addressing lawmakers' concerns about the overhaul of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense for Policy is due today to Congress, and a Pentagon spokeswoman said the report is ready and will be delivered by deadline. Several sources, however, have indicated that the report may be delayed because of a long approval process.

The reorganization is meant to bring the office into line with the U.S. military's need to respond to transnational threats, manage international military coalitions and equip partner nations to fight terrorists. The report is expected to address congressional concerns that policy office leadership so far has been unable to alleviate despite several meetings on the Hill.

"We are less certain about the reorganization," a congressional source said. "Each briefing from [the Pentagon] makes us less comfortable." The source added that policy shop leadership may be casting doubt on its own plan by saying it will be implemented on a one-year trial basis and then re-evaluated.

As part of the overhaul, the restructuring of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Special Operations and Low Intensity Conflict (SO/LIC) could face opposition from the armed services panels, which initially mandated the office's creation. The position was included as part of the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act, which also created the United States Special Operations Command.

The Special Operations Command (SOCOM) oversees each military service's elite warriors, such as the Army's Green Berets, Rangers and Delta Forces, Navy SEALs and Air Force special operators.

The assistant secretary's office, which is run by civilians with extensive special-operations background, was created to ensure that the special-operations forces would receive the attention and resources from the Pentagon deemed necessary by Congress.

Because the Pentagon is keeping SO/LIC as an office rather than eliminating it, it is unclear what members could do legislatively to prevent the office's expanded portfolio.

So far, lawmakers are inclined to listen. Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), chairman of the Armed Services Emerging Threats and Capabilities subcommittee, is planning to meet in the coming days with Ryan Henry, the principal deputy undersecretary of defense for policy and one of the architects of the reorganization.

"We created the position for SO/LIC and we want to go back and see whether these changes are justified," Reed told The Hill. "Certain aspects of the reorganization require some discussion and the whole point is to ask questions."

In the past, under the leadership of Thomas O'Connell, the SO/LIC office oversaw several functions, such as special operations/combating terrorism, counter-narcotics, information operations and so-called stability operations.

Part of the reorganization required congressional approval of a 10th assistant secretary of defense to oversee a new office of global security affairs.

The assistant secretary of defense for global security affairs is taking on the responsibility of overseeing counter-narcotics operations that previously had been under SO/LIC, as well as several other functions such as detainee affairs and security cooperation operations.

DOJ_NMG_0125578

For SO/LIC, the overhaul means that the office now would be called SO/LIC Interdependent Capabilities and would oversee special operations, strategic capabilities (nuclear and missile issues), stability operations and forces transformation and resources.

While Congress approved the creation of a 10th assistant secretary of defense to facilitate the reorganization of the policy shop, defense authorizers had some critical questions about the role played by SO/LIC.

Defense authorizers are worried that strategic capabilities (i.e., nuclear and missile issues) require a different skill set and knowledge base and could result in an overall dilution of the statutory mission of the assistant secretary of defense for SO/LIC, which is to supervise special operations and low-intensity conflict activities.

Moreover, authorizers wrote in the report to the 2007 defense authorization bill that moving strategic capabilities away from the office responsible for chemical and biological weapons would affect coordination.

Also, yet another skill set would be needed to oversee transformation. “Placing such responsibilities under the ASD for SOLIC/IC would further divert focus from the statutory mission of this ASD,” said the report.

The reorganization may also place the commander of SOCOM in a complicated position.

Although SOCOM by virtue of its covert nature does not welcome much oversight, the lack of a civilian advocate on the Hill and in the Pentagon could detract from Gen. Doug Brown’s responsibility as SOCOM commander.

The Afghanistan Surge (WP)

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

WHILE THE country debates the Bush administration's "surge" of American troops into Baghdad, a similar American buildup has begun in Afghanistan. As in Iraq, it comes in response to rapidly escalating violence, and in Afghanistan, too, one question is whether the reinforcements are too little or too late.

By extending the deployment of a brigade of the 10th Mountain Division even as the 82nd Airborne begins to arrive, the Pentagon will bring the U.S. troop level to 24,000. That's 50 percent more than at this time last year and about six times the number of American soldiers who were in Afghanistan at the time of the battle for Tora Bora, in early 2002. The administration, led by Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, stoutly resisted calls for expanding either U.S. or allied forces then. Let the record show: They were terribly wrong. Successful wars begin with a large troop deployment that tapers off as objectives are accomplished and security is restored. In Afghanistan U.S. troop levels started at rock bottom and have steadily risen over the past five years, even as security has worsened.

By most measures, there are still far fewer Afghan and foreign troops than are needed to secure the country. With the increase, the total number of U.S., NATO and other allied troops will be around 45,000, while there are about 40,000 soldiers in the new Afghan army. By contrast there are 146,000 coalition troops in Iraq in advance of the surge, and 134,000 Iraqi army troops. Yet Afghanistan is 50 percent larger than Iraq and has a larger population. What's more, many NATO troops in Afghanistan are constrained by their governments from fighting or even deploying in the areas where the Taliban insurgency is based. Only 80 percent of the troops requested by NATO commanders have been dispatched, and there are shortages of vital equipment such as helicopters.

The relative good news is that the administration is making a significant effort to correct a situation that, though deteriorating, remains far better than that in Iraq. In addition to the extra forces, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced last week that the White House would seek $10.6 billion in new funding for Afghanistan in the upcoming supplemental budget -- a huge addition to the $14 billion in aid that has been spent since 2001. Most of the new money would go toward a big expansion of the Afghan army and police, which would gain 150,000 new personnel, but $2 billion would be used for aid projects in a country where millions of people have yet to see any benefit from the government that replaced the Taliban.

The effort deserves support from Congress. But it's likely to fall short unless other NATO countries are willing to similarly increase their commitments. Though Britain, Canada and the Netherlands carried the burden of the war in southern Afghanistan last year, Germany, France, Italy and Spain are among the countries that have kept their soldiers away from the war zone and tied them down with restrictions. The European Union has pledged just $780 million in aid for Afghanistan over the next four years. Ms. Rice now leads a U.S. campaign to round up more allied commitments over the next several weeks. She can only hope the belated but essential American escalation will give her some leverage.

DOJ:

Top US Prosecutors ‘forced Out’ (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

DOJ_NMG_0125579

Financial Times, February 1, 2007

Democratic senators are fighting to halt what they say is a Bush administration campaign to remove forcibly top federal prosecutors, including the US attorneys responsible for key investigations of Congressional corruption and stock options back-dating.

Senator Patrick Leahy, the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee, will hold a hearing next week on whether the justice department is politicising the hiring and firing of top federal prosecutors.

Thirteen of the 93 US attorneys have left since the March 2006 passage of a little-noticed amendment to the Patriot Act that – in effect – allows President George W. Bush to install top prosecutors without Senate confirmation.

Departing attorneys include Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, who was leading the probes of stock options at Apple, and Carol Lam of San Diego, who prosecuted Republican congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham and was investigating a politically connected defence contractor.

Democrats say those two as well as US attorneys in New Mexico, Arizona, Arkansas, Washington State and Nevada have been forced out. Mr Ryan has said he left as a result of a "mutually agreeable decision with Washington".

Alberto Gonzales, the attorney-general, denied that the Bush administration was trying to circumvent Senate confirmation. Justice department officials said on Wednesday they would seek Senate confirmation for all replacement attorneys.

Traditionally, the justice department sets policy but the US attorneys have significant discretion in deciding which cases to investigate and prosecute.

The president names US attorneys but permanent US attorneys must be confirmed by the Senate. Until last year, "interim" replacements could serve 120 days and then generally had to seek approval from a state's federal judges to stay on.

However, during 11th-hour negotiations over the re-authorisation of the Patriot Act, Republican Senator Arlen Specter added an amendment that allows the president to make interim appointments that can last indefinitely.

Recently, turnover among US attorneys has been unusual. Although US attorneys serve at the president's pleasure – and are routinely asked to submit resignations when an administration changes – it is unusual for so many to leave at the same time during midterm.

California Senator Dianne Feinstein has introduced a bill to return to the old system. Mr Leahy is a co-sponsor and the Judiciary Committee will consider it as early as next week.

Interim U.S. Attorney For Ariz. Named (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, February 1, 2007

The Department of Justice, dodging recommendations from Arizona's two U.S. senators, has named veteran federal prosecutor Daniel Knauss as interim U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona.

Republican Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl had recommended Diane Humetewa, an assistant U.S. attorney and member of the Hopi tribe, for the position vacated by Paul Charlton.

In a news release, the Justice Department announced Wednesday that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales had appointed Knauss, a chief assistant in charge of the U.S. attorney's satellite office in Tucson.

advertisement

Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which must confirm permanent candidates, responded: "Daniel Knauss is a quality lawyer and will make an excellent interim U.S. Attorney. . . . It's our hope that eventually Diane Humetewa will be nominated by the president."

Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office for Arizona, stressed that Knauss' appointment is a temporary measure. He said President Bush has yet to nominate a candidate for Senate approval, and Humetewa is not excluded from that process.

Candidates recommended by senators typically win such assignments, but the attorney general has authority to appoint interim administrators as he sees fit.

Knauss, a 34-year employee of the federal prosecutor's office in Arizona, also filled in as boss during 1993 after the resignation of Linda Akers. His temporary appointment at the time angered Sen. Dennis DeConcini, who had nominated Janet Napolitano for the job, though she was not then a federal prosecutor.

Napolitano later received President Clinton's permanent nomination and served as U.S. attorney before winning elections as Arizona's attorney general, and then governor.

Over the years, Knauss has held three of the most important posts at the U.S. Attorney's Office: first assistant, chief assistant and head of the Criminal Section.

"He will bring a consistency to the office that is critical to its mission and personnel during this transition," Hornbuckle said.

Knauss' assignment comes amid a controversy over the forced resignations of several U.S. attorneys around the nation. Some Democratic lawmakers, who say Gonzales has targeted chief prosecutors for political reasons, plan to conduct a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on the issue Tuesday. They also complain that the Bush administration is abusing a provision in the USA Patriot Act that allows Gonzales to make interim appointments without congressional confirmation.

Charlton announced his resignation last month, saying he was shifting to private legal practice. He has not commented on speculation that he was directed to quit.

Although the nation's 63 U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the attorney general, resignations generally occur after four-year terms are completed.

Federal Judge Won't Seek U.S. Attorney Post In Los Angeles (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

Dickran Tevrizian, a leading candidate for the L.A. post, is said to have withdrawn his name.

Longtime federal judge Dickran M. Tevrizian has withdrawn his name from consideration as the next U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, it was learned Wednesday.

Though Tevrizian declined to comment, others in the legal community said the 66-year-old jurist had recently notified a search committee for the Justice Department that he no longer was a candidate for the job.

Only days ago, Tevrizian, a U.S. District Court judge, was viewed as one of the leading candidates for the position, which has jurisdiction over federal prosecutions in a seven-county area.

But Tuesday, the judge told attorneys in a case before him that he would not pursue the post, a lawyer said.

"Basically he said he wasn't that interested in the job and had put his name in consideration because others had asked him to," said attorney Dale Rubin.

Rubin is representing one of two men facing the death penalty in Tevrizian's court for a kidnapping and murder rampage.

One day before Tevrizian's disclosure, attorneys for the two defendants had asked him to recuse himself because of the possibility that he might soon be running the very office prosecuting the case, Rubin said.

"It is not that he is biased," Rubin said.

"It was just the appearance of impropriety we were trying to avoid," the attorney said.

Tevrizian referred the motion to another judge for a decision, Rubin said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Broadband Convictions Overturned (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

Judge Overturns Convictions of Enron Broadband Executive

HOUSTON (AP) -- Just days before he was set to be sentenced, a former Enron Corp. executive's fraud and conspiracy convictions related to the company's broadband unit were overturned Wednesday by a federal judge.

Former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard was convicted in May on five counts of fraud, conspiracy and falsifying records after a monthlong trial. Howard had been set to be sentenced Monday.

Former in-house accountant Michael Krautz was acquitted of the same charges in the same trial. Both men were accused of participating in a small piece of the fraud that brought down Enron in 2001.

On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore vacated the convictions on all five counts Howard had been found guilty of, saying in a 19-page ruling the convictions were tied to a flawed legal theory prosecutors used to explain the fraud and conspiracy charges.

Gilmore based her decision on a ruling in August in which the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's 1999 sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage to help the energy trader appear to have met earnings targets.

The appeals court found fault with the government's arguments of criminal liability and deprivation of honest services.

Gilmore said the decision in the Merrill Lynch case compelled her to vacate Howard's convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0125581

"An important tenet of our criminal justice system is that a defendant is innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt," Gilmore wrote in her ruling. "When it is uncertain whether a defendant was convicted under an appropriate standard, the integrity of the judicial system is undermined."

Jack Zimmermann, one of Howard's attorneys, said his client was gratified with Gilmore's ruling.

"Kevin Howard has maintained faith in the system," he said.

Howard and Krautz were the first of five broadband executives to be retried in separate cases after the original trial of the entire group ended in a hung jury in 2005. Although Enron was primarily an energy trader, the broadband unit was created in 1998 as another growth engine during the dot-com boom.

Howard was accused of conspiring to manufacture earnings for the failing broadband unit in late 2000 by selling an interest in future revenue of a video-on-demand venture that never made a profit. Prosecutors alleged the deal, "Project Braveheart," was a sham because investors were promised to be bought out at a premium, making the sale a disguised loan.

Zimmermann, who defended Howard with attorney Jim Lavine, said prosecutors could still decide to retry him for a third time. A hearing in the case was set for Feb. 20.

"We would hope the government would carefully evaluate their options and decide a third trial is not in the best interests of the taxpayers and the government anymore than it is in the interests of Mr. Howard," Zimmermann said.

A representative from the Justice Department did not immediately return a telephone call Wednesday evening seeking comment.

Prosecutors had conceded the four fraud and conspiracy counts against Howard should have been vacated because of the flawed legal theory.

But they had contended the falsifying records count should remain because trial evidence had proved that through his participation in Project Braveheart, Howard had directly "caused the falsification of Enron's earnings and therefore of its books and records."

Gilmore said she didn't believe such evidence was presented at trial that would have compelled the jury to find Howard guilty of falsifying records without relying on the other flawed counts.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Judge Throws Out A Conviction In Enron Case (NYT)

By Kate Murphy

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 31 — A federal judge in Houston on Wednesday threw out the conviction of Kevin A. Howard, the former chief financial officer for Enron's Broadband unit, citing a ruling in a similar case in which the jury's verdict was vacated.

The decision was based on a ruling in August by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, that essentially exonerates employees who provide so-called honest services while keeping with corporate goals and do not rob their employers of any money.

"We are very pleased," Mr. Howard's lawyer, Jack Zimmerman, said.

The first trial against Mr. Howard lasted three months in 2005 and ended in a hung jury. He was tried along with five other Broadband employees. His conviction on five charges of conspiracy and fraud occurred during a retrial last year.

His only co-defendant in the second trial was Michael W. Krautz, Enron Broadband's former accountant, who was acquitted of all charges because the jury contended he was only following orders.

In a 19-page decision filed on Wednesday, Judge Vanessa Gilmore of Federal District Court said her ruling matched the Fifth Circuit's in another Enron fraud case involving Merrill Lynch and Nigerian barges.

In that case, the appeals court overturned several convictions against four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage firm in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets.

The court said the government did not prove that defendants had deprived the company of "honest services."

Federal prosecutors had conceded that four of the five convictions against Mr. Howard should be dropped because of the Fifth Circuit's opinion but held that the fifth, for falsifying records, should stand. The judge disagreed because the jury could have relied on the convictions on the other counts to determine his guilt on the final charge.

"Kevin's a very happy man," Mr. Zimmerman said. "We've always told him to have faith in the legal system."

The government can now either accept the ruling, appeal or retry Mr. Howard a third time using a different argument.

"I've learned a long time ago not to anticipate what the government will do," Mr. Zimmerman said.

DOJ_NMG_0125582

A spokesmen for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra said, "We are reviewing our options," but declined to comment further.

Two former Enron Broadband executives, Kenneth Rice and Kevin Hannon, pleaded guilty in 2004 and testified in both of Mr. Howard's trials. They are awaiting sentencing.

Mr. Howard's co-defendants in the first trial — Joseph Hirko, F. Scott Yeager and Rex Shelby — are awaiting retrial.

Mr. Shelby's lawyer, Edwin Tomko, said that while he was pleased with today's decision, "It doesn't really help us because our cases have nothing in common."

As in Mr. Yeager's and Mr. Hirko's cases, the charges against Mr. Shelby include securities fraud, which cannot be defined as "honest services."

New Blow To A Law Firm Under Inquiry (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

A few years before he faked the theft of two works of art from his home in Brentwood, Calif., Steven G. Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist, received a personal check from a partner of the law firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad for $175,000 as an "option payment" on one of those works, Picasso's "Nude Before a Mirror."

But court documents filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles yesterday said the check was a secret payment made to Mr. Cooperman for acting as a named plaintiff in a class-action lawsuit filed by Milberg Weiss.

The government's agreement with Mr. Cooperman, contained in the documents, in which he agreed to plea guilty to a conspiracy charge, is another blow to Milberg Weiss. The law firm was indicted along with two of its partners last year by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles on charges that it participated in a scheme to make secret payments to numerous plaintiffs.

Mr. Cooperman's plea deal is the latest move by federal prosecutors, who have spent seven years investigating the firm and its tactics. Last year, another former Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, pleaded guilty to making a false declaration to a court in connection with secret payments he received from the firm, court filings state.

Still, prosecutors have been unable to bring charges against their primary targets: Milberg's co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, and William S. Lerach, who started his own firm on the West Coast in 2004. People close to the investigation say the two men are identified as "Partner A" and "Partner B," respectively, in court documents.

Mr. Cooperman, however, is a challenging witness for prosecutors. Convicted of insurance fraud in the staged theft of the artworks, Mr. Cooperman cut a deal with prosecutors in 1999, agreeing to provide them information on Milberg Weiss.

While serving a 30-month prison sentence, Mr. Cooperman committed additional crimes, which breached his cooperation agreement, the plea agreement states.

In an e-mailed statement, a lawyer for Milberg Weiss, William W. Taylor III, said Mr. Cooperman's allegations were not new and "have never been credible."

"Rewarding any witness for 'cooperation' is inherently suspect," Mr. Taylor's statement said. "To do so twice, and in the face of crimes he committed blatantly from prison, demonstrates the lack of substance and inherent unfairness of the allegations against the firm."

According to court filings, Mr. Cooperman received $6.4 million in payments from 1988 to 1999 for serving as a named plaintiff in about 70 class-action and shareholder derivative lawsuits that netted Milberg Weiss more than $133 million in fees.

To conceal the illegal kickbacks, the firm and many of its partners, according to prosecutors, made false and misleading statements in various court documents and often made payments in cash through Mr. Cooperman's lawyers.

In one case, however, Mr. Cooperman's secret payment was disguised as a false "option payment" made by "Partner A," on the Picasso "Nude Before a Mirror," court filings say. In a series of transactions involving Mr. Cooperman's brother-in-law, much of the $175,000 payment was returned to Partner A, while other payments were made to Mr. Cooperman.

A lawyer for Mr. Weiss, Benjamin Brafman, rejected any allegations of wrongdoing by his client and declared the art option agreement "100 percent legitimate," noting that Mr. Weiss is an active collector of Picasso paintings.

"He changed his mind about the painting and it's that simple," Mr. Brafman said. "It has absolutely nothing to do with the allegations in the case."

Former Lead Plaintiff's Guilty Plea May Spell Trouble For Lawyer Lerach (LAW)

By Matthew Hirsch, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 1, 2007

Superstar plaintiffs lawyer William Lerach has remained outside the reach of investigators looking at a kickback scheme at his former firm, Milberg Weiss, but a guilty plea in the case on Wednesday might change that.

Steven Cooperman, a former ophthalmologist previously convicted of insurance fraud, admitted to taking payments for serving as lead plaintiff in class actions filed by Milberg Weiss over 12 years.

Court documents filed Wednesday detail Cooperman's role and also appear to put "Partner B," long believed to be Lerach, at the heart of the lucrative kickback scheme.

Though the charging documents don't identify Lerach by name, one source close to the investigation said Wednesday, "If you look at it, there's an awful lot of facts in there about Bill Lerach."

That Cooperman has helped prosecutors build their case against Milberg Weiss is nothing new. He has been cooperating since its beginning. In fact, he's the one who first told prosecutors about the kickbacks and fingered Lerach.

The problem for the U.S. Attorney's Office has been that Cooperman has a major credibility problem. He offered to cooperate in the Milberg investigation only after he was convicted and sent to prison for orchestrating an insurance scam by claiming some fine art in his Beverly Hills home had been stolen. Because of his past, anything Cooperman could say in trial about Lerach, or anyone else linked to Milberg Weiss, could look like an attempt to escape another stint in the slammer.

But on Wednesday, Cooperman's credibility may have become less of a problem. His plea -- to conspiring with Milberg Weiss and several of its senior partners to obstruct justice and make false statements in class actions -- shows that he's not cutting a deal to get off entirely scot-free.

With the plea, he faces up to five years in prison, with three years of supervised release, plus a fine of either $250,000 or twice the amount he gained in the Milberg scheme.

Generally, a plea deal by a witness with baggage can help the government, but only if prosecutors can independently corroborate the testimony, said Jeffrey Bornstein, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney.

"Why should a jury believe a witness who admits as part of his guilty plea that he lies under oath in other proceedings?" said Bornstein, a partner at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Preston Gates Ellis.

While Cooperman's credibility may remain questionable, the detailed allegations introduced Wednesday in a 50-page charging document in U.S. v. Cooperman, CR 06-776(A), suggest prosecutors are closing in on Lerach.

Court documents filed in the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California Wednesday are rife with details about the role "Partner B" played in the alleged kickback scheme at Milberg Weiss. Among other things, prosecutors claim that "Partner B" directly paid Cooperman in cash to conceal the scheme.

Neither Lerach, of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, nor his attorney, John Keker of Keker & Van Nest, returned calls on Wednesday.

COOPERMAN COOPERATES

Cooperman first agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors in August 2000 after he was found guilty of 18 federal charges in the insurance fraud case. But, while serving time for the insurance fraud convictions, Cooperman committed unspecified "additional crimes" that breached his cooperation agreement with prosecutors, according to a release from the Central District U.S. Attorney's Office.

Cooperman's attorney, Russell Gioiella, of New York's Litman, Asche & Gioiella, confirmed Wednesday that his client was nailed by prosecutors for forging his doctors' signatures on health insurance forms while in prison for the fraud convictions.

"It was an error in judgment, but he didn't intend to or cause any financial harm to anyone," Gioiella said.

Though Cooperman's guilty plea has no explicit cooperation provision, Gioiella said his client will continue to cooperate if asked by prosecutors.

"He's been 100 percent truthful with the government as to Milberg Weiss," Gioiella said. "Nothing has changed in that respect."

Not everyone agrees that Cooperman's plea deal helps federal prosecutors in their case against Milberg.

Joseph Russoniello, who was a U.S. Attorney for eight years until 1990, said the deal might just cause more problems for the government.

"It's kind of a two-edged sword in many ways," said Cooley Godward Kronish's Russoniello. "The conviction puts the onus on a cooperating defendant to be very open, forthcoming and obviously honest, because any perjury or false statements can significantly jeopardize how the court would view [his] cooperation.

"What it does do," he continued, "is it may remove one incentive to give false testimony -- that is, to avoid prosecution -- and substitute a second motive or bias, which is to avoid a long jail term."

Cooperman isn't the first former lead plaintiff tied to Milberg Weiss to plead guilty in the conspiracy probe. Howard Vogel, a retired mortgage broker from Florida, entered a guilty plea last April, just one month before federal prosecutors in Los Angeles indicted the Milberg firm and partner David Bershad and former partner Steven Shulman.

SEC Aggressively Pursuing Options Cases, Chairman Says (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Securities and Exchange Commission's investigations of suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies are proceeding vigorously and the agency continues to work closely with federal prosecutors in pursuing cases, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said Wednesday.

``This is a very aggressive program,'' Cox told reporters.

He also said there is no disagreement among him and the four other SEC commissioners over how stringently to penalize companies found to have engaged in improper backdating of grants to executives. Cox was responding to questions about a news report that said the agency's enforcement efforts were stalled because of dissension among the commissioners over whether companies should be fined.

In addition, he said, the SEC is working ``very closely'' with the Justice Department in pursuing stock options cases.

The federal prosecutors and the SEC have filed criminal and civil charges, respectively, against former officials of two technology companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc.

Some observers have criticized the pace of the enforcement effort.

SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors.

At issue in many of the investigations is a practice known as backdating: Stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price. This fattens profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can violate federal accounting and tax laws.

Dell Chief Is Replaced By Founder (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Michael S. Dell has taken back the leadership of the computer company he founded, replacing Kevin B. Rollins after more than a year of mounting problems at Dell.

The company announced yesterday that Mr. Rollins had resigned as chief executive and as a director. Mr. Dell, who is the chairman, immediately assumed Mr. Rollins's duties as well.

The company presented the change, which had been speculated about by Wall Street analysts and industry insiders for more than a year, as a decision by the board, which met earlier this week. Sam Nunn, the former Georgia senator who is the presiding director of Dell's board, was quoted in a company release as saying: "The board believes that Michael's vision and leadership are critical to building Dell's leadership in the technology industry for the long term."

The company also said that it expected fourth-quarter revenue and earnings to fall below the consensus predictions on Wall Street. That was also not an unexpected announcement after industry analysts said several weeks ago that other PC makers had strong sales in the fourth quarter, while Dell's sales lagged.

Mr. Rollins is not entitled to severance or a pension plan. Still, he will walk away with stock options worth about $30 million that he earned during his tenure, according to earlier company filings. According to Equilar, which analyzes executive pay, Mr. Rollins earned $42 million in total direct compensation as the chief executive. A Dell spokeswoman said Mr. Rollins's departure agreement had not yet been completed.

Mr. Dell and Mr. Rollins had a close relationship, sharing an office at company headquarters in Round Rock, Tex., even after Mr. Dell turned over the chief executive job to Mr. Rollins in 2004. Mr. Rollins joined the company 10 years ago as Mr. Dell's top lieutenant and had served as a consultant to Mr. Dell for three years before that.

The question of how long Mr. Rollins would remain in the top job was asked frequently after Dell began disclosing problems, beginning in late 2005. They included slowing revenue growth and, last year, accounting problems that have spurred investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

Mr. Rollins's departure "is an expression of dissatisfaction with the current status of the company and its rate of change," said A. M. Sacconaghi, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. Wall Street seemed to applaud the news, pushing the company's shares up 3.88 percent, to $25.16, in after-hours trading.

DOJ_NMG_0125585

Mr. Dell, who founded the company in 1984, had stood steadfastly by Mr. Rollins. During a company technology conference in New York City in September, he said, “Kevin and I run the business together, so if you want to blame somebody you can blame me, too. But, more importantly, we believe we have a very strong team in our company. Kevin is obviously a key part of that, as am I.” He added that speculation about changes at the top of the company was useless, “but feel free to speculate, because everyone else does, but it’s not going to happen.”

In a brief interview yesterday after the news was announced, Mr. Dell refused to comment on what had changed, and he declined to reflect on the long relationship he had had with Mr. Rollins.

Mr. Dell said he was excited about coming back to run the company. “It feels like 1984 and I am starting over again,” he said. “Only this time I have a little more capital.”

Mr. Dell said that he intended to push the company to do more in the business of providing consulting services to its larger corporate customers. Services are a high-margin business, but the sector is currently dominated by I.B.M. and business consultants like Electronic Data Systems. Hewlett-Packard, Dell’s biggest rival in the computer business, has recently revamped its services business because it sees it as an important way to sell more hardware and software. Dell recently hired Stephen F. Schuckenbrock, an E.D.S. executive, to head its services business.

According to IDC, a market analysis firm, Hewlett-Packard’s worldwide share of the PC market increased to 18.1 percent in the fourth quarter, from 15.9 percent a year ago, while Dell’s share slipped to 14.7 percent, from 17.5 percent.

“Consulting and outsourcing would be a departure for Dell,” Mr. Sacconaghi said. But he added that it could make sense “to grow the part of the company that has twice the profit margins of the rest of the business.”

Mr. Dell did not rule out the possibility that the company would be willing to re-examine its direct-sales business model, which he developed to build the company. “It is an interesting question,” he said. “That’s where you’ll see new ideas and some experiments.”

The company recently opened two mall storefronts where Dell products are displayed. The stores do not carry inventory; products are ordered there or online for delivery later.

While the consumer market makes up only about 15 percent of Dell’s overall global business, consumer sales, particularly notebook sales in the United States, have been the strongest segment of the PC industry, growing well over 50 percent in 2006. Dell has not been particularly strong in that segment, hurting its profits.

Samir Bhavnani, research director at the electronics industry analysis firm Current Analysis, blamed Mr. Rollins for missing the industry shift to more distinctive industrial design and for cutting back customer service. The company has made a concerted effort in the last year to fix both problems.

The company “is well positioned to right the ship,” Mr. Bhavnani said.

Dell's Founder Replaces Rollins As Chief Executive (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, February 1, 2007

Jan. 31 (Bloomberg) -- Dell Inc. Chairman and founder Michael Dell reclaimed the position of chief executive officer, ousting Kevin Rollins after he lost the lead in personal computers and failed to revive earnings growth.

The shares rose 4.3 percent after the Round Rock, Texas- based company said Rollins, 54, resigned effective immediately. The decision to replace him was made earlier this week, said spokesman Bob Pearson, declining to be more specific.

The PC maker said results will miss analysts' estimates for the third time in the past four quarters. Dell already replaced his finance chief and takes over as the company struggles to regain its position as the world's largest PC maker from Hewlett-Packard Co. and faces a government probe into its accounting.

``It's a pretty big surprise,'' said Robert Lutts, president of Cabot Money Management in Salem, Massachusetts. ``They are going through some growing pains. Him coming back in might reinvigorate the company.''

Shares of Dell rose $1.04 to $25.26 in extended Nasdaq Stock Market trading. They slipped 7 cents to $24.22 at 4 p.m. today and have declined 17 percent in the past year.

`Outstanding Executive'

Dell, 41, handed the CEO title to Rollins in 2004 after building the company from his college dorm room with $1,000. He defended Rollins's leadership in recent months as the company's woes mounted, saying in September that the two ran Dell together. He described Rollins as an ``outstanding executive'' then.

``We've always been a company able to respond to challenges and opportunities,'' Dell said in prepared video remarks from the company's headquarters today. ``I'm very excited to be CEO again. I feel the same kind of energy and drive I did when we started the company in 1984.''

The company said in August that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission had been reviewing its revenue recognition and other financial reporting for a year. That review was elevated into a formal investigation in November. The U.S. Justice Department is also probing the company's accounting.

Last year, Dell missed profit forecasts for two straight quarters, reported its slowest sales growth in four years, announced the recall of 4.1 million notebook batteries and said it planned to invest $150 million to improve customer service.

Dell 2.0

In September, Rollins and Dell, after canceling an annual meeting for financial analysts, announced Dell 2.0, their plan to examine all aspects of the business and make whatever changes necessary to boost sales and profit.

``Dell 2.0 is a chance for our company to reinvent itself," Dell said. ``We have enormous assets in this company. Some of them have been hidden fairly recently -- our challenge is to bring them out."

Dell didn't provide any figures for fourth-quarter profit or sales. Analysts on average anticipated a profit of 33 cents a share on sales of $15.5 billion, according to estimates in a Bloomberg survey.

Rollins joined Dell in April 1996 after working with the company as a consultant with Bain & Co. He helped extend the direct strategy Dell pioneered in 1984, based on selling lower- priced PCs to consumers by bypassing retailers and distributors.

Dell and Rollins, who shared an office suite at the company's headquarters, streamlined production and manufacturing to be able to undercut rivals on price.

Eroding Advantages

That price advantage has eroded in the past two years as Palo Alto, California-based Hewlett-Packard adopted some of the same cost-cutting measures used by Dell to lower prices.

In the third and fourth quarter, Hewlett-Packard claimed the top spot in the PC market by tapping its retail partners to help sell low-priced notebooks to U.S. consumers.

``What changes to the strategy Michael makes is more important than him being completely in charge," said Nirav Parikh, an analyst with Los Angeles-based TCW Group Inc., which has been reducing its holdings in Dell share since last year. ``The first thing to address is profitable growth."

Rollins's departure caps a series of management changes and follows the December departure of Chief Financial Officer James Schneider, a 10-year Dell veteran. In December, the company hired a head of global services to expand one of its fastest-growing businesses and added a new chief of online sales to boost Internet orders.

This month, Dell promoted two executives to run its U.S. corporate and public sales groups after Joseph Mareng announced his retirement after a decade with the company.

``The company kind of continues to muddle along and there hasn't been a clear plan outlined," said Christopher Meeker, analyst and portfolio manager at Farr Miller & Washington LLC in Washington, which owns 350,000 Dell shares. ``We don't think it can return to the growth rates it used to have."

Sonsini Advised On Apple Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 1, 2007

When Apple Inc. tried to hammer out a new compensation agreement for iconic CEO Steve Jobs in 2001 -- an agreement now being probed by federal prosecutors -- the company called on Larry Sonsini, the lead partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

People with knowledge of the federal probe say the lawyer -- an expert on corporate governance -- was consulted by Apple's board and legal department on a 7.5 million-share grant that's become the core of the criminal probe by the Securities and Exchange Commission and San Francisco U.S. attorney's office.

Investigators have focused on the grant because a set of falsified meeting minutes was drawn up to make it appear as though the options were granted at an earlier date -- and a more favorable price -- than when the deal was actually finalized. The minutes were fabricated by a low-ranking in-house Apple lawyer, though prosecutors also have been looking over her head -- at ex-GC Nancy Heinen and Apple's former CFO, Fred Anderson.

According to people with knowledge of the investigation, Heinen discussed the options award with Sonsini between its approval by the company's board of directors and her department's completion of the paperwork.

Through a spokesperson, Sonsini declined to comment Wednesday, and people familiar with the probe wouldn't discuss what he told the lawyers at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation.

It's unclear how much Sonsini knew about the grant, including how it was accounted for.

DOJ_NMG_0125587

But for the second time in less than a year, a high-profile Silicon Valley scandal may turn on questions about the advice Sonsini did -- or didn't -- give. Just as in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom spying scandal, company officials may point to Sonsini's counsel to explain or defend their actions.

Heinen, for example, is in a position to argue that her department's role in the problematic award came on orders from the board of directors -- and perhaps Sonsini.

Such a defense would be a logical one for someone in Heinen's position, said Peter Henning, professor at Wayne State University Law School and an expert on white-collar crime. Blaming input from Sonsini and Apple's board could dissipate blame that might otherwise fall on Heinen's shoulders.

She could argue, Henning speculated, that "'I didn't intend to defraud or intend to violate any of the accounting rules because I was told this by the outside lawyer.'"

STEVE NEEDED TO GET PAID

Jobs' compensation was a prickly issue for Apple in 2000. Since he rejoined the floundering company as a director and interim CEO in 1997, Jobs had received only his $1 a year salary. The rest of the company's directors received option grants, but Jobs, a company employee, was ineligible.

After Jobs decided at the end of 1999 to remain as chief executive, the board formed a special CEO compensation committee to award him a big chunk of options. In January 2000, that award was finalized as a 10,000,000-share grant, but a year later, Apple's sinking share price had killed the value of those options. Jobs and the board discussed ways to work out a new, lucrative package.

Relatively new accounting rules made the most logical option -- repricing the 2000 grant -- unattractive to Apple's balance sheet. So Jobs and the board negotiated the size and price of a new options grant, and Sonsini was called to facilitate.

While Sonsini was representing the board as it negotiated with Jobs, the relationships involved were, like so many in Silicon Valley, rather tangled.

Sonsini was close with Jobs, and Apple's board increasingly turned to the lawyer for advice after Jobs returned to the company in 1997, according to a person with knowledge of Apple's situation at the time.

Sonsini's firm also had well-established business relationships with the companies run by at least three of Apple's five independent board members.

SEC filings show that Wilson Sonsini did work for Intuit, where director William Campbell was CEO, and Genentech, where board member Arthur Levinson was CEO and chairman. And according to the firm's Web site, Wilson Sonsini also provided legal services for The Gap, where director Millard Drexler was CEO.

After months of negotiations, the Apple board and Jobs finally agreed in December of 2001 on a grant of 7.5 million option shares, priced at $18.30.

LARRY HAS THE ANSWERS

That Sonsini would be consulted on a big CEO compensation issue is of little surprise to Valley insiders. He was counsel of choice for the boards of several large tech firms and was frequently called upon to resolve tense situations.

Sonsini was a central figure in the HP boardroom conflagration last fall. He'd been consulted when director Thomas Perkins quit to protest tactics used to investigate board leaks to the media.

Sonsini spent five hours in front of Congress last year, and was asked repeatedly why he hadn't advised the company that its use of "pretexting" may have violated the law. Instead, he told Perkins that the investigation appeared to be "well done and within legal limits."

Sonsini explained that his statement was based on legal advice from an outside lawyer representing the company that did the pretexting, and from HP's in-house lawyers.

Though he caught lots of flak for not spotting what turned out to be the key legal issue, he wasn't accused of violating the law.

The Apple case seems to be shaping up in a similar fashion: No one is accusing Sonsini of acting illegally, but people with knowledge of the investigation said that firm billing records and interviews reviewed through Apple's own probe of its options problems make it clear that he was called upon to deal with the sensitive matter of issuing options to the CEO.

KNOWN QUANTITIES

While there may be gaping questions about Sonsini's knowledge of the Apple grant, what's clear is that even in 2001, his firm was aware of the perils of misdating options -- and also of some companies' desire to do so.

In early 2001, another company, KLA-Tencor, was discussing a large award for a top executive. Questions arose about how the grant would be dated, and that company's general counsel contacted the firm's outside lawyers.

According to several people familiar with KLA's situation, when Wilson partners Bret DiMarco and Roger Stern were asked about the prospect of backdating grants, they sent a very clear message: Don't.

DOJ_NMG_0125588

The lawyers told KLA in writing that misdating grants without properly expensing them could lead to major complications, including financial restatements.

Like Apple's, the KLA grants are the subject of an ongoing federal criminal investigation.

Reached Wednesday, DiMarco, who has since left the firm to join the tech firm Coherent, said he couldn't talk about the KLA situation.

Wilson Sonsini spokeswoman Courtney Dorman said she couldn't discuss KLA. As for Apple, she said Wilson continues to have a business relationship with the company.

Over the past few weeks, the federal investigation has slowed somewhat because the lead prosecutor, Christopher Steskal, is preparing to leave the U.S. Attorney's Office for Fenwick & West. And there's further uncertainty because U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan is on his way out of the office, and the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- Ryan's second-in-command, Eumi Choi -- has been sending her resume to law firms.

The case was recently reassigned to Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Crudo, and people involved in the case said they expect an uptick in activity over the next few weeks.

Nacchio Settles Pension Lawsuit For $1.5 Million (RMN)

By Jeff Smith, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, February 1, 2007

Former Qwest Chief Executive Joe Nacchio has agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a fraud lawsuit filed by one of the country's largest pension funds.

Nacchio's deal - part of a $46.5 million settlement paid to the California State Teachers' Retirement System - is believed to be the largest he's agreed to make with regard to his alleged misdeeds at the Denver telco.

Qwest, several investment banks and former auditor Arthur Andersen will collectively pay about $45 million to settle the suit, filed in December 2002 by CalSTRS.

The settlement was finalized in early January, but terms of the deal weren't disclosed until Wednesday. The case was filed in San Francisco Superior Court.

Nacchio's attorney Herbert Stern couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

In 2003, Nacchio paid $400,000 to two law schools to settle charges by New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that Nacchio improperly made more than $1 million from lucrative initial public offerings provided by Citigroup's Salomon Smith Barney brokerage.

Nacchio still faces securities fraud allegations in a federal class-action case, civil fraud charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission and 42 insider trading counts filed by the Justice Department. He is scheduled to go on trial in Denver on the insider trading charges March 19. He has denied wrongdoing.

Jack Ehnes, CEO of CalSTRS, said the settlement gave members an estimated 30 times more than they would have received if the group had participated in the federal $400 million class-action securities fraud settlement with Qwest.

Ehnes said CalSTRS, which alleged Qwest misled investors, decided to pursue its case separately not only to recover more of its estimated $150 million in losses but "to reinforce our commitment to good corporate governance."

Qwest spokesman Bob Toevs said the company is "pleased to have the matter behind us."

2 Senators Renew Attacks On S.E.C. Hedge Fund Investigation (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Two prominent Republican senators renewed their criticism yesterday of the way the Securities and Exchange Commission carried out its investigation into a major hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

In separate speeches on the Senate floor, the senators, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, said the S.E.C. — which filed no charges against Pequot — had failed to aggressively follow up on investigative leads developed by the lawyer who led the inquiry, Gary J. Aguirre.

Both senators said their statements reflected the findings of an interim report, which is expected to be released today, on their investigation of the S.E.C.'s conduct in the case.

The hedge fund came under regulatory scrutiny in late 2004 when Mr. Aguirre began investigating several profitable trades made by Pequot in advance of mergers or other market-moving news. The Pequot trades were flagged by stock exchange surveillance teams and forwarded to the commission.

DOJ_NMG_0125589

The S.E.C. fired Mr. Aguirre in September 2005 after he complained that his investigation had been derailed by outside political influence.

"The S.E.C. should have taken Mr. Aguirre's allegations seriously," Mr. Grassley said. "Instead, it circled the wagons and shot the whistle-blower — an all-too-familiar practice in Washington."

Mr. Specter called on the S.E.C. to reopen its investigation of Pequot, citing what he called "conclusive proof" that political considerations had figured in the agency's decision to delay taking the testimony of an influential Wall Street executive, John J. Mack. The commission did eventually interview Mr. Mack, but only after Mr. Aguirre criticized it in letters to Congress.

"The overwhelming evidence in the matter showed that the testimony should have been taken at a much earlier stage," Mr. Specter said.

The S.E.C. closed its investigation without filing any charges against Mr. Mack or anyone else connected with the Pequot matter.

An S.E.C. spokesman, John Nester, said he had not yet had the chance to read the interim report, but he said the commission would "carefully consider the report's findings and recommendations." Mr. Nester said the commission had cooperated fully with Congressional investigations, a statement echoed by Mr. Grassley.

The S.E.C.'s investigation "was plagued with problems from its beginning to its abrupt conclusion," Mr. Grassley said. "The termination of Mr. Aguirre by the S.E.C. was highly suspect given the timing and circumstances."

Both senators had particularly harsh words for the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik. Mr. Specter said that in all his years in the Senate he could not recall "an I.G. who said less, did less and was thoroughly inadequate in the investigation."

He mocked what he said was the inspector general's defense — that it was not his responsibility to second-guess certain S.E.C. decisions. "Well, that's the purpose of having an I.G.," Senator Specter said.

Mr. Stachnik declined to comment last night.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jurors May Hear Libby Grand Jury Testimony (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald appears to be saving NBC newsman Tim Russert as his last witness in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

In the meantime, Fitzgerald may let Libby himself do the talking.

Fitzgerald has said he plans to play excerpts from Libby's grand jury testimony at trial, and the government's next witness, FBI agent Deborah Bond, appears to be Fitzgerald's opportunity. That would give jurors the chance to hear for themselves the testimony that Fitzgerald says is a lie and that Libby says is a product of faulty memory.

The perjury and obstruction trial hinges on whether Libby lied about his conversations with reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Fitzgerald spent the first week of the trial presenting witnesses who said they talked to Libby about Plame, the wife of prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson. Some witnesses, such as officials from the CIA and State Department, said they told Libby about Plame.

Others, such as former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer and journalists Judith Miller and Matthew Cooper, said Libby talked about Plame to them.

Those witnesses undercut Libby's claim that he didn't remember learning about Plame through official channels and was surprised to hear about her during a much later conversation with Russert. Any conversations he had about Plame, Libby said, were just recollections of what he heard from Russert.

Fitzgerald contends Libby concocted that story to avoid embarrassment, prosecution and possibly losing his job.

Libby, ex-chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is on trial on charges he lied to the FBI and a grand jury about his conversations with reporters about Plame and obstructed the investigation into how her identity leaked to the public in 2003. No one has been charged with the actual leak.

Fitzgerald believes jurors should hear and see Libby's words for themselves. He successfully fought to allow into evidence Libby's full grand jury testimony -- the sworn statements he gave prosecutors during the investigation -- and the prosecutor played a brief clip during his opening statement.

Fitzgerald says he expects to call Russert to testify on Monday or Tuesday, a plan that would make the well-known journalist the last witness jurors hear before the government rests its case. Russert says he did not discuss Plame with Libby, a recollection that is directly at odds with the former aide's testimony.

Defense attorneys say Libby will be his own star witness and will explain to the jury that he was preoccupied with national security issues and simply forgot about his conversations regarding Plame. Attorneys also have indicated they'll call Cheney to testify.

Libby Lawyers Seize On Miller Hesitation (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, February 1, 2007

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller acknowledged Wednesday that she had conversations with other government officials and could not be "absolutely, absolutely certain" that she first heard about an outed CIA official from I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Libby's attorneys seized on the hesitation and tried to portray Miller as someone who selectively remembers some conversations and not others.

Miller is a crucial witness against Libby in his perjury and obstruction trial. She says she had two conversations about CIA operative Valerie Plame in mid-2003 with Libby, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff. Those conversations are at the heart of the trial because they allegedly occurred well before Libby says he learned Plame's identity from another reporter.

Libby's defense strategy revolves around showing jurors that he didn't lie about his conversations with Miller and others, but simply forgot them. If defense attorneys can cast doubt on Miller's memory and her story, it would bolster Libby's case.

During a sometimes heated cross-examination Wednesday, defense attorneys pressed Miller to acknowledge that she might have heard about Plame elsewhere. In mid-2003, Miller was investigating allegations by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that the Bush administration ignored certain prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Attorney William Jeffress asked Miller to recall the other government officials she spoke to and explain how Wilson's name and phone number got into her notebook prior to the conversation with Libby.

"I don't remember their names. I don't know what you want me to say beyond that," Miller said, adding moments later, "I know I had several conversations but there is no reference to them in my notebook and I have no independent recollection."

Jeffress persisted, showing Miller excerpts from her grand jury testimony in which she said her conversation with Libby was "among the first times" she heard about Plame but couldn't be certain it was the first.

"You're not absolutely certain you first heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the CIA from Mr. Libby?" Jeffress asked.

"I can't be absolutely, absolutely certain, but I have no recollection of an earlier conversation with anyone else," Miller replied.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's case began as an investigation into who leaked Plame's name to reporters at a time when her husband was criticizing the administration. Three years later, nobody has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of obstructing the case and lying to investigators.

Libby's attorneys said Wednesday that they want to know more about another Fitzgerald case involving Miller. Fitzgerald has sought to get Miller's phone records in an investigation into who leaked the details about an investigation into an Islamic charity.

Theodore Wells, another of Libby's attorneys, said he wants to know more about conversations between Miller and Fitzgerald in that case. If Miller feared prosecution in that case, Wells said, it could motivate her to cooperate in Libby's case and thus cast doubt on her testimony.

Journalism organizations have decried this trial, which could see 10 reporters become witnesses. Fitzgerald intends to call Matthew Cooper of Time and NBC's Tim Russert. Jeffress has said that up to seven reporters are on his witness list.

Former Times Reporter Testimony Is Challenged (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — A former reporter for The New York Times jousted for nearly two hours on Wednesday with a lawyer for I. Lewis Libby Jr. over her credibility and memory.

They argued over the significantly damaging testimony that the reporter, Judith Miller, had given about three conversations she had with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, who is facing perjury and obstruction of justice charges.

Ms. Miller testified on Tuesday that Mr. Libby had told her in those conversations details about the identity of Valerie Wilson, a Central Intelligence Agency operative, days before Mr. Libby said he learned about Ms. Wilson from reporters.

William H. Jeffress Jr., the lawyer for Mr. Libby, asked Ms. Miller what other officials she had spoken with about Ms. Wilson.

“I remember having conversations, sir,” she said, casting quick glances at the jury and at her lawyers sitting in the back of the courtroom. But she said she could not remember talking to anybody else about Ms. Wilson, who is also known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame.

Mr. Jeffress then showed a video clip of a television interview with Ms. Miller from Jan. 8, 2006. In the clip, she said she had discussions with “senior government officials and some not-so-senior government officials” about Ms. Wilson and her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who wrote an op-ed article, published July 6, 2003, in The New York Times, accusing the Bush administration of distorting intelligence about Iraq’s efforts to buy uranium in Africa to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Jeffress also cited an affidavit making a similar assertion that Ms. Miller filed with the court before she went to jail for 85 days after initially refusing to testify before a grand jury.

“Who were these senior government officials?” Mr. Jeffress asked.

Ms. Miller replied, “I was not talking about Joe Wilson,” adding, “I was using Joe Wilson as a shorthand” for questions about whether Iraq had tried to buy uranium in Africa.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents who were investigating the leak of Ms. Wilson’s name to reporters.

Pressed by Mr. Jeffress about the conflict between her testimony on Wednesday and the interview and the affidavit, Ms. Miller, who was combative and testy at times, replied: "I don't know what you want me to say beyond what I've said. I don't remember the people I talked to" about the Wilsons.

"That's all I can tell you, sir," she added.

Asked again about such conversations, she said with exasperation: "I just don't remember," then added in a loud voice, "I don't remember."

After Mr. Jeffress concluded his questioning, Ms. Miller regained her composure as she answered more questions, which came from the jury because Judge Reggie M. Walton had allowed jurors to submit written questions.

One juror wanted to know why Ms. Miller had chosen to go to jail. She said it was because of her deeply held principles that journalists should be allowed to protect their sources in order to report on issues government officials hoped to conceal.

She was followed to the witness stand by Matthew Cooper, a former Time magazine reporter who, unlike Ms. Miller, avoided going to jail by agreeing earlier to testify to the grand jury.

Mr. Cooper testified Wednesday that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson during a telephone interview on July 12. He also recounted how he first learned about Ms. Wilson on July 11 from Karl Rove, the president's chief political strategist.

He said that Mr. Rove told him to be wary of Mr. Wilson's criticisms in The Times. "Don't go too far out on Wilson," Mr. Cooper recalled Mr. Rove saying, warning him that Ms. Wilson worked at "the agency."

Mr. Cooper testified that when he spoke to Libby, he had heard that Mr. Wilson's wife worked at the C.I.A. He said that Mr. Libby responded, "I heard that too."

The trial hinges largely on whether the jury believes the prosecution account that Mr. Libby lied when he contended he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from reporters and not from fellow administration officials.

The first six witnesses, present or former government officials, have testified that they had informed Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson. The two reporters, Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper, testified that Mr. Libby discussed the information with them.

Mr. Libby's defense is that many of the witnesses do not correctly remember what occurred. In addition, his lawyers are trying to make the case that if Mr. Libby gave inaccurate information to the grand jury and to investigators, it was merely a case of faulty memory.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said Wednesday he wanted to introduce evidence to explore one of the case's most intriguing mysteries: a note from Mr. Libby to Ms. Miller giving her permission to testify.

In the September 2005 note, Mr. Libby told Ms. Miller, who was in jail at the time, that she was no longer bound by her pledge of confidentiality and that she should testify before the grand jury. He added, cryptically, that the aspen trees in Colorado change color at the same time because they are bound at the roots.

Mr. Fitzgerald said Wednesday, while conferring with the judge while the jury was out of the room, that the note was an effort to persuade Ms. Miller to lie to the grand jury and back up Mr. Libby's story, saying it demonstrated Mr. Libby's "consciousness of guilt."

Judge Walton pointed out that Ms. Miller's testimony had not helped Mr. Libby, however, and had contributed to the indictment against him.

"We don't think that the letter worked," Mr. Fitzgerald said. "He told her what he wanted her to say."

Judge Walton deferred a decision on whether and when Mr. Fitzgerald could introduce the note to the jury.

Mr. Fitzgerald said he hoped to complete the prosecution's case by early next week, perhaps on Monday.

Two jurors from the original panel of 16 have had to be excused, meaning that if another 3 jurors leave, it would raise the likelihood of a mistrial. Judge Walton asked the jurors on Wednesday to please remain in good health.

Defense lawyers said Wednesday they had subpoenaed Jill Abramson, the managing editor of The Times, to appear as a witness. Ms. Miller testified Tuesday that she had a conversation with Ms. Abramson in July 2003 in which she suggested assigning someone to report on the issue of Mr. Wilson's report and what role, if any, Ms. Wilson played in sending him on the assignment to Africa.

Ms. Abramson has denied that account in an article published in The Times. The article examined Ms. Miller's behavior in the Libby story as well as her pre-war reporting that intelligence officials believed Iraq had amassed a stockpile of weapons of mass destruction.

Ex-Time Reporter Testifies In Libby Trial (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig
The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125593

A former Time magazine reporter said in court yesterday that I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby confided that the wife of an Iraq war critic worked at the CIA, becoming the second journalist to testify that the vice president's then-chief of staff disclosed the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Matthew Cooper, the magazine's White House reporter in the summer of 2003, told jurors in Libby's perjury trial that President Bush's top political aide, Karl Rove, was the first administration official to privately tell him that former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV was married to a CIA officer. The next day, Cooper said, he asked Libby whether Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

According to Cooper, Libby said "words to the effect, 'Yeah, I've heard that, too,' " though Libby did not name her.

When Libby learned Plame's identity and what he did with that information are pivotal issues in the trial. During a federal investigation into the CIA leak, Libby told FBI agents and a grand jury that he found out about the CIA officer, whose husband was lashing out at the administration's use of Iraq intelligence, during a conversation on July 10, 2003, with NBC's Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert. Libby is charged with lying to investigators, committing perjury and obstructing the investigation.

Cooper is the third prosecution witness to say that Libby was actively spreading information about Wilson and his wife soon after he sought to learn who they were. It follows testimony yesterday and on Tuesday from former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who said Libby told her about Wilson's wife twice in the days and weeks before Vice President Cheney's right-hand man at the time contends he ever heard of Plame.

The pair's turn on the witness stand also provided an unflattering portrayal of how some of Washington's most prominent journalists work. If the testimony of half a dozen government officials earlier in the trial exposed infighting at the highest levels of the Bush administration, the testimony of Cooper and Miller exposed jurors -- and the public -- to the sloppy and incomplete note-taking of reporters, their inability to remember crucial interviews and, in Miller's case, important interview notes stuffed into a shopping bag under her desk.

Libby is the only person charged in the federal investigation into how Plame's name was disclosed to journalists, including Robert D. Novak, who revealed Plame's role and name in a syndicated column on July 14, 2003. Novak's column appeared eight days after Wilson published a stinging rebuke that accused the administration of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it tried to justify invading Iraq.

Libby is not charged with the leak itself. He has pleaded not guilty to five felony counts, contending that he innocently misremembered conversations with reporters because they were insignificant amid his work on critical national security matters.

Under questioning by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and cross-examination by defense attorney William Jeffress Jr., Cooper portrayed the revelations to him by Rove and Wilson as part of a strategy to disparage Wilson. In 2002, the former ambassador had been sent by the CIA to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium there for use in its nuclear weapons program. Wilson brought home his conclusion that those reports were unfounded.

Cooper testified that Rove cautioned him on July 11, 2003, not to "lionize" Wilson, because he actually had been sent on the mission by his wife.

The next day, a Saturday, Cooper was waiting for a call from Libby while he raced to finish reporting a story for that Monday's issue of Time. Cooper said he spent the morning at the Chevy Chase Club, where cellphones and BlackBerrys are not allowed, and repeatedly ran to the parking lot to see whether Libby had called. It was in the afternoon while Cooper was sprawled on his bed at home, he said, when Libby called his cellphone twice.

In the first call, he said, Libby read him a statement that Cooper said tried to distance Cheney's office from Wilson's trip and his conclusions. In the second, shorter, call a few minutes later, Cooper said, he slipped in the question about Wilson's wife. Cooper said he asked the question off the record, but nevertheless considered Libby's reply as confirmation. He said Libby also criticized the methods Wilson had used to investigate the uranium reports.

Responding to a question from Jeffress, Cooper acknowledged that he did not ask Libby any follow-up questions about how Libby had learned about Wilson's wife. He said that Libby did not identify her by name or say she worked in an undercover capacity. He said that he did not pursue the issue more deeply because Libby was rushing to end their conversation.

Jeffress sought to suggest that Cooper's memory -- as well as his note-taking -- was faulty and that he could have learned about Plame from his own colleague, former Time magazine reporter John Dickerson. Dickerson was covering a trip Bush took to Africa when White House press secretary Ari Fleischer shared information about Wilson's wife with him and another reporter, Fleischer testified earlier this week.

Also yesterday, Miller -- the former New York Times reporter who was jailed for 85 days after initially refusing to testify about her sources -- told jurors that she heard about Plame from other government officials, in addition to Libby. She said she could not remember who those officials were.

DOJ_NMG_0125594

Miller told the jury she believes Libby was, in the summer of 2003, the first person to tell her that Plame worked at the CIA and was married to a critic of the Bush administration's Iraq policies. But she acknowledged: "I can't be absolutely, absolutely certain."

Reporter: Rove First To Leak CIA Info (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — White House adviser Karl Rove told a reporter that an administration critic's wife worked at the CIA, days before her name was made public, the reporter testified Wednesday.

Vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby then confirmed Valerie Plame's CIA status a day later during an "off-the-record" conversation, former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper said.

Cooper was the first prosecution witness in the 6-day-old trial to support a specific charge against Libby: that he lied when he told grand jurors he did not confirm Plame's identity when he talked to Cooper.

Libby is being tried for perjury and obstruction of justice during the investigation into who leaked the identity of Plame, a covert CIA operative. Revealing the identity of a classified government agent can be a federal crime.

Libby told investigators he first learned of Plame's identity on July 10, 2003, during a talk with NBC reporter Tim Russert. Seven previous prosecution witnesses have testified that they discussed Plame's CIA status with Libby days or weeks earlier.

In a July 11, 2003, telephone interview, Rove said "(former ambassador Joseph) Wilson's wife" worked in weapons of mass destruction at "the agency," Cooper testified.

Speaking to Libby a day later, Cooper asked whether he had heard rumors that "Wilson's wife" sent him to Africa to pursue a report that Iraq was seeking uranium there.

"Mr. Libby said words to the effect of 'yeah, I heard that too,' " Cooper testified. He said he "took that as confirmation" that Plame was a CIA officer. Time reported that, but only after syndicated columnist Robert Novak had published her name on July 14.

Wilson, a former State Department official, had charged the White House had wrongly claimed that Iraq sought uranium in Africa.

Libby's attorneys attacked Cooper's credibility during cross-examination. Cooper acknowledged that his notes of the Libby interview and a subsequent e-mail to his editors made no reference to Plame's CIA job.

Cooper also said he had not asked how Libby knew where Plame worked.

"I should have," said Cooper, now Washington editor of Portfolio, a magazine that makes its debut in April.

Asked by defense attorney William Jeffress, Cooper could not say why he left Libby's comment about Plame out of his notes.

"Isn't this consistent with the fact that (Libby's offhand comment) wasn't confirmation of anything?" Jeffress asked.

"It is my memory; it is what it is," Cooper answered. "I took it as confirmation."

Cooper said he at first declined to cooperate with prosecutors, relenting after Libby released him from a promise of confidentiality. Another witness, former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, spent 85 days in jail for refusing to testify.

Libby Trial Shows An Insular, Backbiting Washington (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — With the Bush administration taking a pounding over erroneous prewar claims about Iraq in the summer of 2003, Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff consulted his office's top communications advisor on how to strike back.

As they talked by phone, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby scribbled down a series of Machiavellian suggestions from Cheney's then-communications guru, Mary Matalin: What to do about MSNBC talk show host Chris Matthews and his steady barrage of Iraq war criticism? "Call Tim," Libby wrote, referring to Tim Russert of NBC News. "He hates Chris."

What to make of former Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had emerged that summer to challenge the veracity of one of the administration's most alarming claims about Saddam Hussein's regime? "Wilson is a snake," Libby transcribed.

And how best to use the power of the White House to beat back the attacks? The president "should wave his wand," Matalin advised, and quickly declassify portions of intelligence reports that backed up the White House case for war.

Libby is the defendant in the case that brought this page of notes to light Wednesday — a case that centers on whether he lied to federal investigators looking into the leak of an undercover CIA operative's name.

But in many respects, it is the ugly mutual exploitation that goes on every day in Washington between powerful government officials and influential members of the media that is on trial in U.S. District Court in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0125595

Five days in, the trial has been dominated by testimony from two of the Bush administration's top media handlers — former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer and former Cheney communications director Catherine J. Martin — as well as two prominent Washington journalists.

Martin, in particular, offered in her testimony last week an unusually detailed description of how the White House seeks to manipulate the news media.

She described plans to leak stories to certain reporters, including the New York Times' David E. Sanger and the Washington Post's Walter Pincus; freeze out others, such as New York Times columnist Nicholas D. Kristof; book administration officials on talk shows such as Russert's "Meet the Press"; and release bad news on weekends, when it was more likely to be ignored.

Neither side has fared well, with prosecutors accusing the administration of carrying out a smear campaign against Wilson, and defense attorneys scrutinizing everything from the sloppy note-taking practices to the murky ethical terrain of members of the media.

Even jurors seem somewhat appalled by the display. At one point, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton read aloud a question submitted by one member of the panel after former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified that she remembered details of a crucial meeting with Libby only after discovering a shopping bag full of notebooks under her desk.

"Is this the standard method you used for archiving?" the juror asked.

The trial has cast such a harsh light on the interplay between public officials and the press in part because federal prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald was unusually aggressive in challenging notions that members of the media should be able to protect their sources from public exposure. Miller agreed to testify only after she had spent 85 days in jail for refusing to divulge information on her sources.

The case has also provided a penetrating look into the strategies that top government officials employ to manipulate the media.

In his testimony, former Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper acknowledged that he had only recently started covering the White House when the CIA leak scandal erupted. Even so, he was quickly granted access to one of the most powerful figures in the Bush White House, political advisor Karl Rove, mainly because the administration was eager to discredit Wilson.

Recounting their conversation, Cooper said Rove cautioned him, "Don't get too far out on Wilson," meaning the credibility of Wilson's criticism, because "a number of things are going to be coming out" on him.

Pressed by Cooper, Rove added that Wilson had not been sent to Africa by Cheney to investigate whether Iraq was seeking to acquire uranium there. Instead, Cheney said it was Wilson's wife who had sent him and that "she worked on WMD at the agency."

"I took that to mean the CIA," Cooper quipped, "not the Environmental Protection Agency."

Some of the most revealing information has come during conferences when jurors are asked to leave the room. The notes that Libby scribbled during his conversation with Matalin, for example, were on a page that Judge Walton declined to be allowed as evidence because Libby hadn't called Wilson a "snake," he had only written down someone else's comments.

To show that to the jury, Walton said, would be "marginally probative but highly prejudicial."

Libby wrote the notes after a senior staff meeting at the White House during which Rove complained that the administration had been too slow in mobilizing a response to Wilson. The former envoy had written in a New York Times opinion piece that his trip to Africa had shown that Iraq wasn't seeking uranium there long before Bush included that claim in a State of the Union speech.

Perhaps on Matalin's advice, Libby went on to have a conversation with Russert, who is expected to testify in the coming days.

The trial has also reinforced stereotypes that reporters in Washington and the officials they cover are part of an elite crowd that has little in common with average readers.

Cooper said he followed up his conversation with Rove by arranging an interview with Libby, Cheney's chief of staff at the time. The logistics were complicated, Cooper said, because the day they were to talk he was swimming at a country club that doesn't permit cellphones. He said he "had to keep running out to the parking lot" to check his cellphone and electronic message device "to see when I was going to speak with Mr. Libby."

The trial has also offered jurors a primer on reporting tradecraft, with a great deal of testimony devoted to the various degrees of anonymity reporters grant sources in order to coax information from them. While discussing the differences between such terms as "background" and "off the record," Miller was asked how common it was for government officials to refuse to have their comments attributed to them by name.

Very common, she said, "particularly in this administration."

Jurors' Queries Yield Insights -- And Laughs (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 1, 2007

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller was on the witness stand yesterday and a juror wanted to know why she had decided to go to jail for 85 days before agreeing to testify about her conversations with I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Another juror had a different kind of question for Miller about a her notes from a conversation with Libby: Was storing notebooks in a large shopping bag under her desk her standard method for saving her notes?

So the jurors asked.

It is very unusual for jurors to be able to ask questions during court proceedings, but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton is allowing it as Libby stands trial for allegedly lying to investigators who were trying to determine who leaked the name of CIA officer Valerie Plame after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, criticized President Bush's war plans. The 12 jurors and three alternates get to write questions down and pass them to Walton, who reviews them with the attorneys and decides which ones he will ask on their behalf.

Some of the questions have been dead on, showing that the highly educated jurors -- who include an art curator, a retired math teacher and an international health policy adviser -- seem to home in on key evidence or testimony. Other questions have elicited new insights into witnesses' thinking, and still others have evoked a few laughs.

The whole practice has been controversial among attorneys on both sides -- worried about losing control of the points they hope to score with each witness's testimony -- who argue quietly with Walton at the bench over what can be asked.

In answer to yesterday's questions, Miller testified that she went to jail because she had given Libby a promise of confidentiality and that she had stored the notebook in a bag because she was planning to take it and other material home from her office.

Other witnesses have prompted other questions. Last week, several jurors were fixated on CIA briefer Craig Schmall's testimony about notes he had written on the margins of his June 14, 2003, briefing book, which included a reference to Wilson's wife working at the CIA when he briefed Libby on national security issues at Libby's home that Saturday morning.

"The handwritten information -- who would have written that?" Walton asked, reading from one juror's question card.

Schmall said he had written the notes.

"Were those your thoughts or someone else's?" another juror queried.

Schmall explained that he jotted down notes based on questions asked and comments made by the person he was briefing. In other words, the reason he had those notes was that Libby had said something about Wilson's wife -- testimony that supports prosecutors' arguments that Libby had known about Wilson's wife and was talking about her with government officials and reporters weeks before he said he believed he first learned her identity.

Sometimes the jurors' questions have produced as revealing look into a witness's concerns as any interrogation by the veteran lawyers in the courtroom.

For example, how did Vice President Cheney's press aide Cathie Martin deal with her concerns that Cheney had recommended that she cite what she believed was a top-secret document in her rebuttal of Wilson's criticisms?

"If you had concerns, why didn't you take any action?" one juror asked.

"Because the vice president of the United States had told me to say it," Martin responded. "I didn't know where I was going to go with that."

Another juror asked Martin: "Have there been other opportunities that you thought reporters had not gotten all the facts right?"

"Yes!" Martin said, her eyes rolling. "Reporters often get things incorrect."

While the lawyers may prefer to control the questioning, Walton has told them that it is important for the jurors to be able to probe the things they want answered. He has allowed jurors in his courtroom to ask questions for several years, a rare practice that is slowly becoming more common among some judges.

About 15 percent of state courts and 8 percent of federal courts permit jury questions, and three states require that questions from jurors be allowed: Arizona, Colorado and Indiana.

Though he doesn't use the practice, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth sees some benefits: It can take more time, but jurors do not have to struggle needlessly about an unanswered question once they begin their deliberations.

"It can tell both sides that something is bothering a juror," Lamberth said, "and you don't want something to bother a juror."

Feds Prepare To Charge Ex-CIA Official, Contractor (AP)

AP, February 1, 2007

Federal prosecutors are preparing to seek indictments against a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor at the center of the bribery scandal that sent former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

Two government officials familiar with the investigation told The Associated Press on Wednesday that prosecutors plan to ask a San Diego grand jury to return charges of honest services fraud and conspiracy against Kyle "Dusty" Foggo and his close friend, Brent Wilkes, whose lawyers have said he is one of four unidentified co-conspirators described in the 2005 plea agreement for Cunningham, a San Diego Republican.

Honest services fraud is a combination of mail and wire fraud often used in public corruption cases involving officials who have engaged in a pattern of improper activities, such as accepting gifts, trips or promises of future employment from private individuals.

The officials said a second indictment is being prepared that would charge Wilkes and two of the other Cunningham co-conspirators - New York businessman Thomas Kontogiannis and his nephew, John T. Michael - with bribery and several conspiracy counts.

The officials spoke only on condition of anonymity because grand jury proceedings are secret and the charges have not been finalized. Indictments could be returned as early as Thursday, though it's more likely to occur within the next several weeks.

The fourth co-conspirator, Mitchell Wade, is cooperating with prosecutors after pleading guilty in February 2006 to bribing Cunningham in exchange for more than $150 million in government contracts since 2002. Wade is former president of MZM Inc.

Foggo's attorney, Mark MacDougall, said he had not been contacted by the U.S. attorney's office regarding possible indictments and could not comment.

Mark Geragos, an attorney for Wilkes, said he had not been apprised of any imminent criminal charges. "I've reviewed this case and I don't see anything that merits an indictment," he said.

Messages left for Kontogiannis and Michaels were not immediately returned.

Prosecutors in San Diego would not comment about an ongoing investigation.

The grand jury began hearing evidence in 2005 against Cunningham, at the time an eight-term congressman who served on the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee and the Intelligence Committee. Cunningham's subcommittee assignment made him a key figure in the awarding of defense contracts.

Cunningham agreed to a plea bargain and was sentenced in March 2006 to more than eight years in prison for taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors - including payments for a mansion, a used Rolls-Royce and a yacht he named "Duke-stir" - in return for funneling contracts to certain companies.

Prosecutors allege one of the beneficiaries was Wilkes, whose companies won nearly $100 million in federal contracts over the last decade. Prosecutors claim Wilkes paid Cunningham more than $626,000 in bribes between 2000 and 2004.

Wilkes, who heads Poway-based Wilkes Corp., grew up with Foggo in the San Diego suburb of Chula Vista. They remained very close into adulthood, naming their sons after each other.

Foggo was the No. 3 official at the CIA, responsible for the agency's day-to-day operations, until resigning in May after his home and office were raided by FBI agents in connection with the Cunningham probe headed by the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego.

Federal law enforcement agencies and intelligence officials have been investigating whether Foggo improperly awarded contracts to Wilkes' companies, including a multimillion-dollar contract to supply bottled water for CIA operations in Iraq.

A House Intelligence Committee report on Cunningham's activities released last November said he steered $70 million in contracts to Wade and Wilkes. The report also said more investigation is needed into Foggo's dealings with the intelligence panel, given his close relationship with former committee aide Brant Bassett.

The House Intelligence, Appropriations and Armed Services committees were subpoenaed in December by prosecutors for documents relating to the Cunningham investigation. A House aide said Wednesday that House lawyers have asked for more time and are working to negotiate a response that satisfies prosecutors so they can withdraw the subpoenas.

Wilkes' business fortunes have suffered since the investigation opened. Wilkes Corp. defaulted in mid-January on $12.1 million owed on its corporate headquarters.

Wilkes has been linked to several other ongoing corruption probes. He has said in interviews that his first mentor in Washington was Bill Lowery, a former U.S. congressman from San Diego whose lobbying firm is being investigated in connection with contracts approved by U.S. Rep. Jerry Lewis, R-San Bernardino, who chaired the Appropriations Committee until Democrats took power last month.

Investigators also have contacted two Washington, D.C.-based escort services in an effort to determine whether Wilkes supplied Cunningham and potentially other lawmakers with prostitutes at poker parties he hosted at the Watergate hotel.

Former R.I. Lawmaker Gets 2 1/2 Years (NSDY/AP)

By Eric Tucker, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 1, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- A once-powerful lawmaker at the center of a corruption scandal was sentenced Wednesday to 2 1/2 years in federal prison for taking payoffs, and prosecutors said their investigation now includes 14 politicians and companies.

A former hospital executive also was sentenced.

John Celona admitted he abused his position as chairman of a key legislative committee to benefit the drugstore chain CVS Corp., Roger Williams Medical Center and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

Prosecutors said the former state senator was paid nearly $320,000 for the favorable treatment.

The sentencing caps a precipitous fall for Celona, a one-time lawnmower salesman who arrived at the Statehouse in 1995. He gave up his Senate seat in 2004 amid questions about his relationship with CVS.

Celona, 53, pleaded guilty in 2005 to three counts of federal mail fraud and cooperated with investigators. He testified as the star witness last fall in a trial that produced convictions of two former hospital executives.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard Sullivan told the judge that Celona's extensive cooperation has led the investigation to seven politicians and seven corporations. Sullivan did not identify anyone being investigated but said FBI agents from other cities have been transferred to Rhode Island to help with the probe.

Before he was sentenced, a teary-eyed Celona apologized inside court to his family, friends, and the citizens of Rhode Island.

"I hope that others who may be tempted learn from my mistakes and make Rhode Island a better place," he said.

Robert Urciuoli, former president and chief executive of Roger Williams, was sentenced Wednesday to three years for his conviction on one count of conspiracy and 35 counts of fraud for paying Celona to advance the hospital's interests in the Legislature. Urciuoli maintained his innocence and said he planned to appeal.

Frances Driscoll, 67, a former hospital vice president, sobbed after she was sentenced to eight months in prison followed by eight months of home confinement for her conviction on a single fraud count.

Two former executives at CVS Corp. pleaded not guilty Tuesday to federal charges they paid Celona to kill legislation the chain opposed or sponsor bills that favored the company.

Celona has also been indicted on related state corruption charges and faces a separate trial on those counts next month. Last year, the state ethics commission punished him with a record $130,000 civil fine for ethics violations.

Trio Sentenced To Jail (PROJO)

By Mike Stanton, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, February 1, 2007

In sentencing John A. Celona, Robert A. Urciuoli and Frances P. Driscoll to prison yesterday, Senior U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres said that he wanted to send a message to others who might be tempted to follow in their footsteps down the long, gray line of Rhode Island's corrupt past.

And judging from the words of a federal prosecutor, the potential audience is growing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Gerard B. Sullivan revealed that a federal task force has been assembled that is pursuing 14 "active investigations" of seven politicians and seven corporations for corruption schemes similar to the crimes that ensnared Celona, a former state senator, and Urciuoli and Driscoll, onetime executives at Roger Williams Medical Center.

The investigations have their genesis in the cooperation of Celona, who pleaded guilty to selling his office to Roger Williams, the CVS drugstore chain and Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island.

Celona, 53, was sentenced to 2½ years in prison. Urciuoli, 59,received 3 years. And in an emotional conclusion to the day's proceedings, Driscoll, 67, who has health concerns, was sentenced to 8 months in prison plus 8 months home confinement.

Celona must report to prison by noon Friday, March 2. Torres gave Urciuoli and Driscoll 60 days, until April 2, to give them time to appeal.

If not for Celona's acceptance of responsibility and ongoing cooperation, Torres said that he would have sentenced him to 42 months.

"Perhaps your assistance will allow the authorities to dig deeper into this culture of corruption that seems to exist in some quarters," Torres told Celona.

A teary Celona told the judge that he was relieved.

DOJ_NMG_0125599

"I'm glad that all of this happened," he said, "because I've become a better husband and a better father and in some respects just a regular person, living in the real world …I lived in a superficial world at the State House, with all the trappings of power … .

"Family and honor are the most important things in life — not politics or glory or power."

Sullivan told Torres that Celona's assistance has provided tips and leads for a growing number of agents. FBI agents have been brought to Providence from New York and Baltimore to work with two Providence agents and the Rhode Island State Police. In addition, agents from the Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Department of Labor have joined the task force.

Sullivan has relinquished his position as chief of the criminal division in the Providence U.S. Attorney's office to oversee the task force. In an office with 20 prosecutors and 5 legal assistants, Sullivan said, with all the drugs, weapons and other cases they have to handle, one-fifth of the staff has been dedicated to the task force — "a significant response based on the cooperation of Mr. Celona."

Celona pledged to Torres that he would continue to cooperate.

"I wholeheartedly want to clean up our government," said Celona. "I hope that others who might be tempted will learn from my mistakes. I want to make Rhode Island a better place."

Torres noted that Celona is just the latest in a long line of public officials "who have been sentenced in this courthouse and this courtroom," but that for whatever reason — elitism, greed, arrogance — "the message has yet to sink in."

"Your expression of remorse seems genuine," the judge said. "You seem committed to cleaning up what needs to be cleaned up in this state."

Still, Celona's crimes are serious enough that Torres rejected his request for 18 months in prison.

"What you've done here is not only deprive the public of the right to your honest services," said Torres. "You have tarnished the reputation of other public officials, the vast majority of whom are honest, devoted and do the best they can. Every time one of these cases comes up, one of the worst consequences is the cloud that it casts over honest, hard-working public officials."

Such a cloud, noted Torres, also "deters good people" from becoming involved in politics.

U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente echoed that theme on the courthouse steps.

"One would hope that after a parade of these sentences, people would get the message and stop doing it," said Corrente. "But we haven't hit the bottom of the barrel yet."

Corrente declined to identify any of the parties under investigation, but said that at least some "are known to you."

"If they ever get indicted, you'll know them," he vowed.

Following Celona's sentencing, his family and friends filed out of the small, packed courtroom to be replaced by Urciuoli's family and friends. Urciuoli, the former president of Roger Williams Medical Center, took Celona's place at the defense table, and Torres turned to the other side of the corruption equation.

"Public corruption is a very serious offense and it takes at least two parties," said Torres. "It takes a corrupt office holder and a person who induces that person."

Urciuoli's lawyer, Richard M. Egbert, argued that it was unfair for the government to request a sentence for Celona based on the money he received from Roger Williams, CVS and Blue Cross — about $319,000 — and then seek a much larger prison term for Urciuoli, based on the fact that Celona's efforts helped the hospital gain $5.6 million in disputed reimbursements from Blue Cross.

Based on the $5.6 million, Urciuoli was facing a potential prison term in the range of seven years following his conviction at trial last fall on 1 count of conspiracy and 35 counts of honest-services mail fraud.

"It seems almost to shock the conscience of justice," said Egbert.

Torres agreed. But he rejected Egbert's request to further lower that figure because Celona had also done "legitimate" work promoting the hospital's affiliated assisted-living center.

"Those [legitimate] services were negligible," said Torres. "Senator Celona was hired to use his office to benefit Roger Williams."

Urciuoli now faced a prison term of 41 to 51 months. Prosecutors asked for 46. But Torres had discretion to lower that based on other factors, including a history of community service documented in numerous letters to the court.

Egbert, citing Urciuoli's "extraordinary" service in 35 years at Roger Williams and the fact that the legislation involved in the case did not personally profit Urciuoli, but rather benefited the hospital, requested a prison term of one year and one day.

Urciuoli also pleaded for leniency.

"I'm not perfect. I make mistakes," said Urciuoli. "But if you look back on my life, I'm much more of a giver than a taker. …I have a deep, unbridled love for Roger Williams. I never did anything to enrich myself personally.

"This has been a very painful, humiliating experience for me and my family. …I've lost my job, my reputation, been devastated financially."

DOJ_NMG_0125600

Torres said that he was impressed by Urciuoli's appearance as "a law-abiding citizen who has done many good things for the community." And while the crime was serious, Torres said, he was also struck by the fact that "for the most part, what you did was not motivated by personal gain. …but to benefit Roger Williams."

Torres sentenced Urciuoli to three years in prison, followed by two years of supervised release during which he will have to perform eight hours a week of community service. He also fined him $20,000. The judge denied Urciuoli's request to remain free while he appeals, which could take one year.

The last defendant to be sentenced was Driscoll. A former vice president at Roger Williams, she was convicted at trial with Urciuoli of one count of honest-services mail fraud and faced a prison term of 27 to 33 months. Her lawyer, Kevin J. Bristow, argued for a lesser sentence, based on her relatively minor role in the crime, including her initial objections to Urciuoli's desire to hire Celona.

"She has lost what she worked for her whole life — her reputation," said Bristow. "She has difficulty trying to explain to a grandchild what's going on with grandma."

Torres said that she deserved some consideration, but that she should to go prison for her participation in a crime documented in numerous faxes between her and Celona.

"I never, ever in my worst nightmare thought I would be convicted of a crime, standing before you here today," she told Torres. "But as I look at those faxes, I don't know how I could have allowed that sort of communication to occur. … Reading the black and white of those documents did truly frighten me. I never took time to reconcile the friendly John Celona who wanted to truly help the hospital any way he could with the man who was a paid consultant. For that, I'm truly sorry."

She and Bristow pleaded with Torres to spare her prison and sentence her to home confinement, based on her age and health concerns of herself and her husband of 42 years, Don, for whom she is the primary caretaker. They also cited her numerous good works, documented in dozens of letters to the judge on behalf of the poor, the elderly and students.

"I don't want [my husband] to live out his life in a care center," she said, choking back sobs.

Mobster's Son May Try To Help Convict Ex-FBI Official (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, February 1, 2007

Brooklyn prosecutors are seeking to line up a star witness for their sensational upcoming trial of a former FBI supervisor, R. Lindley DeVecchio, who is charged with helping legendary mob capo Gregory Scarpa commit four murders.

The prospective witness is none other than Gregory Scarpa Jr., the imprisoned son of the late Colombo crime big, who after his death in 1994 was revealed to have been a much-prized government informant (and whose handler was Mr. DeVecchio). Unfortunately, the would-be witness comes with heavy baggage: He's already been called a perjurer by a federal judge and other authorities.

So far, the matter is still in the talking stages. Gang Land has learned that Scarpa has told prosecutors he wants to testify at the trial. The Brooklyn district attorney's office, which filed the blockbuster charges against Mr. DeVecchio, has been talking to him with a view toward granting his wish.

If so, he would undoubtedly have a lot to say.

Scarpa could give a detailed, shot-by-shot account of the slaying of Mary Bari, a onetime paramour of a top Colombo gangster who was killed in 1984, as well as the 1987 murder of mobster Joseph "Joe Brewster" DeDomenico. According to court records, Scarpa fired the fatal shots at DeDomenico and held down Bari as his father shot her at a mob social club. Mr. DeVecchio is alleged to have alerted Scarpa Sr. that both were potential informants.

Soon after the Joe Brewster slaying, Scarpa became a fugitive, allegedly after Mr. DeVecchio tipped his father that he was going to be arrested on drug charges. Captured later, Scarpa was convicted in 1988 and was in prison when two other murders that Mr. DeVecchio is alleged to have aided — that of Patrick Porco in 1990 and Larry Lampesi in 1992 — took place. If he professes any insight about those killings, it would have to have been acquired secondhand.

Prosecutors have been secretly discussing those events with Scarpa Jr. since December 6 in a secure wing of the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

On that day, according to Bureau of Prison officials, Scarpa Jr., who is serving 40 years for racketeering charges and is slated for release in 2035, was moved to the MCC. Since 1999, he had been at a super-strict Colorado facility that, at latest count, is home to the 465 "most violent" inmates of the 193,643 incarcerated around the country.

The Executive Assistant Warden, Scott Sussman, confirmed that Scarpa, 55, is at the MCC, which primarily houses transient inmates with court proceedings or other official sessions scheduled in the New York area, but declined to provide any reasons for his transfer.

A spokesman for the district attorney's office declined to comment about the matter.

Sources who are familiar with the situation but not involved in the case have told Gang Land that Scarpa and the Brooklyn district attorney's office began weighing the possibility of him serving as a prosecution witness even before he was relocated to the MCC in December.

It would obviously be a risky move, as the imprisoned mobster, who testified at his own trial and at a hearing for convicted acting Colombo boss Victor "Little Vic" Orena, has been publicly called a liar by federal authorities.

If he were to take the stand against DeVecchio, there is little, if anything, that the state prosecutors could do for Scarpa, who received nothing from the feds for information he provided about terrorists Ramzi Yousef and Terry Nichols.

Sources say that the jailed gangster is willing to testify without any guarantees, and that the DA's office is seriously considering the option.

"He's got nothing to lose," a law enforcement official said. "He's 55 and he'll be in his 80s before he can get out. Things can't get worse; only better. And until his work is done, he's close to home, and can get visits from loved ones, if he has any."

Scarpa wouldn't be the first incarcerated gangster to cooperate with the feds on a wing and a prayer.

Leroy "Nicky" Barnes, the legendary Harlem heroin merchant who was serving life without parole in 1981, got out 17 years later after he turned and helped convict 44 drug dealers and murderers, including a few mob associates, of various crimes. Barnes, by the way, has co-authored a book about his life, "Mr. Untouchable," due out next month.

Speaking of books, Scarpa is writing one with Sandra Harmon, who has given an affidavit to the DA's office containing allegations of wrongdoing by Mr. DeVecchio that she claims to have obtained from the elder Scarpa's former partner, Linda Schiro, while the two women were collaborating on a book project that failed to materialize.

Ms. Harmon told Gang Land she had loyalties to Scarpa and the DA's office and refused to discuss where Scarpa is or whether he and Brooklyn prosecutors have spoken to each other.

"But I know why someone would want to leave Ad Max" she said, using the BOP's shorthand term for the Administrative Maximum facility in Florence, Colo. "It's a hell hole, all about shackles and a 23-hour-a-day lockdown. And he does have children, a brother, and other relatives he loves."

News of Scarpa's willingness to be a prosecution witness came as the judge in the case rejected a prosecution motion to postpone the trial until after Labor Day to enable lead prosecutor Michael Vecchione to try two corruption cases, those of Judge Gerald Garson and Clarence Norman, for the fourth time.

This week, a Supreme Court justice, Gustin Reichbach, told assistant district attorneys Noel Downey and Bryan Wallace that the quadruple homicide case — in which a co-defendant has been held without bail for 11 months — was more pressing. Assuming he rejects voluminous defense motions to dismiss the case, the trial would begin in mid-May, the judge said.

In court papers, defense lawyers Douglas Grover and Mark Bederow charged that the grand jury investigation was tainted by numerous prosecution leaks to Gang Land and others, and by prosecutors' use of evidence that Mr. DeVecchio provided on two occasions when he had been granted immunity.

Reached by Gang Land, Mr. Bederow said he was reluctant to "speculate" about witnesses prosecutors think may be "helpful to their case. But certainly, if they intend on using Gregory Scarpa Jr., we would welcome the opportunity to cross examine him."

Three decades ago, mob associate Ernest Malizia knew exactly what to do after an undercover operative named Boom Boom busted him in a drug sting and he was sentenced to heavy time and stuck in the old federal detention center on West Street.

On September 22, 1974, with the help of a priest and a $50,000 bribe to a corrupt prison guard, he walked out the front gate and flew to Miami. He lived large for three years until his pursuers collared him and he was sent off to more secure accommodations.

Today, at 74, Malizia suffers a host of debilitating medical problems, is broke, and his last resort against dying in prison the same way his brother did three years ago lies with a Manhattan federal judge, Deborah Batts, his devoted wife, Brenda, says.

"He's had quadruple bypass surgery, needs a defibrillator, has no spleen to help him fight infection and has been rushed to hospitals several times in recent months with infections and heart complications," Malizia's wife, who has joined her husband in filing letters seeking mercy from Judge Batts, says.

After getting paroled from prison in 1994, Ernie was clean for a while. But truth be told, he got popped again for drug dealing, pleaded guilty, was sentenced to eight years, which he completed last year.

Before he could be released, however, he was hit with parole violations stemming from the same charges for which he had been sentenced, and ordered to serve an additional 12 years. This seems a bit unfair to Brenda Malizia, and Gang Land, too.

Drug-testing Firm Faces Audit After Accusations (CHIT)

By David Kidwell And John Chase, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, February 1, 2007

Gov. Rod Blagojevich's office has ordered an audit of no-bid state contracts dating to 1990 with a Chicago drug-testing firm under criminal investigation for alleged billing fraud.

The administration outlined its actions involving K.K. Bio-Science Inc. on Wednesday, a day after Cook County investigators and the FBI searched the company's offices for evidence of fraud, money laundering and a continuing criminal enterprise, according to the search warrant.

The company came under scrutiny last fall when the Tribune disclosed that the governor's wife, Patricia, had earned more than $113,000 as a real estate agent for the company's owner. There is no indication that the fraud investigation has any connection to the real estate deals.

The company's owner, Anita Mahajan, hired prominent Chicago defense attorney Terry Gillespie to represent her in the investigation. Gillespie said he is new to the case and declined to comment Wednesday.

Mahajan and company representatives also have declined to comment on the case, which centers on Mahajan's long-standing annual contracts to conduct urinalysis screenings on clients of the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services.

No criminal charges had been filed as of Wednesday, and law-enforcement officials also remained silent.

A three-page search warrant served at the company's headquarters in downtown Chicago on Tuesday sought "any items or documents which have been used in the commission of, or which constitute evidence of the offenses," including forgery, theft, money laundering, mail fraud, wire fraud and a continuing financial crimes enterprise, according to the warrant.

The company, founded in 1985 by Mahajan's father, abruptly closed down Jan. 19 with no warning to employees. It officially terminated its $739,000 state contract on Jan. 9 amid an inquiry by the child welfare agency's office of inspector general.

The inspector general's office recently turned over its findings to the Cook County state's attorney office, which is leading the investigation. FBI agents also were on hand during Tuesday's search of the company's abandoned headquarters at 220 S. State St.

According to other workers in the building, K.K. Bio-Science representatives spent much of last week tossing computers and files into Dumpsters in the hallway.

The inquiries began after an Oct. 27 Tribune report raised questions about four 2006 real estate deals involving Mahajan and her banker husband, Amrish, in which Patricia Blagojevich earned more than $113,000 in real estate commissions.

The four commissions on the commercial real estate deals accounted for the only ones the first lady earned in the first 10 months of 2006.

The governor's office confirmed Wednesday that it has ordered a comprehensive review of the company's contracts.

"When an [inspector general] uncovers abuses or discovers abuses of taxpayer dollars, we need to look into that as far as we can and as much as we can to understand as much as we can," said Blagojevich spokeswoman Rebecca Rausch. "In this case, the IG discovered some issue with this contract, and we want a full review of this contract and we've directed DCFS to do that."

The governor has portrayed the Tribune's questions about whether it was a potential conflict for his wife to accept commissions from a state contractor as "sexist" and "Neanderthal." And his administration last year denied Tribune requests for records that would document the company's performance, citing an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

But following the Tribune report on the real estate deals, the agency's inspector general quietly opened the contract investigation that allegedly found some problematic billings.

"Our intention is to do a full review of this contract to seek full restitution of any overpayments made," DCFS spokesman Kendall Marlowe said Wednesday.

Tribune staff reporter Ray Long contributed to this report.

Execution, If It Occurs, Is Years Away For Killer (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

Ronell Wilson sits alone in a prison cell near Gowanus Bay in Brooklyn. He has been on suicide watch since his return late Tuesday evening from federal court in Brooklyn, where a jury called for his execution.

“He’s holding up well,” said one of his lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, “under the circumstances.”

DOJ_NMG_0125603

On federal death row, he will join 46 other inmates, their cases in varying stages of appeal. If the sentence is carried out one day, Mr. Wilson, 24, will probably die by lethal injection at the federal death chamber in Terre Haute, Ind., where Timothy J. McVeigh, who bombed the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, and two Texans have preceded him. But Mr. Wilson's lawyers said he will appeal his sentence, an unpredictable and complicated process that could take years.

No other federal trial in New York has produced a death sentence in half a century. Three men have been put to death in federal cases since 1988, when a moratorium on federal capital punishment was lifted. Of these, the two Texans — Juan Raul Garza, convicted of three drug-related murders, and Louis Jones Jr., convicted of rape and murder — were each on death row for about eight years. Mr. McVeigh, who abandoned his appeals after being denied a stay of execution, was executed four years after his sentencing for the bombing.

Mr. Wilson was convicted of 10 crimes in December, chief among them the murder of two undercover detectives during a gun transaction on Staten Island in March 2003. Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, who was not in his chambers yesterday, must set a formal sentencing date, according to his staff.

On five counts, the judge is bound by the jury's verdict to impose death sentences. But for the other charges, including robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and use of a firearm, the judge must determine prison terms. Some of the crimes are relatively minor, on the scale of regular business for a federal court in New York City.

Mr. Wilson, for example, was found guilty of planning to rob a clothing store called Oz, near the Stapleton Houses on Staten Island, where his gang was based. The plan, to get a U-Haul truck and cart off the merchandise in broad daylight, was abandoned in the talking phase.

The law calls for a presentence investigation, in which probation officers will interview Mr. Wilson to ascertain his background and present demeanor. They will compile a report for the judge, though it would seem he has already heard every imaginable aspect of Mr. Wilson's biography recounted in the courtroom during the penalty phase of the trial.

"It's a charade at this point," Mr. Savitt said.

Department of Justice officials said that after sentencing, Mr. Wilson will be assigned to a prison.

The choice would seem to be foregone. All federal condemned prisoners are assigned to the United States Penitentiary in Terre Haute, said Felicia Ponce, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons. According to the Death Penalty Information Center, a private group that tracks capital cases, that institution was modified in 1995 to include an execution chamber and was converted to a death row center in 1999.

Declining to address Mr. Wilson's case in particular, Ms. Ponce said that all inmates, including those bound for death row, are evaluated according to a point system to determine their assignment. So prison officials will study the seriousness of his offense, his criminal record, his projected length of imprisonment and earlier prison sentences. According to bureau policy statements, this process will involve two managers and a counselor, and perhaps an education adviser and a psychology services representative.

Federal marshals will take Mr. Wilson to his assigned facility. He may join other inmates on an airplane, or he may be assigned to a private flight, said Ralph Rosado, a spokesman for the United States Marshals Service in the Eastern District of New York.

"It's very new," Mr. Rosado said. "I'm not sure."

Mr. Wilson's lawyers must also confront the grim novelty of the circumstances.

"The lawyers went out to an Irish pub," Mr. Savitt said, adding that he had trouble sleeping nonetheless. With the realm of possible motions in this trial exhausted, he said, the next forum for the case is appellate court.

Upon formal sentencing, a convict has 10 days to file a notice of appeal, said Erik Ablin, a spokesman for the Department of Justice. From there, a briefing schedule would be established. After avenues of appeal have been exhausted, meaning the case has been declined by the United States Supreme Court, a prisoner could apply for relief from the court that imposed the sentence.

Mr. Savitt said that grounds for appeal could include the judge's rejection of defense lawyers' efforts to eliminate certain members of the jury, including the foreman. He said the foreman had muttered and rolled his eyes during the closing defense argument.

Other grounds could include the judge's decision to bar testimony on the nature of rap lyrics. Prosecutors had submitted handwritten lyrics they portrayed as a confession, and defense lawyers had hoped to call an expert to depict the lyrics as fantasies.

Should all the appeals fail, Justice Department officials said, the Bureau of Prisons would set an execution date. An example of how that works is available from the case of Bruce Carneil Webster, another Texan, who was convicted of kidnapping resulting in death.

DOJ_NMG_0125604

Mr. Webster, who was sentenced to death in 1996, was notified in writing on Dec. 5, 2006, that he would be executed by lethal injection at 7 a.m. on April 16, 2007.

Mr. Wilson's lawyers said they would ask court and prison officials to keep him in the cell in Brooklyn during the next stage of the process.

"We have to consult with him on the appeal," Mr. Savitt said. "This is his life."

Geography And Emotion Helped Sway Jurors' Vote (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

They were police detectives, shot at close range, in the backs of their heads. Fellow officers and relatives filled the courtroom, day after day, during the trial of the man accused of pulling the trigger, who mostly kept his emotions to himself.

Add to that where the jurors came from — Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island, but not Manhattan. And that the detectives knew, and were known in, the neighborhood, which gave the case a strong local connection — unlike, say, a case involving terrorist acts overseas.

Taken together, all those elements were so powerful, death-penalty specialists said yesterday, that the jury's verdict seemed almost inevitable. The seven women and five men decided that the defendant, Ronell Wilson, should die.

That made him the first person to face death in a federal case in New York since the 1950s, a fate that other defendants have managed to avoid, even though some of them have been accused of killing far more people. "There was a confluence of factors," said Deborah W. Denno, a professor at Fordham University School of Law. "I think it's highly unlikely there will be another case with all these particular elements anytime soon."

For that reason, she and other lawyers interviewed yesterday said they doubted that the Wilson verdict signaled a shift in public attitudes about the death penalty. Michael Greenberger, a law professor at the University of Maryland, noted that advances in DNA testing have uncovered faulty convictions and made juries nationally more hesitant to impose the death sentence. But he said there were no such doubts in the Wilson case.

"This case is one that shocks the conscience," he said. "The brutal nature of it, I think, aligned the stars for this kind of verdict."

Still, some attitudes may have changed. Several years ago, when Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered United States attorneys to seek the death penalty, he ran into resistance in New York, where some prosecutors feared such a possibility could cause jurors to acquit.

Counting Mr. Wilson, there are now 47 federal prisoners on death row. But prosecutors in New York have failed to obtain death sentences in recent years, even in closely watched terrorism trials involving embassy bombings in Africa in 1998.

Some death-penalty opponents said that the Wilson case proved the exception because the victims were police officers.

Ronald J. Tabak, a special counsel at the Manhattan law firm of Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom and the president of New York Lawyers Against the Death Penalty, said that when New York changed its law on capital punishment in the 1960s "in what was considered a virtual abolition of the death penalty," the murder of a police officer remained a death-penalty offense.

The last federal inmate to be executed in New York State, Gerhard Puff, in 1954, had been found guilty of killing an F.B.I. agent during a bank robbery. At the state level, no trials involved the killings of police officers between when the death penalty was reinstated in New York in 1995 and when it was invalidated in 2004, according to Kevin Doyle, the New York State criminal defender. Nor did any of the federal cases tried in New York since 2001.

But in the Wilson case, death-penalty lawyers said, the jury could not have missed the large turnout of police officers and relatives.

"It's hard to resist that kind of pressure," said David A. Ruhnke, a lawyer who is representing a convicted drug trafficker in another federal death-penalty case in Brooklyn, that one involving racketeering and murder.

Last week, the judge in that case told the prosecutors that the Justice Department should drop its push for the execution of the defendant, Kenneth McGriff. The judge, Frederic Block, said that pressing on to the penalty phase of the trial would be "absurd" and "a total misappropriation" of taxpayer dollars.

In analyzing the Wilson verdict, some death-penalty lawyers said they had figured that sooner or later, a jury in New York would vote to send a defendant to die. Mr. Tabak said that of the seven state cases that ended in death-penalty verdicts between 1995 and 2004, all but two originated in the area that makes up the federal Eastern District: Brooklyn, Queens and Staten Island, and Nassau and Suffolk Counties on Long Island.

Lawyers consider prospective jurors in those areas more likely to support the death penalty than those in Manhattan. Still, some lawyers said the importance of geography was minimal when compared to the particular circumstances of the Wilson case.

"It was the kind of case that no matter where it tried and no matter where it was brought, the likelihood of a death verdict was high," Mr. Ruhnke said. "Sometimes the facts of a case simply blot out everything else."

Other death-penalty lawyers said the Wilson trial differed from those involving drug dealers accused of killing other drug dealers, or those involving terrorists. Twice in 2001, a federal jury in Manhattan deadlocked over whether to impose the death penalty on three terrorists in the 1998 bombings of the American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed more than 200 people, including 12 Americans. In the federal courts, a deadlock means the defendant is automatically sentenced to life in prison.

Richard Burr, who was one of Timothy J. McVeigh's lawyers in the Oklahoma City bombing trial, said that a case involving a terrorist attack overseas "is not the sort of immediate, frightening incident that the killing of police officers in your own town is."

"It's not immediate, it's not here, it's not that visceral response," he said.

The Wilson case, which centered on the murders of Detectives James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews on a Staten Island street in 2003, had an emotional component that the lawyers said had been lacking in other death-penalty trials in New York. This was partly because such violence seemed out of place on Staten Island, and partly because the detectives were the first two officers killed by gunfire on a single day in 15 years.

"The ingredient that this case had that the others have not had was the powerful emotions on the part of the victims' survivors, both their individual families and the police community," said Kevin McNally, a Kentucky lawyer who is director of the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, which provides information to defense lawyers in capital cases. "You simply don't see that kind of a packed courtroom in these other trials, and jurors are affected by that."

Nor had juries taken up a case in which the victims were police officers. David Bruck, who runs the Virginia Capital Case Clearinghouse at the Washington and Lee School of Law, said that juries "impose the death penalty to avenge the murders of people with whom they identify."

"People identify with brave, hard-working, young police officers who lost their lives and had families and people who loved them," he said.

In addition, Professor Denno said the way Mr. Wilson had handled himself during the trial — even sticking out his tongue as the victims' families rejoiced after the verdict — "stands out" among death-penalty defendants in this country.

"I think people expect this from terrorists who are instigated by an ideology that of course we can't fully understand," she said. "But the American public has particular difficulty with a defendant like Ronell Wilson, who showed so little remorse, no remorse."

Fired Kodak Worker In Kickback Case Gets Probation, Fine (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 1, 2007

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (AP) _ A fired Eastman Kodak Co. employee involved in a kickback scheme to defraud the photography company was placed on probation for three years Tuesday and ordered to pay almost $190,000 in restitution.

Roger Benton, 49, pleaded guilty to mail fraud in June for helping to steer inflated contracts to a molding services company, Pro-Mold Ltd., between 1997 and 2000. At sentencing in federal court, he was fined $3,000 and paid $63,058 of the $189,174 he was ordered to return to Kodak.

If convicted, Benton could have drawn up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Another former Kodak employee implicated in the scheme was sentenced last week to six months of home confinement and ordered to pay back a portion of the stolen money. Roy Mosely, a mechanic, and Pro-Mold conspired to inflate contract bids, then kept a portion of the payments, prosecutors said.

Man Pleads Guilty To Child-porn Charge (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 1, 2007

He faces minimum 10-year sentence for creating illegal images

A Grainger County man with a decade-long history of collecting child pornography admitted Wednesday he has been creating his own illegal images.

David Edward Ratkewicz pleaded guilty before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan to a federal child pornography possession charge.

As part of his plea, Ratkewicz admitted not only downloading sadistic shots of young children being sexually victimized but also "photographing underage boys in sexually explicit positions and storing the images on his computer," Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley said.

DOJ_NMG_0125606

That fact, coupled with a prior conviction in Florida for possession of child pornography, will put Ratkewicz on a higher rung on the sentencing ladder, Atchley said.

"He is facing enhanced penalties," Atchley said at Wednesday's hearing.

Ratkewicz faces a minimum mandatory prison term of 10 years when he again stands before Jordan in May to learn his sentencing fate.

According to documents filed in the case, the Knoxville Police Department Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, with help from the Grainger County Sheriff's Department, hit Ratkewicz with a search warrant in August 2004.

Although court records do not make clear why Ratkewicz became a target of the task force, officers such as KPD Officer Melvin Pierce typically go undercover on the Internet, taking on the guise of a child victim or a fellow child pornography aficionado.

Atchley said Ratkewicz agreed to be interviewed by Pierce and other task force officers, including FBI agents.

"He stated that he had collected child pornography for over 10 years," Atchley said.

An examination of Ratkewicz's computer revealed some 50,000 images of child pornography, Atchley said.

Defense attorney Rebecca McCoy asked Jordan to allow Ratkewicz to remain free on bond pending sentencing.

"He is not a flight risk," she said. "He has voluntarily returned here to address these issues."

Atchley balked.

"I think the statute is quite clear," Atchley said. "Mr. Ratkewicz has pleaded guilty to what is a crime of violence. This is not Mr. Ratkewicz's first time in court for an offense like this."

Jordan sided with Atchley and ordered deputy U.S. Marshals to take the Grainger County man into custody.

Study: Novel Sentencing Program Really Works (AP)

By Wilson Ring, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 1, 2007

MONTPELIER, Vt. --A woman who stole from a patient in a nursing home where she works was sentenced to making potpourri-filled vases for a senior center.

A man convicted of driving with a suspended license agrees to carve a cane for an elderly person.

An artist convicted of driving under the influence had to paint a painting for an organization whose lawn she drove over.

Those are some of the examples of the unusual sentences crafted by Vermont's ground-breaking Reparative Probation system, under which criminals meet with community volunteers -- and in some cases victims -- to craft their sentences instead of taking them from a judge.

The system works, according to a new survey.

The survey by three college professors that was paid for with a grant from the Justice Department, found that in 9,078 cases handled between 1998 and 2005, offenders were 23 percent less likely to commit another crime while on probation than those sentenced to traditional probation.

And they were 12 percent less likely to commit another crime after probation ended.

"This is a bit of a vindication for Vermont's reparative boards," said Gale Burford, a professor of social work at the University of Vermont and one of the authors of the yet-to-be published survey. He said that in some circles, Vermont was perceived as being soft on crime.

"The people who go to these boards don't regard them as soft, because they are emotional and they are getting faced by people in their community," Burford said. "It is not a soft option."

The people who work with the system every day say its successes go beyond just reducing recidivism.

"Those numbers are important, but I can tell you it works on so many other levels, in terms of the relationships built and the conversations that are had and the new perspectives that people have about their own lives and other peoples' lives," said Cara Gleason, the Community Justice Coordinator for the City of Burlington.

The Corrections Department set up the pioneering program in 1995, when the state was looking for alternatives to traditional corrections.

Reparative probation was part of a package of sentencing alternatives -- such as requiring offenders to complete intensive substance-abuse programs or closely supervised furlough in the community -- made available to Vermont judges.

A number of communities across the country now use some form of reparative justice.

What makes Vermont unusual is that the system was conceived by the Department of Corrections, said Kay Pranis, of St. Paul, Minn., who has worked with restorative justice programs across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0125607

"Out of a state agency came an effort that has become a community-based effort and really belongs to the community," said Pranis. "That is a huge accomplishment."

In the reparative probation system, the offender meets with community members and they try to craft a sentence that builds on the interests of the offender and the needs of the victim and the community.

In some cases the victims participate, in some cases they don't.

"I think across the board, almost everyone says that's when it's most transformational is when the person who has been the most affected gets to meet with the person who caused them harm," said Rain Banberg, of the Greater Barre Community Justice Center.

Now, there are 12 community justice centers across the state and many more volunteer boards that meet with the offenders. The volunteer boards are chosen from interested members of the community.

By design, the hearings lack the structured formality of a court appearance.

And that's how a single mother working in a nursing home comes to see how stealing a ring from a patient affects the victim. So the board builds on the offender's interest in crafts and has her make vases for the senior center.

Or why the man who was driving with a suspended license could agree to use his passion for carving to create a carved cane for a senior citizen. Or the artist convicted a second time for driving under the influence could create a painting for the lawn of, coincidentally, the substance abuse center she drove over, said Lori Baker, the executive director of the Barre Justice Center.

The solutions, by design, are as varied as the crimes.

"It shows that we can involve community volunteers, lay people, in processing a large percentage of our low-level crimes rather than dealing with them more formally either in government supervised probation or the even more expensive option in court," said Burford.

Bush Urged To Pardon Border Patrol Agents Who Shot Immigrant (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Are they mistreated heroes or rogue lawmen?

That question is at the heart of a nationwide uproar over Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are beginning decade-long sentences in federal prison for the non-fatal shooting of a suspected drug smuggler, who was given immunity to testify against them.

Scores of Republican lawmakers, and thousands of grassroots petitioners, have besieged President Bush with demands that the agents be granted an immediate pardon. But to federal prosecutor Johnny Sutton and his defenders, the two Texas-based agents abridged the public trust by attempting to cover up an unauthorized shooting and must face the consequences.

"Prosecutors take cases as they come. We don't get to choose the facts and we don't get to choose the witnesses," the San Antonio-based U.S. attorney said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "We hate the thought of having to prosecute law enforcement because those are the people we work with every day. But nobody is above the law."

In an interview on the Fox television network Wednesday, Bush again said he is bound by strict federal guidelines on pardons and cannot immediately grant a pardon to the two agents.

Bush explained that "there is a series of steps that are analyzed in order for the Justice Department to make a recommendation as to whether or not a president grants a pardon."

And, Bush added, "we're not at that stage yet."

Bush's position is likely to further agitate a growing circle of mostly Republican lawmakers, who have repeatedly pressed the White House to step into the case. Many also blame the Bush administration for the agents' imprisonment, pointing out that it was Bush who appointed Sutton as federal prosecutor in 2001.

"There are so many questions," said Rep. Walter Jones Jr., R-N.C., who has written four letters to Bush requesting a pardon. "The White House should intervene and the president should pardon these men immediately."

Other leading House members in the campaign include Republicans Ted Poe, Michael McCaul and Sam Johnson, all of Texas, and Dana Rohrabacher and Duncan Hunter, of California.

DOJ_NMG_0125608

"On the face of it, the administration is taking the side of the bad guys," Rohrabacher said.

The union that represents most non-supervisory Border Patrol agents is also waging a vigorous campaign to obtain a pardon for the two imprisoned agents.

"The front-line agents, the ones who actually do the work, are extremely upset," said T. J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council. "They're very concerned that the same thing could happen to them."

The fate of the two agents has inflamed the wider debate over border security and illegal immigration. And while the outcry on behalf of Ramos and Compean has buzzed across the Internet and conservative talk shows, a less vocal circle believes justice may have been done.

"If we take all the political patina from it, the pure issue is what do we want here on the border as far as accountability (in the use) of deadly force," said Kathleen Walker of El Paso, Texas, the incoming president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "We've had a clear violation of procedure and that's not something we want to promote as the status quo."

Ramos and Compean were convicted by a federal court jury in El Paso for a Feb. 17, 2005, shooting involving Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who was trying to flee back into Mexico after abandoning a van containing 743 pounds of marijuana near Fabens, Texas.

U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone of El Paso sentenced the men in October - Ramos to 11 years in federal prison, Compean to 12. They began serving their sentences two weeks ago.

"He's taking it real hard," said Joe Loya, an El Paso insurance agent and Ramos' father-in-law. "These guys were scapegoats. He's not a criminal who belongs behind bars."

The two agents and their families have repeatedly asserted that their only real offense were procedural violations that would normally result in a suspension, at best. But Sutton and his prosecution team say the agents engaged in abusive behavior and overstepped their authority.

In an account of the case released by Sutton's office, neither of the agents knew the van contained marijuana. "The evidence was un-controverted that, at the time the victim was shot, neither agent knew the driver was illegally in the United States or whether a crime had been committed," the statement said. "The only information they had was that the driver had failed to pull over to be identified."

Aldrete-Davila leaped out of the vehicle and tried to run, but stopped and raised his hands to surrender after jumping into a ditch. According to testimony, Compean tried to hit the man with the butt of his shotgun but slipped and fell. Aldrete-Davila began running, and Compean fired 14 shots with his pistol. Ramos fired once, striking Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks.

The fugitive fled to Mexico and sought medical help. In a twist of irony, according to Sutton, Aldrete-Davila's mother mentioned the incident to a friend, whose son-in-law was a Border Patrolman. The agent passed the information to superiors, resulting in an investigation by the Homeland Security Department, the parent department of the border patrol.

The investigation, as presented by prosecutors, found that the agents tried to dispose of empty shell casings and filed a false report. They were convicted of 11 of the 12 charges in the indictment, including assault with a dangerous weapon, assault with serious bodily injury, discharge of a firearm during the commission of a crime of violence and willfully violating Aldrete-Davila's constitutional right to be free from illegal seizure.

Other violations included intentionally defacing the crime scene, lying about the incident and failing to report the truth.

The agents' defenders have attacked Sutton's account as a collection of distortions and said the two lawmen were lawfully performing their duty and believed Aldrete-Davila was armed. Several lawmakers have likened the agents to combatants in Iraq, saying they risked their lives daily to protect America's border.

Among the most explosive elements in the case is Sutton's decision to grant immunity to Aldrete-Davila to enable an apparent drug dealer to testify against two agents with respected records of service - Ramos, at one point, was nominated as agent of the year before the recommendation was withdrawn following the indictment.

The agents' supporters also complain that the trial transcript has not been completed and made public, compounding their efforts to review the case.

Sutton described Aldrete-Davila as "a typical dirt-bag dope dealer" but said prosecutors had no useable evidence to link him to smuggling. Futher, he said, the agents' "bad behavior" at the scene destroyed any chance of making a drug case. After the unreported shooting came to light, he said, prosecutors had no choice but to proceed with a case, using Aldrete-Davila as a key witness.

Defense, Government Give Closing Arguments In Coke Secrets Case (SDUT/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0125609

ATLANTA – A former Coca-Cola secretary was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she conspired to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi, a prosecutor said Wednesday during closing arguments in the woman's trial.

But Joya Williams' lawyer asked jurors to use their common sense and ask themselves if the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

"They have absolutely, 100 percent failed to meet that burden," Janice Singer said during her closing argument.

Jurors deliberated Williams' fate for about 3½ hours Wednesday afternoon before being sent home for the day without reaching a verdict. Deliberations were to resume Thursday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said Wednesday that the case against Williams is about cash, ongoing access to documents, lies and acts in furtherance of the crime. He put the words on a screen for the jury, using the first letter of each of the four categories to spell "C-O-L-A."

"This case is about desperate times calling for desperate criminal measures," Pak said.

He added, "Ladies and gentlemen, she is a knowing and willing participant in the conspiracy."

The government has alleged that Williams, 41, stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light.

During two days on the stand earlier this week, Williams testified that she didn't steal anything from Coke, but rather took documents and product samples home to protect herself in case her boss questioned whether she was doing her job.

She also claimed that $4,000 in cash she deposited into her bank account in June 2006, just days after Dimson was given $30,000 in cash from an undercover FBI agent in exchange for Coke materials, came from a friend, not from Dimson.

But the friend, Clifton Carroll, testified Tuesday that Williams was lying; he said the most money he ever loaned her was $400, and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility will be an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

Williams' lawyer has suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from Williams without her knowledge and conspired to sell them to Pepsi behind her back. Williams testified she left a key under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps explaining how they could have gotten into her home.

But Pak said during his closing argument Wednesday that the key under the mat claim was another lie told by Williams.

"The fact of the matter was there was no key under the mat," Pak told jurors. "That did not happen. Mr. Dimson had an insider, and that was Ms. Williams."

Defense lawyer Singer told jurors the real liar in the case is Duhaney, when he claimed on the stand that the conspiracy was Williams' idea.

"I think it is clear Mr. Duhaney has no problem lying," Singer said.

She noted Duhaney, an ex-con who met Dimson in federal prison, testified as part of a plea agreement with the government. Dimson had served time on a bank fraud charge, while Duhaney had served time on a cocaine charge.

"It gives him a motive to lie," Singer said of Duhaney, referring to his plea deal in the Coke case. "But Mr. Duhaney doesn't really need a motive to lie. He has a pattern of lying."

Before heading home Wednesday, the jury asked U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester whether Williams is married. The jury didn't say why it wanted to know. Williams had testified she is single, though on a form she filled out listing personal information on the day she started working at Coke – March. 7, 2005 – she circled "married." Her attorney told reporters outside court that she doesn't know if Williams was married in the past.

Posing As A Family, Sex Offenders Stun A Town (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, February 1, 2007

EL MIRAGE, Ariz., Jan. 31 — To neighbors, Casey Price was a seventh grader with acne and a baseball cap who lived an unremarkable life among a bevy of male relatives.

He built the occasional skateboard ramp and did wheelies on his bicycle down the streets of this subdivision of stucco homes north of Phoenix.

DOJ_NMG_0125610

In nearby Surprise, where Casey was enrolled as a 12-year-old in a public school for four months, he was regarded as a shy, average student with chronic attendance problems. A man identified as his uncle had registered him, attended curriculum night and e-mailed his teachers about homework assignments.

Now Casey is in jail, and his former neighbors and classmates have learned the unthinkable: Not only is Casey not Casey — his real name is Neil H. Rodreick II — but he is also a 29-year-old convicted sex offender who kept a youthful appearance with the aid of razors and makeup.

And the men known as his uncle, grandfather and cousin, who until recently shared a three-bedroom house with him here, were not family at all, but a web of convicted sex offenders and predators, law enforcement officials say, preying in part on one another.

A retracing of Mr. Rodreick's tracks over the past several years shows that he is under investigation in three states. The authorities in four jurisdictions say he repeatedly failed to register as a sex offender, housed a large cache of child pornography in his computer and, based on videos found by the police, had sex with at least one boy.

"Obviously there are a lot of emotions to work through," said Mindy Newlin, the mother of a kindergartener at Imagine Charter School, the school in Surprise where Mr. Rodreick posed as Casey. "We are just shocked."

Robin Kaiser's daughter Kaitlin shared a class with "Casey," but he failed to make an impression, Ms. Kaiser said. "She remembers him, that he was quiet and sat in the back of the classroom," she said. "She said he looked like he had been held back."

Janet R. Lincoln, the public defender for Yavapai County, who represents Mr. Rodreick and the other three men, did not return multiple phone calls. A receptionist in her office said Ms. Lincoln would have no comment. The men have been indicted on numerous counts and are scheduled to appear in court in late February; they have already pleaded not guilty to charges of fraud and failing to register as sex offenders.

Mr. Rodreick spent seven years in prison in Oklahoma for making lewd and indecent proposals to two 6-year-old boys. After being released in 2002, law enforcement officials said, he was able to convince Lonnie Stiffler, 61, and Robert J. Snow, 43, who had been trolling the Internet for boys, that he was a minor.

In 2005, he talked the two men into taking him from Oklahoma to live with them in Arizona, where Mr. Stiffler posed as Mr. Rodreick's grandfather and Mr. Snow as his uncle, and both men regularly had sex with him, the authorities said. Another man living in the house, Brian Nellis, 34, a sex offender Mr. Rodreick had met in prison, is believed to have aided Mr. Rodreick in the ruse, the authorities said.

Mr. Rodreick continued the charade as a minor for nearly two years, the authorities said, registering at four charter schools in Arizona, until this month, when school administrators in Chino Valley called the sheriff.

The police and school officials in each location where "Casey" enrolled said they knew of no children harmed, although the indictment against Mr. Rodreick includes an assault count. The authorities are trying to determine, with the help of videos confiscated from the men, if there were victims in the schools.
